The stage will easily seat the entire orchestra of one hundred musicians. Twenty-five boxes for the associate directors of the Society will be set on the main floor. Conductor Walter Damrosch has already tested the acoustics of the Auditorium in a number of rehearsals, and is said to have found them excellent. The large seating capacity of the balconies will make possible a lower scale of prices than has been customary at the New York Symphony concerts in the past. It is intended to put 662 seats on sale at fifty cents, 519 at seventy-five cents, 608 at $1, and others at $1.50 and $2.00.

Hylan Conditions Halt Goldman Band Concert Plans for Central Park

Guggenheims May Be Forced to Discontinue Support Entirely; Seek New Site.

BLOW TO GOOD MUSIC

As a result of the conditions imposed by Mayor Hylan, the Guggenheim families have decided not to repeat the series of free Goldman band concerts in Central Park next summer. Those interested in the development of an increased public appreciation of worthwhile music regard this move as a severe blow to the progress of public musical education in New York.

To replace these concerts the Mayor's Committee on Music, headed by City Chamberlain Philip Berolzheimer, will institute a series of concerts known as Mayor Hylan's People's Concerts, to be given by the bands of the Police, Street Cleaning, and Fire Departments, the National Biscuit Company, and the 315th Infantry, and by some of the orchestras from the larger motion picture theatres. It is understood that the Guggenheims are looking for some other location in which to continue their annual free concerts where they will not be hampered by "political and other influences."

The action taken by the city government which forced the Guggenheims to come to this decision was Mr. Berolzheimer's refusal to allow Goldman's Band the use of the Mall in Central Park for more than two days weekly. Later he increased this maximum to three, and added that the other two of their proposed five concerts a week could take place in any of the other city parks. According to Mr. Berolzheimer, he also gave the Guggenheims "the option of hiring other conductors" than Edwin Franko Goldman, who conducted the concerts last year. They refused to accept this or any of the other of his conditions.

"The gift of the concerts," Mr. Goldman said, "was intended as a continuous series with a definite educational value in view. Those who have followed our programs for the past seven years know that we are doing serious work. We have ideals and have tried to maintain a high standard.

"We have always used a program schedule for the sixty concerts in advance of the season. This has been varied to suit the tastes of New York's cosmopolitan population. Our schedule for the coming season was completed some time ago, and would lose all its value were our season to be broken up. The concerts were not intended as neighborhood affairs in which our organization should tour greater New York, but for the whole city, with a permanent location in this borough."

The band concerts were nearly discontinued last season when Mayor Hylan's name appeared on the programs in type which almost obscured the names of the donors. The programs were revived after Daniel Guggenheim's announcement that he would discontinue the concerts if they were to be made "a political plaything."

Mme. Larsen-Todsen In Philadelphia Debut

Metropolitan Gives Tristan; Ina Bourskaya, Queena Mario, and Johnson in Carmen.

Philadelphia, March 12.—Nanny Larsen-Todsen made her Philadelphia debut last Tuesday in the Metropolitan Opera Company's production of Tristan und Isolde. Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer wrote that she showed a voice "of considerable dramatic quality, which she used with great skill." According to Linton Martin of the North American, Mme. Larsen-Todsen imparted to the role "an entirely individual vitality and vibrancy, making it at once epical and intimate, heroic and human."

The Ledger writer commented that she showed dramatic ability as well as "a very high, clear and powerful voice." In the Record she was lauded for a voice of "power and of excellent musical quality." Mr. Martin also commented that she really "rose to the regal role visually, vocally and dramatically."

Mr. Martin wrote that Curt Taucher portrayed the role of Tristan with sincerity and that his voice was "employed with good taste." The Ledger thought him "splendid."

According to this writer, Michael Bohnen acted with a poise that lent distinction to the role, while Mr. Muschamp lauded both him and Friedrich Schorr for their work. The Ledger observed that these two roles were "magnificently presented by two of the greatest artists as well as the finest singers of the Metropolitan." Mr. Martin joined in the general commendation of these two singers.

Marion Telva as Brangaene was "excellent," in the words of the Ledger writer, and Mr. Martin liked her rich contralto.

Others in the cast were George Meader, Arnold Gabor and Louis d'Angelo. As Mr. Muschamp put it, "the orchestra conducted by Artur Bodanzky again demonstrated that it is one of the finest musical organizations in the country."

* * *

Carmen was presented here last night by the Metropolitan Opera Company, with Ina Bourskaya in the title role and Edward Johnson as Don Jose. Queena Mario was Micaela, and Clarence Whitehill sang the Toreador. The remainder of the cast consisted of Mmes. Robertson and Wakefield and Messrs. Ananian, Paltrinieri, Martino and Reschiglian. Mr. Hasselmans conducted.

According to Linton Martin, Mme. Bourskaya sang well, but she was unsuited to the role. This, in the main, represented the consensus of the reviewers.

This reviewer found Mr. Johnson a "youthful and handsome" Don Jose, who progressed vocally and dramatically with the opera. Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer commended his vocal if not his dramatic work, but Mr. Martin wrote that he not only looked the part, but "sang the music with true intonation and finished phrasing." The Record reported that his fervor was "magnetic" and that he was in splendid voice, "which is saying much, for his voice is one of the best of tenors."

Miss Mario was especially praised for her singing of the aria in the third act. According to the Record, she sang in the "loveliest fashion, winning a tribute of appreciative applause," and Mr. Martin found her charming. Mr. Muschamp remarked that she received the ovation of the evening, while the Ledger chronicler said she sang "superbly, with beautiful tone and control of the voice." In the opinion of most of the reviewers, Mr. Whitehill acted with fine spirit, but was not in his best voice.

Metropolitan Opera Bill

WEDNESDAY

Petrouchka and Giovanni Gallurese — the former with Mmes. Galli and Rudolph, and Messrs. Bolm, Bonfiglio, Bartik, and Agnini; the latter with Mme. Mueller and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Danise, Didur, Bada, and Martino; Mr. Serafin conducting both performances.

THURSDAY

Goetterdaemmerung (matinee) — with Mmes. Larsen-Todsen, Mueller, and Telva; and Messrs. Taucher, Schorr, and Bohnen; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

Samson and Dalila (evening) — with Mmes. Branzell and Messrs. Martinelli, Danise, and Mardones; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

FRIDAY

Andrea Chenier—with Mme. Rethberg and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, de Luca, and Didur; Mr. Serafin conducting.

SATURDAY

Pelleas and Melisande (matinee)—revival with Mmes. Bori, Howard, and Hunter; and Messrs. Johnson, Whitehill, Rothier, and Ananian; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

Lucia di Lammermoor (evening)—with Mme. Mario and Messrs. Martinelli, de Luca, and Mardones; Mr. Papi conducting.

MONDAY

Romeo and Juliet — with Mme. Bori and Messrs. Johnson, de Luca, and Rothier; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

Further Summer Opera Plans

Greater New York will have its first season of free open air opera in Ebbet's Field, Brooklyn, from July 27 to August 12, Mayor Hylan announces through the city chamberlain, Philip Berolzheimer, who is also chairman of the Committee of Music, under whose auspices the performances will be given. Josiah Zuro, member of the committee and prominent in musical circles as the conductor of the Sunday Symphonic Society and the director of the Zuro Opera Company, has been selected to direct the entire production. The present plans provide for the offering of three operas, to be chosen later.

Louise Hunter for Light Opera

Atlanta, March 10.—Louise Hunter, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, will be guest artist in the first season of light opera in Atlanta this summer, it has been announced. The season will open at the Municipal Auditorium on June 15 and continue for six weeks. The operettas to be given are the Mikado, Spring Maid, Gypsy Baron, Prince of Pilsen, Firefly and Sweethearts. The conductor of the series will be Paul Eisler, also of the Metropolitan.

Jacobi Symphony Has Rochester Premiere

Albert Coates Conducts; Philharmonic Orchestra Will Close Its Season on March 19.

Rochester, March 11.—The concert by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra on March 19 will mark the conclusion of a successful season for Albert Coates with the organization. Frank Waller's Rochester Festival Chorus will be heard on the same program.

Last week Frederick Jacobi's new symphony, with the composer present, had its first Rochester performance. It has been heard only once before, the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra having played it last November.

According to Stewart B. Sabin of the Democrat and Chronicle: "The symphony on a first hearing makes plain that Mr. Jacobi has substance out of which to devise music; there was a constant statement of ideas in the first and last movements; in the second movement less material was used, but there was more consecutive development of it; the direct impression intended was thus more easily perceived and, one believes, more fully accomplished. Yet the second movement with its flute theme seemed by no means the best and most colorful of the symphony's content."

Ernest A. Weiss (Herald) was impressed with "the wealth of the composer's ideas and the honesty of his attitude toward his art. There is no straining or striving after unusual musical effects." In the words of A. J. Warner of the Times-Union, Mr. Jacobi is "young and enthusiastic, and he doubtless had a very definite idea and motive back of his often vivid musical sculpture."

In the Journal and Post-Express appeared the following analysis: "His symphony is good music. . . . Presentation of the theme adequately demands every resource of orchestration that the music may come to the hearer with the vigor the composer had in mind. The second movement is especially attractive. . . . The performance was out of the ordinary."

At Mr. Coates' last matinee concert on Thursday of this week, the Philharmonic will give a performance of Howard Hanson's new symphonic poem, Lux Aeterna, with the composer, who is director of the Eastman School of Music, conducting his own work.

Philadelphia Visited By N.Y. Philharmonic

Mengelberg Presents Eroica and Heldenleben; Stokowski Offers Conservative Program.

Philadelphia, March 11. — It was with undivided enthusiasm that the reviewers and the public welcomed Willem Mengelberg and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra to this city Monday. Mr. Mengelberg's program consisted of but two numbers, Beethoven's Eroica Symphony and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben.

Stanley Muschamp wrote in the Inquirer that "the production of these two great works under the extraordinary leadership of Mr. Mengelberg was a performance of unusually fine playing. There was a foundation of strength in the rhythms, a keen appreciation of the melodic line, and a feeling of inevitable climax realized with dramatic intensity." According to the North American, the Beethoven "under Mengelberg's glowing genius became a titanic structure of crystalline clarity."

In the Public Ledger, the reviewer asserted that "there can be no doubt that Mengelberg is one of the outstanding conductors of the world today." The Record writer went on in the same vein, and added a word of praise, as did the other reviewers, for the solo violin work done by Scipione Guidi in the Strauss work, who "displayed a warm, expressive tone and fine appreciation of the music's meaning."

The Friday concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conductor, was marked by an absence of any music newer than Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade. The other numbers were Purcell's Trumpet Prelude, which has been heard here in an earlier concert, Bach's Second Orchestral Suite, and Mottl's arrangement of a Gluck ballet-suite.

William M. Kincaid played the solo flute in the Bach number "superbly," to quote the Ledger, and other reviewers praised his playing. Stanley Muschamp wrote that the concert was "one of the most enjoyable of the season" and commented particularly on the playing of the Scheherazade..

Longy Will Retire

Georges Longy, for years first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will resign his position at the end of the present season. M. Longy will return to his native France to rest.

JOSEF ADLER
Teacher of Piano
ACCOMPANIST
137 West 86th St. New York
Phone Schuyler 3580

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street, New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

ELSA ALSEN
Famous Wagnerian Dramatic Soprano
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG 1425 Broadway, New York City

A New Note in Song-Recital Giving Charming Programs of Melodious Beethoven Songs—With Talks.
Management:
DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York City
FREEMANTEL

Mme. Schnitzer Plays With Hub Orchestra

Pianist Appears With People's Symphony; Koussevitzky Conducts Familiar Program.

Boston, March 9.—The two symphonic offerings of the week were Serge Koussevitzky's all-German program at the Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and yesterday's concert given by the People's Symphony Orchestra with Stuart Mason conducting and with Germaine Schnitzer as assisting soloist.

Yesterday's was Mme. Schnitzer's third appearance with the People's Symphony. The Monitor reviewer commented that "her touch has a delightfully velvety quality and in Franck's Variations, which mostly require great delicacy, this quality was consistently displayed." The writer in the Transcript considered her work "a merited triumph."

He wrote: "She is a strong player and leaves a strong impression of her personality even through such a familiar medium. . . . Her spirit and demeanor, her rigorous ways, and the exquisite tenderness of which she is thoroughly capable are barely suggestive of Boulanger. . . . She plays with rapt attention. Whatever the temperamental qualities in this particular music, she brought to the score a most pronounced sense of unity and co-ordination."

Mr. Mason also conducted Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Smetana's The Moldau, Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody, and a symphonic prelude to Browning's A Blot on the 'Scutcheon. This last work, by Leo Rich Lewis, professor of music at Tufts College, was given its first hearing. It was, according to the Transcript, "some very agreeable and some very dismal music." The Monitor reported that "the music possesses significant beauty and the themes are well developed." Mr. Mason's reading of both the Beethoven and Smetana numbers received commendation.

The only relatively unfamiliar work on Mr. Koussevitzky's program was the Weber-Mahler Intermezzo from Weber's unfinished opera, The Three Pintos. The other numbers were Brahms' Third Symphony, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream music, the Prelude to the third act of Die Meistersinger, and Strauss' Salome Dance.

Stuart Mason wrote in the Christian Science Monitor that the Intermezzo "is music of the most trivial variety," while the Globe reviewer considered it "sprightly, yet suave light music in wholly agreeable vein . . . heard gladly, and forgotten readily." Warren Storey Smith (Post) said that the Salome Dance "came for the first time into its own," but other writers were less enthusiastic. Philip Hale wrote in the Herald that "the magnificence of the performance could not conceal the inherent poverty of the music."

Photo by Mishkin.

LAWRENCE TIBBETT

Young American Baritone, Made His First New York Recital Appearance Last Night in Aeolian Hall.

Anna Case Sings in Her Only New York Recital

Her only New York recital of the season was sung by Anna Case in Carnegie Hall on March 9. Miss Case was assisted by Coenraad V. Bos, pianist, and Rufus M. Arey, clarinetist.

According to the Times, "early Italian airs, a group from Brahms and another in English by modern song writers displayed Miss Case as an artist in varied styles. Her voice has matured, as has the woman's wit that guides it with full command of its natural 'bright' tone and vivacious expression."

The writer in the Herald Tribune commented that "except for a certain ripple in some of her louder notes she was in excellent voice, with ample strength and a tone of agreeable clarity and freshness. From the point of view of interpretation, Miss Case showed an advance over former seasons." The Sun found her in good voice, although her middle notes were "uneven and tremulous," and thought the Italian songs sung "with dignity, an elevated style and a fine sonorous tone" even if not with the "smoothest of legatos."

Herbert F. Peyser wrote in the Telegram-Mail that Miss Case "has perceptibly refined and polished her delivery; her interpretations are most tastefully composed, and her treatment of phrases indicates a delicate feeling for melodic integrity." In spite of all this, he found "a constant reediness of tonal quality" throughout her singing.

Polish Music Played

In its second concert in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House on the afternoon of March 8 the National Polish Orchestra gave a program of Polish music under the direction of Mr. Namyslowski.

Gigli Sings in Boston

Tenor Gives Recital; Maier and Pattison in Concert of Two-Piano Music.

Boston, March 11.—The recitalists heard here last week were Beniamino Gigli, Beatrice Mack, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, Georgina Shaylor, Gladys de Almeida and Abraham Haitowitsch.

The Metropolitan tenor was acclaimed with prolonged cheers and applause as soon as he entered the hall Sunday, and his audience demanded numerous encores. According to the Monitor, he has "abundant natural gifts well developed, a voice typical of fine Italian tenors, of large volume, immense resonance and fine flexibility. He possesses, as well, an amusing and clever stage manner."

Warren Storey Smith of the Post commented that "his is a rich tenor voice, mellow in quality, ample in volume, a voice that can be made eloquent with feeling." The Herald writer did not consider that he sang "uniformly well," but added that he "is blessed with a beautiful voice, when he sings with due regard to his present powers. He can deliver moderately strong tones in his middle register of amazing richness and sweetness." The Transcript reviewer noted that "Mr. Gigli when he chooses can be a discerning, just and moving singer."

Mr. Gigli was assisted by Beatrice Mack, soprano. To quote the Herald, she had "a pretty voice to her credit and clearness of execution." Mr. Smith commended her as "a light-voiced, sufficiently competent soprano," and in the Monitor the writer said that her voice was "light, clear, agile in intricate technical feats," but found better placement in lighter songs.

* * *

Messrs. Maier and Pattison were again heard here Sunday in a two-piano recital given for the benefit of the Charity Fund of Miss Hersey's School. They were enthusiastically applauded for their performance of music by Brahms, Clementi, Schumann, Dohnanyi, Templeton Strong, Duvernoy, Lord Berners, D. G. Blake and Mozart.

To quote the Herald: "These several years Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison have had at their command every quality desirable for playing two-piano music. Yesterday they were at their best; they seemed even to have gained a still finer freedom of utterance." In the opinion of the reviewer in the Transcript, their playing of the Mozart Sonata was especially worthy; "Messrs. Maier and Pattison made a third in this blithe paradise of song, for they were as one in the skill that is born of sensibility."

* * *

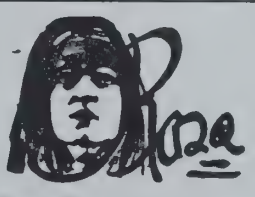
Accompanied by Frances Weeks, Georgina Shaylor, contralto, gave a recital in Jordan Hall last Tuesday. Stuart Mason (Monitor) wrote that Miss Shaylor "has a decided gift for the interpretation of songs. . . . To be sure, she is not yet a finished artist, but her intentions are quite evident, and in many a case they are near realization. She has evidently studied the mood and atmosphere of her songs, and more often than not she successfully established them. . . . It is possible to record a substantial progress in emotional power and intelligent comprehension of the music in hand."

On the other hand, Philip Hale and the Transcript writer considered that Miss Shaylor over-interpreted.

* * *

Gladys de Almeida, soprano, was heard in the same hall the following evening, with Henry Levine acting as accompanist. The Herald observer found Miss de Almeida "a singer of unusual excellence," who is "blessed with an exceedingly pretty voice, a light soprano of long range, with low notes of a delightfully individual timbre, a medium, very warm and full, and high notes at their best strong and clear. . . . She sings with a smooth legato and a neat attack" as well as "distinctness of enunciation."

In the Monitor Miss de Almeida was commended for a voice which without large volume "blends and shades tones well; brilliant or covered, it is clear and resonant, accurately placed and possessed of a thoroughly agreeable quality. The freshly charming personality with which Miss de Almeida infuses her songs, and the emotional color and vivacity which she adds to musical abilities promise well for her future development." She received a slightly more reserved commendation in the Transcript. Mr. Levine was lauded in this paper for his "sympathetic and colorful accompaniments."



Rosa Ponselle

Exclusive Management
National Concerts, Inc.
1451 Broadway
New York City

Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: CHARLES L. WAGNER
D. F. McSWEENEY
511 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

Elena GERHARDT
Management: GEORGE ENGLES—Aeolian Hall, New York City
STEINWAY PIANO

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

ERNESTINE SCHUMANN HEINK
Exclusive Management, S. Hurok, Inc., Aeolian Hall, New York
STEINWAY PIANO- VICTOR RECORDS
KATHERINE HOFFMAN, Accompanist
FLORENCE HARDEMAN, Violinist

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 22

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879
Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.: Canada, $6.00: Foreign Countries, $7.00
Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

Simplicity

Only the big person, the courageous person, is simple.

It is the half-fearful, who are not sure of themselves, that prefer the ornate. Anything rather than to take any chance of being discovered for less than they actually are. The world is filled with such human beings, and the United States has its share. They are nowhere more plentiful, proportionately, than in music.

A great creative artist is not concerned so much with how his work will be received as he is with the quality of that work.

A great interpretative artist seeks to give to his auditors what the composer intended should be conveyed. Each hews unconsciously to the line of simplicity . . . since simplicity is one element of greatness.

Survey carefully the musician who deals in superlatives and flourishes; who palavers and flatters. He generally is insincere, and is concerned chiefly with Number One. It is his own welfare he considers first—his material welfare.

Welcome the quiet-spoken musician who reflects intelligence and kindliness. Beware the artist who utilizes "showmanship" methods to gain applause, for underneath is shallowness of mind and intent and worth.

This age is unfortunately infested with too much of the superficial. Well-meaning but thoughtless folk take more for granted than they should. Fuss and furbelows and a loud noise still carry a certain weight . . . though not as much as they did formerly, because people are learning gradually what such things really cloak.

Pretentiousness and swagger are becoming tagged; genuineness is coming into its own. The loud-mouthed sometimes prevail—for a while—but in the end they fade, as do all who have no firmer substance than the shell which is inferiority.

Louisiana Music Teachers

Within a few days the Louisiana State Music Teachers' Association will hold its 1925 convention in New Orleans. Members from various parts of that commonwealth will meet for their common good. A two-days' session will ensue, with members of the association delivering addresses on subjects affecting the careers of educators who have a desire to get on.

One sign which indicates the progressiveness of this organization is the consideration which is to be given to music journalism. A paper is to be read on that theme . . . which is a timely one and deserves abundant attention and thought.

The day of the doctored and falsely laudatory reading notice is passing, just as is the flamboyant advertisement. The arousing of undue hopes in the mind of the prospective pupil is giving way before the teacher's honest weighing of the resources of that pupil. Ethical procedure amongst music teachers is gaining ground, and eventually the mediocre and the charlatan will pass from view.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

A WEEK ago Sunday in New York was Strauss day for those who chose to celebrate the occasion of the successive playing of two of his biggest and finest works by making a quick change from Aeolian Hall to Carnegie Hall during intermission time. Early in the afternoon the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Bruno Walter, played Don Quixote. As soon as the performance was over, one tenor tuba player and a limited number of the Symphony Society audience packed their duds, and made their way as quickly as possible to Carnegie Hall, a mile uptown, where Willem Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Orchestra rounded out their program with Ein Heldenleben.

In all, there were some ninety minutes packed solid with the music of Strauss. I could have stood an immediate repetition of the dose.

TWENTY years ago the complex tone poems of the Viennese composer were baffling because of their fullness of polyphony, their richness of tone color, their untraditional breadth of melody, and their sheer uninterrupted length.

Critics succumbed to the temptation of judging the music by that part of it which they could best understand, the programs. Strauss as a composer was criticized in terms quite irrelevant to the music in his scores. Death and Transfiguration was terrible because it portrayed the agonies of death; Don Quixote was ridiculous because it made a noise like sheep and like the wind; the Domestic Symphony was foolish because it sounded like a baby crying, and Heldenleben was tasteless and cheap because it was presumptuously autobiographical and because it imitated a war.

One hears the same criticisms still, although as the years pass the spontaneous popularity of Strauss' music begins to make them appear as garrulous and superficial as they actually are. When all is said and done, it remains that Strauss has been one of the great geniuses of music. The sheer skill with which his tone poems are written is breath-taking. From measure to measure the mass of his music is a first-rate text in composition, in orchestration, counterpoint and form.

The aptness of his use of instruments is uncanny. One can think immediately of endless illustrations: the English horn in the "baby" theme (I use the program for purposes of identification) in Domestica; the French horns in their climactic theme in Don Juan; the bassoons in the "monks" variation of Don Quixote; the whole choir of strings in all their range in the "Hero" theme; the woodwinds in the "Enemy" themes; the kettledrum in the Burleske; the trumpet fanfare in Heldenleben; the tenor tuba solo in the same work; the harp almost everywhere — many others. When Strauss fits an important theme to an instrument, the idea and the medium become inseparable.

IT can hardly be denied that Strauss is sometimes theatrical, but he is seldom cheap. I must admit as a weak spot, for example, the rhythmic drum passage at the opening of the battle scene in Heldenleben. There, for a time, the music stops, and the instruments make excitement. Such passages, however, are rare.

In fact, it is the comparative (among the scores of Strauss, I mean) weakness of the battle that makes me prefer the Domestic Symphony with its tremendous double fugue to Heldenleben. In both cases the musical device is the same (it is Wagner's, in fact): the composer uses a complex polyphonic passage to set off the broad melodic and harmonic treatment of the finale. The double fugue is a more musical idea intrinsically. One can follow the polyphony with a keener interest and a surer feeling of direction than in the similarly contrapuntal parts of Heldenleben.

As for Strauss' being theatrical—Wagner was certainly so, and Beethoven, too. It is a mistake to expect to hear Haydn when Strauss is on the program.

CARL VAN VECHTEN has from time to time put Strauss in a class with Liszt. I cannot see that at all. They both wrote program music, and they both were free with fortissimos, but when Strauss composed works to last fifty minutes, the trend of his ideas and the form in which they were put were so skillful that rarely does one feel that his pieces fall apart, or even that they are too long.

Liszt is different. His music seems to me to consist often of sections hooked together one after another, with the noisiest of all at the end to guarantee applause. Even if Strauss is theatrical, how many of his compositions end with a prolonged, exciting climax and a bang? Most of them, in fact, are closed with quiet and thoughtful pages.

ONE of the finest passages in all orchestral music, incidentally, is that in Ein Heldenleben in which the composer quotes a number of themes of his earlier compositions. One has the most pleasant sensation of reminiscence as the voices of Don Quixote, Sancho Panza, Don Juan, Till, and the others are mingled in revery.

I am always a little startled, however, when I hear that unmistakable motif from Wotan's farewell, "espressivo—sehr getragen," in the trombones (the third measure after No. 89 in the score). I wonder sometimes whether Strauss intended the reference.

THE lover of music must have a dozen ears for what he hears. It is impossible that one should approach Mozart in the same state of expectation in which one goes to Cesar Franck, else the colorful orchestration of the latter must make the former seem grey by comparison.

Recently the Philharmonic included Ein Heldenleben and Beethoven's Eroica on the same program. Of course the Eroica was played first. The program could not have been reversed. After the broad climaxes of the modern piece, the Eroica would probably have fallen down because of its smaller scale of dynamics and its less varied tonal color.

One hundred years ago it was different. For reasons similar to the above a Mozart composition would probably have preceded the Eroica on the well-ordered program. It is safe to say that a century in the future things will be different again. What will be the dimensions of the composition, I wonder, that will make it necessary for the judicious conductor to open his concert with A Hero's Life when both are played together?

ALEXANDER FRIED.

Opera in the Flesh

Even the Airy Mysticism of Debussy's Pelleas et Melisande Comes to Earth During the Trying Hours of Rehearsal

by ALEXANDER FRIED

WHEN one goes to the opera, one sees strange things happen. Curtains rise and fall, colored lights shine brightly and are dimmed. Suddenly darkness embraces everything, and in a moment again it is broad daylight. Persons—singly, in groups, or in crowds—appear on the scene, and go through complex movements.

Do you see that couch in the middle of the stage? Who put it there? Who decided that it should not be six inches further to the left or to the right? Why does the hero on the stage raise his head at this moment, and now let it fall

Who arranged all this? . . . none of it occurs by accident.

Many of the directions for the production of an opera, of course, are included in the composer's score, but even these have to be interpreted and carried out. The work is done in the innumerable rehearsals which precede the public performance of any well presented opera, rehearsals of the voice parts, of the orchestra, of both together with the lighting and scenic effects, and finally of all combined with the costumes and complete stage business.

Visit one of these rehearsals (if you may), and see and hear opera in the flesh.

Next Saturday afternoon the first performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company of the Debussy-Maeterlinck opera, Pelleas et Melisande, will be given.

It is the everlasting triangle in a new garb. The protagonists are not prosaic doctors or lawyers, but kings and princes in a hazy land of imagination. The action of the plot is not reasonably worked out and displayed with the logic of pure realism. Rather the scenes are a series of moods which paint the story in broad lines and delicate colors. It is a story told in feelings, not in plain messages given the audience by the actors.

Debussy has done his share in the re-creation of Pelleas et Melisande for the singing stage by supplying the plot with fitting music. In the twenty-three years since it was first played Debussy's score has become inseparably identified with Maeterlinck's play.

Even opera of such intangible romanticism as this French masterpiece is prepared in the flesh. I visited the first stage rehearsal of the Debussy work one morning last week. . . .

The Metropolitan Opera House is shrouded in darkness. The orchestral pit is empty; the rehearsal is to be held with piano only.

Nevertheless Conductor Louis Hasselmans takes his place at his stand, his baton in his hand. At the right of the stage is an upright piano. Mr. Pelletier, assistant conductor, begins to play. At last the setting of the first scene is ready. The audience, consisting of a scattering of persons—here a Wagnerian conductor, there a Wolfram and there an Eva of note, other Metropolitan artists and a group of office attaches—finds itself in the midst of a dense forest.

Clarence Whitehill wanders on the scene, immaculately dressed in civilian clothes of the twentieth century, but bearing in his hand the spear of Golaud. Lucrezia Bori runs in quickly in a dress of bright red. From her head hangs a long yellow veil. For the moment it is to do service as the fabled hair of Melisande. Greetings, and they begin.

Golaud with his gold watch chain and spear makes his entrance. He sings in French that he has lost his path in the woods. He sings softly but he acts with fervor. Mimicking his every motion, as it seems, is the stage director, Wilhelm von Wymetal. With exaggerated gesture and grace he indicates the stage business. This moment he is the wandering Golaud, the next the startled Melisande lying by the spring. In a second he is frightened (for Miss Bori) and reassuring (for Mr. Whitehill).

Of a sudden, commotion! Supervisors of the lights shout up from the back of the auditorium and are answered from behind the scenes. They converse, entreat, and argue. The music continues, nevertheless. The scenic directors find something at fault. Enter three stage hands with a scenic rock and a set of steps, and make adjustments. All the while the piano murmurs on. Mr. Hasselmans waves his baton, and urges, "Tempo, tempo!"

A scene is repeated, a motion gone over a half dozen times. In the auditorium the murmur of conversation among the select auditors grows. "Silence!" is the cry, and everyone takes it up until it is deafening.

The scene ends, and the curtain comes down with tasteless abruptness. That will never do. It is taken up, and comes down again, this time with exemplary leisure and finesse. The piano plays the orchestral interlude, and behind the curtain stage hands scurry and push and hoist scenery into its place. Rumbles, scratches, knocks are heard. Everyone hisses for quiet.

The cue comes for the rising curtain. It rises not. Repeat . . . this time it rises beautifully, but each light is in the wrong place. Nevertheless, Kathleen Howard sings the passage of the letter from Golaud with complete stage business, and Leon Rothier acts the paternal king, both in semi-darkness. Back and forth before them, always talking and arguing, wander directors, one calling directions for the light, one pointing out corrections in the sets, one indicating stage business.

From the side of the stage steps up a young man in the dress of a broker or a lawyer. He might be either, by his appearance, but he is not. He is Edward Johnson, or, for the present, Pelleas. The versatile Mr. Wymetal now goes through the motion of three roles: he is paternal, maternal, and youthful-filial all at once.

Suddenly a clap of the hands. Everything comes to a stop. Mr. Pelletier's piano lamp interferes with the lighting. His piano is moved out by three or four stage hands, and he goes to the instrument in the pit. The action is begun again. English, French, German, and Italian fly about the stage and pit, each spoken with at least three foreign accents. And the music continues regardless. To the inexperienced listener it is next to frenzy, to bedlam. The great curtain mercifully ends the act. Of course no one is pleased with the way it came down, but that will all be fixed. Mr. Hasselmans sinks into the nearest seat. . . .

"I conducted this opera first in the Opera-Comique," he told me during the intermission "That was about six years ago. No, Pelleas et Melisande has never been given by the Metropolitan before, although another company gave it with Mary Garden (the creator of the role of Melisande) in this house.

"To me it is one of the three finest French operas. My other favorites are Dukas' Ariane et Barbe-Bleue, and Faure's Penelope. Pelleas is a most difficult work to produce. You see how much detail there is in it. Everything must be perfectly co-ordinated, must work perfectly right, the orchestra, the singers, the stage effects. It is a score in which Debussy has aimed almost entirely to give the accents of poetic conversation in the voice parts.

"Even the audience must co-operate," continued Mr. Hasselmans wiping his brow, but smiling. "It must learn to keep still, for Pelleas et Melisande is keyed low from beginning to end.

"As for the opera itself it is perfectly beautiful. Debussy is the only man who could fittingly have set this delicate play to music. You know, I never cease to find it remarkable that he, as well as Charpentier, Ravel, Laparra, and d'Ollone should all have studied with Massenet, for all kept their own musical individuality."

Mr. Hasselmans began to tell me of himself, in reply to my questions, of his youth as a cellist, of his work with the Opera-Comique and the Metropolitan. There was the sudden signal, a couple of handclaps. Mr. Hasselmans started up, seizing his baton. Someone had relieved Mr. Pelletier at the piano. The curtain opened on the fountain scene, one of Joseph Urban's most beautiful accomplishments. Singing, talking, playing, acting, arguing, thumping, entreating, all in four languages, began again.

I looked at my watch. It was quarter to two, with acts to go. There was no sign of let-up. Duty and hunger called. I went out into the light.

Photos of Mme. Bori and Mr. Johnson by Mishkin.

Debussy's Pelleas et Melisande will be given for the first time by the Metropolitan Opera Company Saturday afternoon. Lucrezia Bori (lower left) will sing the part of Melisande; Clarence Whitehill (lower left), that of Golaud; Edward Johnson (upper left), that of Pelleas, and Louis Hasselmans (lower right) will conduct. In the center is a caricature of the composer, and upper right is the beautiful garden scene, painted by Joseph Urban.

AND

NO

DISSENTING

VOICE!

FRANCIS

MACMILLEN

Season's last New York Recital, March 3, 1925

"Macmillen's violin—of ancient vintage—produced a remarkably rich, mellow tone and he played with unusual vigor and technical skill. The Brahms selection was brilliantly executed and his interpretation of the others stamped the occasion—his final appearance for the season—as one of the most impressive of this able artist's recitals. He was complimented by the presence of a good-sized house, which made the customary demands for encores."

---New York Evening Post, March 4, 19

"There was novelty of arrangement in the program offered. Mr. Macmillen met the varied requirements of this program with his customary breadth of sympathy and technical resourcefulness. In the Lalo battle-horse of all the fiddlers (Symphonie Espagnole) his playing had elegance and the requisite brilliancy. To Brahms' Sonata he brought due appreciation of the German master's soberer idiosyncrasy. The smaller pieces were treated with the proper delicacy and finesse."

---Pitts Sanborn, New York Telegram and Evening Mail, March 4, 1925.

"Francis Macmillen walked off with the day's musical honors. But even if there had been more important concerts on the evening's schedule, we believe that Macmillen would have fared little less well. For he is an uncommonly fine artist, this American. In his playing of the Brahms D minor Sonata, for instance, he exhibited a fine appreciation of the nobly lyric nature of the work. His tone is smooth, even and capable of great variety in color."

---Edward Cushing, Brooklyn Eagle, March 4, 1925.

"Francis Macmillen's recital—his last for the season—proved a worthy effort. It was particularly worthy because of the Brahms D Minor sonata that anchored the program to something sound and solid and because of Mr. Macmillen's musicianly playing of it. Sonatas are not easy game for the customary violin audience, yet Macmillen had his listeners intent upon his performance."

---Frank Warren, New York Evening World, March 4, 1925.

"Macmillen played better than he has for a long time. His tone was firm and full, with plenty of warm color, and the phrasing was sensitive and effective. He has a sound musical style. The range and breadth of interpretation made this recital a most enjoyable one."

---New York Sun, March 4, 1925

"An audience of good size attended. A Goldmark Aria and the Pugnani-Kreisler prelude and Allegro, both of which require, and received broad treatment. They placed Mr. Macmillen on a firm footing with his audience, which recalled him four times at the conclusion but reserved its warmest approval for the Brahms Sonata in D minor. Macmillen came near perfection in the slower movements."

---New York Times, March 4, 1925

"MACMILLEN PLAYS
"AUDIENCE DELIGHTED

"Enthusiastic applause interrupted three times a brilliant performance of Saint-Saens' 'Rondo Capriccioso.' Macmillen's tone is full and sweet without being forced. He phrases musically and plays with keenly felt but unexaggerated rhythmic effects. His modest, unassuming bearing is also in his favor. Last night's audience obviously thought well of him."

---Boston Globe, February 27, 1925.

FOR TERMS AND DATES ADDRESS

HAENSEL & JONES — AEOLIAN HALL, NEW YORK

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

CAN IT BE that standardization and ethical procedure are really to govern amongst music conservatories and private teachers? Is there to be effected, within the next two or three years, a manifest betterment in those fundamental respects which the most conscientious and constructive members of the profession have for some time realized ought to come to pass?

There are signs to encourage those who have entertained such hopes. Actual progress has been made . . . by two organizations. The extent of their success will depend upon how ably these organizations are administered. Those particular jobs will not be easy—for either the American Academy of Teachers of Singing (already some two years old) or the National Association of Schools of Music and Allied Arts (which is not yet fully organized and does not expect to function short of another twelve months or more).

Most of us are aware that nothing is, ever has been, or ever will be one hundred per cent. In such circumstances it will not be surprising to eventually discover that some teacher of singing who has become a member of the American Academy is violating certain of its promulgated ethics, and that like offenses are being committed by member schools of the National Association.

THESE are matters to be pointed out during the formative periods of these two organizations because they are matters for very serious consideration. Selection and rejection of membership in either association will not be easy. With the recognition of what these bodies are likely to accomplish (and what prestige a membership in either will give), pressure is sure to be brought to bear to gain admittance—on the respective two sides—for individuals and for schools which have been constant violators of ethics, and are likely to continue their practices even if they succeed in "swinging some influence" to get into good company. They may continue those practices—unless the officers of these two associations have the courage to either prevent them, or failing in that, to expel the offenders.

Benefits will assuredly accrue from the plans the American Academy is working out, and also from the plans of the National Association. The former has proceeded slowly, the latter must expect a similar experience.

In respect to contributing to the further efficiency of music school operation and the interchange and standardization of ideas, study courses, credit grantings, and the bestowal of teachers' certificates and diplomas the National Association cannot fail to perform a service of inestimable value.

The American Academy may also be counted on to promote progress in the teaching of singing, and to otherwise further efficiency and results amongst those of the craft.

WILL these two organizations be as successful in spreading the gospel of ethical procedure, and seeing that those ethics are maintained by every individual member? That is a big question, which it will not be possible to answer for a number of months to come.

The United States has come along in the music teaching field during the past decade. It has accomplished almost unbelievable things, one of them being the advancement of the American-born teacher. He has become a factor in the music-teaching fabric of the land, and his future will glow with an increasing intensity . . . providing two or three things happen.

One of those things is the extension of sincere practices: of truth telling to prospective pupils in which no false hopes shall be held out; of truthfulness in advertising; of claiming no successful artist as a pupil who is not legitimately that; of casting no stones at another teacher.

Someone may inquire whether the foregoing isn't approaching close to the idealistic, and wish also to know if it is at all practical.

Judging from the changes which have come over the nation's music-teaching fabric in the past few years it would seem that the age of buncombe is about to fade and, in its place, that efficient and decent procedure will eventually prevail.

I LOOK to see this happen because of the spreading of fine influences. Certain new figures have stepped into the music-teaching world, and they are destined to add a vast strength to those in the field who have been striving for the adoption and maintenance of eminently constructive elements.

One of these is the furtherance of honesty and restraint in advertising. At present one sees too much that is flamboyant; too much that makes claims which cannot be substantiated. Instead of being representative of a fine art, these advertisements are all too often a mass of over-black and large type which suggests nothing so much as announcements of cheap fire sales.

Commercialism is at the bottom of it. An individual teacher or a school having a monetary profit as the principal objective, frame advertisements which shriek. The more serious and painstaking (and, generally, the more efficient) individual teachers and schools refuse to resort to such methods.

For a long time the boisterous advertiser appeared to have the better of it; but there has lately ensued in discriminating circles such disapproval of his methods that even he is beginning to wonder if it is a wise game to keep up.

A SUCCESSFUL OUTCOME of these two organized efforts to standardize what can be standardized, and to purify the ethics in the music teaching profession, may be confidently predicted. It will require time, and patience, too, a great deal of tact, and considerable backbone on the part of those who must serve as leaders.

The United States has a mass of music pupils. It is a mass wherein may be found talent of the foremost order. But the greater portion of our young people need to be told what their abilities can lead them to accomplish. The percentage justified in preparing for professional careers is very small; somewhat larger is the number which can be trained to teach well. That leaves the majority of pupils eligible solely to study music that they may know the pleasure of playing some instrument or singing, and of developing their cultural sides.

There are many elements involved in this music teaching problem, and anyone who imagines that they are to be easily or quickly solved is doomed to sharp disappointment. But an outstanding fact which offers encouragement of the ultimate victory is the seriousness of certain persons who have identified themselves with these two undertakings which I have discussed.

It will be a simple matter to check up the accomplishments—when both organizations have been functioning long enough to make that permissible. Publicity is a factor which can be brought helpfully into play; and as it will aid substantially in the approval of what merits approving, so can it operate to check and eliminate all that is of an opposite nature.

A CABLED ACCOUNT of the consequences of Mme. Ganna Walska's recent opera appearance in Nice makes illuminative reading. That account, published in a recent issue of the New York Times, is as follows:

"Nice, March 7.—If Mme. Ganna Walska agrees to pay 50,000 francs in advance to cover capacity seating at the Opera House she may sing again in Nice. That is the most recent development in the story of this millionaire American woman's attempt to convince Europe she is a great operatic artist.

"Mme. Ganna's first performance was, in the opinion of the Mayor of Nice, so injurious to the musical reputation of the town that he issued a fiat that she must not appear again, although her contract was for two further performances. He did not know the lady. Her determination to become an operatic star has never failed in the face of Chicago's disapproval, the noisy demonstrations of a Havana audience, nor the tittering laughter of the Paris Opera House. It is not therefore likely to fail before the Mayor's fiat.

"From Vienna Mme. Ganna has entered a telephonic protest against his arbitrary and 'illegal' action. She announced that she would keep the Opera House open to her if she had to resort to legal process. Last week, when told of these threats, the Mayor fulminated against 'this woman.' He said she could consider herself lucky that it was at Nice and not at Marseilles that she attempted to sing the role of Butterfly. Nice is an orderly town. At Marseilles there would have been a riot.

"The Mayor has quieted down since then. He has a new idea. With a shrug of his shoulders he said that if Mme. Ganna wished to guarantee 50,000 francs to cover the capacity of the Opera House perhaps she could sing again. It was only when she had guaranteed the whole seating capacity of the Paris Opera for a charity performance that she sang there.

"Perhaps the Mayor of Nice has already concluded the bargain. Anyhow, the Nice season is nearly over and 50,000 francs opera receipts may be full compensation for any supposed injury which might ensue to the city's musical reputation."

MME. WALSKA has a perfect right to persist in her efforts to sing publicly in opera. If she can so arrange, it is her own affair. Whether her persistence and methods are to be commended is quite another matter. What appears evident is that the wife of Harold McCormick intends to appear whenever and wherever she can, or know the reason therefor. She has the fixed determination to secure those appearances, and if it means she has to buy them, then buy them she will.

I attended the now memorable representation of Rigoletto given, for charity, in the Paris Opera a year ago last summer. It was not, as I pointed out at the time, a regular performance in the schedule of the Opera. Director Rouche leased the auditorium for the occasion, and Mme. Walska is said to have made a $5,000 contribution for the privilege of appearing as Gilda.

The incidents of that summer's night are an old story. I doubt, if I had not seen and heard what Mme. Walska did that evening, that I could have credited the telling of those details . . . had they been related to me by another.

The latest cabled information from Nice is to the effect that the mayor of that city has forbidden Mme. Walska to appear at the opera and that Madeleine Keltie, an American, is to replace her in the planned performances of Madama Butterfly there. It has not been verified. But if the news is correct it would seem that merit does on occasions command consideration, even when the weight of money is wielded against it.

OUT IN SAN FRANCISCO the people know very well "Jack" Partington. He controls several theatres, one of which is devoted to motion pictures. The seating capacity is large, and the music part of the program of reputed excellence (I have it on the authority of Mr. Partington's sister, who ought to know since she is none other than Frances Peralta, one of the leading dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House).

"Jack is in New York to secure a conductor," said Miss Peralta a few days ago, "and he has some interesting things to say about jazz. Jazz is passing out, according to him. The people care less for it, and, as a consequence, it requires a capable musician to arrange popular music in ways that give it a far better character than it discloses in its original form."

What Miss Peralta has to say is interesting because hard upon her statement come other indications that the raucous and ear-trying jazz (mainly of the "blues" type) has wearied even the fast-moving public of today.

There was some comment in this department two weeks ago on the swinging back towards normalcy of a people who have been living at too strenuous a pace. Perhaps the end of insufferable sounds mis-labelled music, which falls in the so-called popular class, is not far off.

FOLLOWING the announcement of the success in France of the opera, Fay-yen-fah, written by Templeton Crocker and Joseph Redding, is another having to do with American composers and librettists. The Chicago Civic Opera Company has elected to produce next season A Light from St. Agnes. Minnie Maddern Fiske surely may be regarded as an American, and W. Franke Harling, who came to this country from England when only three months old, wrote the music.

It is about time to consider, and well, one important matter: Americans in music—creative and interpretative—deserve attention and opportunities in proportion to their abilities. If they have qualities of outstanding excellence then let them be recognized. Where those qualities do not obtain the claimant for a place in the music sun has no rights whatsoever.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

Mme. Lucilla de Vescovi

An entire recital of modern Italian songs of Bossi, Liuzzi, Malipiero, Respighi, Pizzetti, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Bianchini, Donaudy, N. Rota Rinaldi, V. Guerrini Bianco, and Casella was given by Lucilla de Vescovi in Town Hall, New York, on Wednesday evening. Mme. de Vescovi was accompanied by Wilfred Pelletier.

Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) wrote that these songs were "interpreted with understanding, taste and charm. . . . After a little initial difficulty, due perhaps to nervousness, Mme. de Vescovi sang with her accustomed freedom and expressiveness." She was referred to in the Times as "a singer of uncommon sensibility" who "grows in control of her voice and her command of tone color."

According to the Sun reviewer, her voice revealed "considerable unevenness last evening, especially in the middle register, which lacked sonority and was badly placed. . . . But her high tones were free and full. There was color, vitality and definite charm in Mme. de Vescovi's singing. The spirit and play of mood in her songs were set forth admirably." In the Herald Tribune, the commentator noted that the soprano sang in a voice "of moderate volume, not without departure from smoothness of tone and evidence of a certain effort, but with skill in phrasing and interpretation. She struck notably clear and resonant high notes and gave most effective stage presence."

Miss Florence Lefferts

Florence Lefferts, young American soprano, gave her first New York recital in Town Hall on March 5. She was accompanied in her three groups of German, French, and Italian songs by Giuseppe Bamboschek at first, and then by Wilfred Pelletier.

The Sun reviewer found her "a pleasing singer with a voice of moderate power, light and of good quality" who disclosed her "admirable" schooling in "a commendable tone production, knowledge of style and taste." Miss Lefferts was nervous at first, according to this writer, "but she steadily brought her vocal powers under firmer control and did herself justice as her list advanced. She seemed young and no doubt will add to her color range and power in expressing emotions."

Of more or less the same opinion was the Times observer, who commented that "nervousness inclined the voice to be sharp at times, but it had an attractive timbre of its own, and Miss Lefferts sang with genuine feeling and animation." This reviewer felt that the singer was "much more in her element" in the German songs; "the diction was clear and the singing unforced."

State Symphony Orchestra

The State Symphony Orchestra of New York gave its last Wednesday subscription concert of the season, under the baton of Ignatz Waghalter, at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday evening. Ilse Niemack was the soloist in Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

According to the Times, Miss Niemack "proved the possession of an unusually appealing tone. She played the andante with a degree of emotion very rare in one so young." The reviewer in the Post commented that she displayed "mellowness of tone and a pleasing technique, occasionally a bit faulty in passages."

The Herald Tribune chronicler observed that Miss Niemack displayed a tone "of ample size and of generally good quality, though with some dried spots and corrugations of the surface in an otherwise mellow timbre. Technically she was well equipped." In the Sun, the reviewer asserted that as a whole her performance "lacked brilliance, but there was a certain degree of good tone with technical equipment in her work and the andante showed sentiment."

The rest of the program consisted of Beethoven's third Leonore Overture, and Brahms' C minor Symphony.

Mme. Julia Hudak

At the Manhattan Opera House on March 6 Julia Hudak, Hungarian dancer, made her postponed debut in New York with the assistance of Rodion Gritzanov, Attila Farkas, and her ballet corps. The orchestra was conducted by Deszo d'Antalffy. The featured number on the program was a ballet in three scenes, The Romances of Ilonka, and other numbers included an operatic group, and divertissements.

In the Herald Tribune it was said that "Mme. Hudak's dancing held no hint of the recent injury to her ankle and was marked by lightness of foot, grace and mobility, with notable aptitude for toe dancing. The supporting company seemed agile and well trained, with costumes forming a colorful ensemble." The Times writer observed that "she showed easily an experienced technique of the classic order and some skill in designing ballets built upon the folk-dances of her native land."

Martinelli Sings in Boheme

La Boheme was sung for the fifth time this season by the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, Wednesday evening, with Giovanni Martinelli as Rodolfo making his second appearance since his illness. In other respects the cast was unchanged, and Mr. Papi conducted.

Miss Bianca del Vecchio

In a program of Bach-Busoni, Schumann, and Brahms Bianca del Vecchio gave a piano recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, March 5. Miss del Vecchio four years ago won the Loeb prize on her graduation from the Institute of Musical Art.

According to the Times, "the mature young artist, for such she has become in brief time, again gave proof of qualities beyond the merely technical in Schumann's Kreisleriana, qualities of poetic imagination sympathetically conveyed."

The Sun chronicler wrote that her playing, after a slight nervousness at first, "gained steadily in restraint and clarity. Her technical equipment is formidable and she used it well, although some of her early work was marred by bad pedaling. She played Schumann with insight and intelligence and although her general style lacked distinction she revealed a fine sonorous legato, a tone of considerable warmth and color, and an evident appreciation of the melodic details of her offerings. . . . Her playing, however, was thoroughly musical, sensitive, full of vitality and rich in possibilities for future development." In the Post, the reviewer commented on her early nervousness and added that she "gradually arrived at a period of brilliant playing. There was marked skill at technique; she was spirited and intelligent in her interpretation."

Gigli Sings in Benefit Concert

Making his first New York concert appearance of the season, Beniamino Gigli appeared in the ballroom of the Hotel Astor for the benefit of the Students' Loan Fund of Barnard College on March 5. He was assisted by Rosa Low, soprano. Vito Carnevali accompanied Mr. Gigli and Miss Low's accompaniments were played by Ina Grange.

According to the Times, Mr. Gigli was "in good voice and excellent disposition" and the Sun reviewer said he "sang with his familar beauty of tone and excellent skill."

Erna Rubinstein—Philharmonic

At the concert given by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg conducting, in Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 8, Erna Rubinstein, as soloist, played Beethoven's D major violin Concerto. Mr. Mengelberg also offered Schubert's Rosamunde music, and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben.

The writer in the World wrote that not only did Miss Rubinstein "attack the technical difficulties with fine confidence, but she succeeded in bringing out the vigor and nobility inherent in the work. . . . Her tone is powerful and assured, erring occasionally on the side of sharpness." The Post reviewer found "a marked improvement in technique and feeling" in her work and prophesied that she "is on her way to great things."

According to the Sun, "much of her tone had beauty and she threw off the technical difficulties of the music with ease. Her intonation was, for the most part, good and her trills were excellent. In her style her reading was a serious one, but it lacked the breadth of poetic conception which gives distinction." In the Times she was commended for "sincerity and charm" although she lacked sufficient maturity for the work. Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail thought her interpretation "tame and settled."

Lawrence Gilman wrote in the Herald Tribune that Miss Rubinstein played "very creditably." Mr. Gilman also commented that Mr. Guidi's playing of the solo violin part in Ein Heldenleben "was of rare taste and loveliness" and that "Mr. Jaenicke wrapped himself in glory by his delivery of the nerve-racking part for the solo horn."

The fourth pair of children's concerts of the orchestra given on March 7 under the direction of Ernest Schelling emphasized the brass instruments of the orchestra. On the program were a Saint-Saens romance, the horn quartet from Der Freischutz, Schumann's Traume, the overture to Mignon, part of Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker Suite, and Grieg's Peer Gynt.

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 W. 156th St. N. Y. City
Billings 1593

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. New York City
Telephone Circle 8815

GRADOVA
"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

M U Z I O
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

FORREST
L A M O N T
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

VIRGINIA CARRINGTON THOMAS MUS. BAC. A. A. G. O.
AMERICAN ORGANIST AND COMPOSER
RECITALS ADDRESS: 516 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

FLORENCE MACBETH
Leading Coloratura Soprano Chicago Civic Opera Company

EFREM ZIMBALIST
EMINENT VIOLINIST
Victor Records
Steinway Piano
EXCLUSIVE MANAGEMENT S. HUROK, Inc., Aeolian Hall
New York

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

Philadelphia Orchestra

Under the baton of Leopold Stokowski the Philadelphia Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, New York, last Tuesday night played Purcell's short Trumpet Prelude, Bach's Suite in B minor for strings and flute, Gluck's Ballet Suite (arranged by Mottl), and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade.

W. M. Kincaid, solo flute of the orchestra, played the flute obbligato in the Bach Suite "with superlatively fine art" (W. J. Henderson of the Sun). According to Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) the listener was impressed with new wonder at the "ravishing art" he displayed. Olin Downes of the Times mentioned the "beautiful tone and finish" with which he played.

The Purcell number was a novelty which Mr. Stokowski found last summer in the library of the British Museum. Mr. Sanborn found it a "breezily gallant rapid march" played in "splendidly rhythmic, buoyant fashion." The Post reviewer considered it "an interesting composition, lusty and stirring, full of brightness." The trumpet parts, according to Mr. Henderson, are written with "bold and confident virtuosity." Lawrence Gilman wrote in the Herald Tribune that "this music is a slice of the more ingenuous Purcell—the Purcell of high spirits and good tunes. He abounded in tunes, melodies that had character, profile, gaiety, irresistible vigor."

Deems Taylor of the World commented that in the Rimsky-Korsakoff work, Mr. Stokowski managed to "retell the tale with dazzling variety, imagination and vividness." The Post chronicler noted that it sounded "more than ever gorgeously rich in color and movement. The tone of the orchestra was amazingly beautiful."

Pianist Offers Modern Music

Hyman Rovinsky gave his third New York piano recital of the season in Aeolian Hall last Tuesday afternoon. His program, the unconventionality of which was remarked by all the reviewers, included first performances of Bartok's Children's Pieces and Tedesco's Viennese Waltz. Other numbers were Chopin's C minor Polonaise, a Gluck Gavotte, the Bach-Busoni Chaconne, Franck's Prelude, Fugue, and Variations, d'Indy's Travel Pictures, Debussy's Sarabande, and de Falla's El Amor Brujo. According to the Herald Tribune, his playing "again was vigorous and clear-cut, stormy in its fortissimo, but with ample shading and lightness of touch."

Friends of Music

At its seventh concert of the season in Town Hall, New York, on March 8, the Society of Friends of Music offered a program made up of three Chinese songs by Bernard Wagenaar, Berlioz's overture and duet from Beatrice et Benedict, excerpts from Smetana's Dalibor, the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn.

Two artists from the Metropolitan Opera, Charlotte Ryan and Marion Telva, sang, and Artur Bodanzy conducted the Metropolitan orchestra. According to the Sun, both singers "deserved praise for their effective vocal efforts" and other reviewers commended their work. Olin Downes of the Times lauded Mr. Bodanzky's "crisp-rhythmed and musicianly reading" of the Brahms, and the Sun writer commented that the music "was read by the orchestra with zeal and effectiveness under Mr. Bodanzky's baton."

This chronicler wrote that Mr. Wagenaar's songs "contained material of much interest and their structure made liberal use of the pentatonic scale. They were delicately colorful, skillfully woven and occasionally achieved moments of real beauty." F. D. Perkins (Herald Tribune) considered them "effective." Miss Ryan sang the songs, and the instrumental accompaniment was afforded by Mr. Wagenaar, at the piano, Nicola Laucella, flutist, and Carlo Sodero, harpist.

Walter Haefliger

A young Swiss pianist, Walter Haefliger, was heard for the first time in New York at the Punch and Judy Theatre on March 8. In the Herald Tribune he was commended for his "vigorous" playing, "marked by considerable technical brilliance." His program included Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein, Paderewski, and Liszt.

The Sun reviewer felt that Mr. Haeflinger "has abilities," but that they were "marred by mannerisms, violent contrasts in mood and color, and a lack of restraint in style and technique. He played with fire, enthusiasm, a great variety of tone color and plenty of genuine sentiment and emotion. But these characteristics were not well directed or disciplined, and the result was uneven and often erratic playing illumined with passages of genuine power."

Mme. Julia Culp

Julia Culp gave her first New York recital of the current season in Town Hall last Tuesday evening. She was accompanied by Coenraad V. Bos in her program which consisted entirely of German Lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Hugo Wolf and Peter Cornelius.

The writer in the Sun said that Mme. Culp's voice was most effective in the songs by Schubert, in which she "infused a warmth and color, a style and delivery altogether delightful" although occasionally her upper notes were harsh. Her program gave opportunity "for the display of the valuable lyrical qualities of Mme. Culp's voice, and musical interpretations of the text that revealed intelligence as well as beauty of tone."

According to the Herald Tribune, the singer's voice showed some signs of strain at first, but warmed up until by the middle of the recital, it was "generally clear, smooth and fluent, giving the singer opportunity for thoroughly effective use of her notable interpretive skill in this medium." The Times reporter mentioned that "a cold interfered considerably with the purity and certainty of her production, but she charmed her hearers by her interpretation, her diction and her command of expression" and added that in the Schumann she "managed her vocal resources with much tact and subtlety."

Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) found her voice strained and her singing far below its best standards of several years ago. Allison Smith of the World wrote that Mme. Culp was in a dramatic mood, if not a soothing one, but that her audience seemed captivated.

Joint Recital at Wanamaker's

A joint recital was given on March 4 in the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York, by Firmin Swinnen, Belgian organist, and Marcel Grandjany, French harpist. According to the Herald Tribune, Mr. Swinnen "gave an impression of thorough competence, taste and expressive ability." Other reviewers did not report the concert in detail.

Maria Mueller—Schorr

Die Meistersinger was repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, February 27, with Maria Mueller singing Eva for the first time here. Friedrich Schorr returned to the role of Sachs. Otherwise the cast was the same as previously, and Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) said Miss Mueller gave "a prettily competent and vocally adequate performance." The writer in the Sun considered she "combined personal charm with musical delivery. . . . Her voice and style are well suited to the music." She "made an excellent impression" on the reviewer in the Herald Tribune, who wrote that she "sang her music admirably." According to Deems Taylor of the World, Miss Mueller looked "delightful" and "acted charmingly," but her voice was "often unable to cope with the orchestra."

In Mr. Taylor's opinion, Mr. Schorr's Sachs "is a creation that grows in mellowness and vocal beauty seemingly with every repetition." The Herald Tribune found him at his best, and the Sun chronicler commented that his Sachs "is well known and deservedly admired." Mr. Peyser remarked that "there is no other part, save possibly Wolfram, which exhibits the mellow beauty of his voice so advantageously or which he embodies with such fine sensitiveness of an attuned temperament."

KA-REN-NI-O-KE
SUMMER MUSIC CAMP
of
CLARENCE ADLER
EMINENT PIANIST
at LAKE PLACID
IN THE ADIRONDACKS
Address
137 WEST 86TH STREET
NEW YORK CITY

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist
Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer Flutist
Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter
527 FIFTH AVE
NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records
Mason & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter
527 FIFTH AVE.
NEW YORK

GUSTLIN
CHICKERING & SONS' PIANO
FOR MUSIC CLUBS SCHOOLS
CONCERT COURSES
AN AMERICAN OPERA INTERP-RECITAL
Repertoire of ten leading American works, analyzed and illustrated.
Piano Solo Groups on each Program.
The success of Mr. Gustlin's present tour promises wide demand for next season. We advise early booking.
BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MANAGEMENT
130 WEST 42nd ST., NEW YORK

Igor Stravinsky Pays Visit to Cincinnati

Takes Place of Reiner for One Concert as Leader of Orchestra.

Cincinnati, March 9.—Local newspaper reviewers were astounded at the applause with which was greeted the appearance of Igor Stravinsky, the Russian modernist composer, as guest conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in a program of his own music.

"It was Stravinsky the composer, Stravinsky the man and Stravinsky the conductor who were responsible for the upheaval," in the opinion of Samuel T. Wilson in the Commercial-Tribune. He continued that if the hearer found this composer's music difficult to understand it was because of a "denseness" in the hearer.

Mr. Reiner's share in the glory of the afternoon was evident in the response of the orchestra to their guest leader, was the accepted opinion.

Mrs. Smith of the Times-Star wrote: "Mr. Stravinsky is a genius." His "personal vogue" and "the verve of the orchestra" received her commending notice, and the Scherzo Fantastique (following the Stravinsky arrangement of the Volga Boat Song, which opened the program) impressed this writer as "utterly charming."

Mr. Goldenburg of the Enquirer said, "It is Igor Stravinsky the composer that is most interesting to the critic and musician;" he "breaks established rules . . . but with authority." The Fire Bird, Mr. Goldenburg thought, was the "most agreeable composition,"

JOHN CORIGLIANO
Whose Playing With the St. Louis Orchestra Under Rudolph Ganz Strengthened His Position as One of the Leading Younger Violinists.

adding his conviction that "we are indebted to Stravinsky for his striking work." He praised the splendid results drawn from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Plogstedt recorded in the Post in part that "a matinee audience (in Cincinnati) on its feet cheering and calling 'Bravo!' is a most unusual sight."

Pulchinella, The Fire Bird and Petrouchka divided honors among the critics' comments, but Mrs. Plogstedt thought the pinnacle of the concert was The Fire Bird, a "ravishing suite."

Mr. Reiner's strenuous work this season with the orchestra received keen appreciation on all sides.

B. G.

RODERICK
WHITE

An American Violinist whose artistic achievements are commanding merited recognition, as the following comments on his New York recital, February 5, 1925, indicate.

New York Times: "Mr. White gave a serious performance, marked by taste and thorough technical competence."

New York American: "A fine scholarly sense of values in dramatic expression and a technical proficiency of more than passing brilliance. He played the Mozart Sonata with haunting and limpid quality and precise intonation."

New York Sun: "His bowing was firm, his technic clean and sharply outlined, and the work (Glazounow Concerto) as a whole was played with a fine regard for its form and structure."

SEASON 1925 - 1926 NOW BOOKING

Management: M. H. HANSON 437 Fifth Ave. New York City

Musical Chicago En Courant

Report Civic Opera Tour Successful; Trip Closes in Milwaukee; Varied Recitals.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, March 10.

THE Chicago Civic Opera Company is near the completion of its eight weeks' tour. The last performance will take place next Sunday in Milwaukee. "Daddy" Shaw, manager of the tour, stopped off on his way to Milwaukee in advance of the company, long enough to announce that the tour was a "whale" of a success, with especially big business in the South.

With the rather limited repertoire used by the company while on tour, unfortunately, the entire strength of the personnel is not apparent. A number of artists elected to utilize those valuable eight weeks in filling concert engagements. Madame Louise Homer, who appeared in guest performances with the opera during the past season, is one of those engaged in concertizing. Tito Schipa also elected to sing in concert rather than to tour. Florence Macbeth is joining the company for a performance in Cincinnati and will accompany it to Milwaukee for the closing Rigoletto of the trip.

CLAUDIA MUZIO is another artist who confined her spring activities to recitals. Her recent attack of the flu forced her to cancel fifteen concerts on the coast. She recovered in time, however, to fill her engagement to sing here for the Catholic Women's Club last Wednesday night in a benefit concert for the Roof Playground Fund of De Paul Settlement.

Mme. Muzio is sailing soon for Paris where she will sing three performances of Aida in ten days. From there she will go to Monte Carlo to sing several roles with the Monte Carlo company. She will return to this country in time to illumine San Francisco's brief season, and come back to Chicago for the twelve weeks of opera here. Looks like a good year for Muzio.

VICE-PRESIDENT Dawes and Carrie Jacobs Bond would seem to have a bond in common. Both have inadvertently composed popular tunes which bid fair to follow them to their respective graves. Mrs. Bond speaks feelingly of years of dodging her most remunerative tune, The End of a Perfect Day, and General Dawes finds his soulful little Melody in A Major, first popularized by Fritz Kreisler, dogging his very footsteps. Perhaps the royalties accrued will help out the vice-presidential salary.

Inauguration day was marked in Chicago by a concert by the Hawthorne Club of the Western Electric Company. Victor Grabel's Inaugural March, dedicated to Calvin Coolidge, was officially presented to the public by the club band under the direction of the composer. The program included singing by the men's glee club, the women's chorus, and solos by the local basso, Herbert Gould, Cimera Jaroslav, trombonist, and Margaret Sweeney, harpist.

A VERY young artist appeared as soloist at the orchestra's Children's concert on Thursday. Little Miss Verlye Davis boasts only twelve years, but a large acquaintance with the technic of the harp. Mr. Tramonti, harpist of the orchestra, was much more perturbed than his young pupil when the inevitable occurred and a string snapped. Verlye calmly asked Mr. Stock to stop the orchestra, and in a most business like manner replaced the string and continued her number, the Dubois' Fantasy, to the great delight of the children and grown ups in the audience.

Rachmaninoff entertained the usual thousands at the Auditorium on Sunday in a program that ranged from Beethoven to himself. The audience would not let him go until he had added one of his famous preludes, that in G minor.

Alberto Sciarretti, a pianist new to Chicago, appeared at the Studebaker in a program largely of Italian works. Instead of the usual Bach and Mozart, he played a Frescobaldi Toccata and Fugue, as transcribed from the organ by Respighi, and a group of ancient works by Scarlatti.

THAT energetic young organization known as the Chicago String Quartet offered a novelty on its last program of the season in a performance of the largo from Haba's Quartet in Quarter Tones. A year ago it had been used by them to illustrate a talk on modern music by Frederick Stock at the Fortnightly Club. Be it added that the performance on Sunday did not sound as queer as the title implies, although the movement was short enough to have borne repetition.

Two of the youngest and most popular members of the Symphony Orchestra, Jacques Gordon and Alfred Wallenstein, appeared as soloists on last week's programs, playing the Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and cello.

The program throughout was a rare treat, including Berlioz's Le Carnaval Romain, a first performance of Maurice Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso, and that tour de force of the Chicago orchestra, the Tschaikowsky Fourth, which turns the orchestra into a solo organization in the brilliant Scherzo. It has long been Mr. Stock's custom to lay down his baton during this movement and let the orchestra go it alone.

THE Florence Nightingale chorus from the school of nursing of the Presbyterian Hospital gave its annual concert on Tuesday night under the direction of John W. Norton. Arthur Boardman and Mina Hager assisted in solos for tenor and contralto. The concert was for the benefit of the endowment fund of the school.

The Edison Symphony Orchestra prefaced its monthly movie at Orchestra Hall by a program under the direction of Morgan Eastman. Belle Forbes Cutter was soloist in two songs by Oley Speaks.

CLARA CLEMENS, contralto, daughter of Mark Twain and wife of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, announces a series of seven historical recitals to take place on seven consecutive Tuesdays at Kimball hall. The series is divided into folk song, classical song, Scandinavian and Finnish songs and Brahms; French and Russian songs, modern Italian, English, and Russian songs. Isaac Van Grove will supply accompaniments.

Varied Music Offered Chicago

Claudia Muzio, Rachmaninoff, Sciarretti and Orchestra Heard; Quartet Plays Quarter-Tone Piece.

Chicago, March 10.—Musical attractions of unusual variety were Chicago's portion last week. Among the artists heard in recital were Claudia Muzio, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alberto Sciarretti, Esther Lundy Newcomb, Dorothy Bell, Mildred Orne, Earl Karduz, and Anna Hanschmann.

In addition there was the Chicago Symphony Orchestra concert, with Jacques Gordon and Alfred Wallenstein as soloists; the children's concert of the Orchestra with Verlye Davis as soloist; the Chicago Quartet; a recital by the various musical organizations of the Hawthorne Club; and the Florence Nightingale Chorus with Nina Hager and Arthur Boardman as soloists.

Claudia Muzio sang in Orchestra Hall March 3 under the auspices of the Edgewater Catholic Women's Club for the benefit of the roof playground of the De Paul settlement. According to the Herald Examiner, she was "as fresh in voice and blithe in spirit" as ever; "a striking figure of opera, she is no less imposing in the more intimate contact and greater exactions of the concert hall." Karleton Hackett wrote in the Post that Mme. Muzio sang the Italian songs "with tone of sustained beauty, but there was not the imaginative force which makes her operatic creations so interesting . . . But she contented herself with just singing the tones, always smoothly and with lovely quality yet without the finer shades of meaning." She was accompanied by Gavin Williamson.

The admirers of Rachmaninoff filled the Auditorium to capacity Sunday. The reviewers, as well as the public, applauded the pianist with customary enthusiasm. As Edward Moore expressed it in the Tribune, "as the years go on Rachmaninoff's playing grows bigger and more human at the same time." Chopin, Beethoven, and Godowsky's transcription of the Strauss Artist's Life Waltz made up his program.

* * *

Alberto Sciarretti played early Italian music by Frescobaldi and Scarlatti at his piano recital the same day. Mr. Moore found him "alert and agile and the possessor of some first rate notions about how to play music of this order." In the opinion of Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald-Examiner, in these works, his piano "was the source of tone of great smoothness, the medium for display of facility that had grace and charm."

* * *

A joint recital was given Wednesday by Esther Lundy Newcomb, soprano, and Dorothy Bell, harpist. Mr. Gunn commended Mrs. Newcomb "for a voice of great natural charm" and Edward Moore agreed, adding that she also had "a considerable idea of how to interpret songs." According to Mr. Hackett, she sang with "appreciation for the music and interpretative force." Maurice Rosenfield (News) said she had a voice of "exquisite" quality which she used "with fine musical instinct and with artistic intelligence. Her voice had quality and color and also a wide range."

Mr. Rosenfeld commented that Miss Bell played "with an appreciation for the older style of musical art." According to Mr. Hackett, she "brought variety of tone quality from the harp," and Mr. Moore found her "both agile and able." Mr. Gunn wrote that "Miss Bell showed a fine technical command of her instrument."

* * *

To quote Mr. Moore, at her recital Sunday, Mildred Orne's "cool accurate voice was attractive." He added that "she sings well, if not emotionally." Mr. Gunn said she sang charmingly, although her voice has slight volume and "is rarely attractive in color." He praised her enunciation and mentioned that "she seemed to have mastered much of the art of narrative in song."

* * *

Earl Kardux, tenor, and Anna Hanschmann, pianist, opened the ninth season of the Young American Artist series Thursday in the Fine Arts recital hall. Maurice Rosenfeld found Mr. Kardux possessed "a pleasant, if small, tenor voice of well developed lyric quality and with a style that denoted an understanding for the older song literature." Mr. Gunn wrote that his "was a pleasant lyric voice of slight power," and commended his enunciation. This writer noted that Miss Hanschmann played "with a rarely sensitive appreciation of tone values, and with neat and workmanlike technique." Mr. Rosenfeld agreed that she displayed "musical refinement and an easy flowing technique."

* * *

The program conducted by Frederick Stock at the Symphony concert included Brahms' A minor Concerto for violin and cello, played by Mr. Wallenstein and Mr. Gordon, members of the orchestra. Both artists were heartily applauded for what Mr. Rosenfeld called their "exemplary interpretation" of the work. They were lauded by other reviewers. The novelty was Ravel's Alborado del Gracioso, which Mr. Moore found characterized by a "brilliant, lilting, humorous impudence." According to Mr. Hackett it was "sprightly in thought and graceful in expression—highly colored and rhythmically charming."

A twelve year old harpist, Verlye Davis, was the soloist at the children's concert. Mr. Rosenfeld found she played with technical proficiency, a manner that suggested musical talent, and a taste for tone shading."

* * *

The Chicago String Quartet played the Largo from Alois Haba's Quartet in Quarter Tones. To Mr. Moore the effect at times was that the artists were playing out of tune, and Mr. Gunn could not discover in the work "melody, thematic idea, pattern, logic."

At the Hawthorne Club concert, Victor J. Grabel conducted, among other things, his Inaugural March, dedicated to President Coolidge. There was a man's chorus and woman's chorus, directed respectively by J. Edwin Petersen and P. E. Claxton. The soloists were Herbert Gould, basso, Jaroslav Cimera, trombonist, and Margaret Sweeney, harpist. According to Mr. Gunn the band "is one of the best amateur organizations" he has heard. The choruses also received laudatory notices in the press.

* * *

Under the direction of John W. Norton, the Florence Nightingale Chorus gave its annual concert last Tuesday. Mme. Hager, contralto, according to Karleton Hackett, sang with "interpretative force" although her voice was not in its best form. He thought that Mr. Boardman's voice was "mellow, under good control, and he brought out the meaning of the words."

SUMMER SCHOOL JUNE 2nd TO AUGUST 15th

for ARTISTS, TEACHERS, and STUDENTS

LA FORGE - BERÚMEN STUDIOS

FRANK LA FORGE

Teacher of LAWRENCE TIBBETT, Composer-Pianist. Vocal coaching. Program building. Classes in accompanying and Piano (Leschetizky).

© G. Maillard Kesslere.

ERNESTO BERÚMEN

Concert Pianist and Pedagogue. Specializing in Interpretation and technique.

ARTHUR KRAFT

Concert tenor. Voice culture. Oratorio and Recitals.

Recitals will be given at Aeolian Hall in connection with the Duo-Art Piano as well as Recitals in the spacious studios

ARTIST SINGERS, PIANISTS AND ACCOMPANISTS AVAILABLE FOR CONCERT

For information address: ELLSWORTH BELL, Secretary

14 West 68th Street, New York City Telephone: Trafalgar 8993

THE MUSICAL DIGEST

AN ANXIOUS MOMENT in the life of Isolde . . . as portrayed by Nanny Larsen-Todsen.

PHOTO - T.C. KNIGHT, N.Y.

AT EA
Guiom cast
Charle
Mrs.
"listen
Menge

PHOTO - BAIN NEWS SERVICE N.Y.

A SOPRANO A
Axmans enjo
among her bo

A M
Con
Com talk

PHOTO — MISHKIN N.Y.

ORGANISTS are not always serious . . . Virginia Carrington Thomas and her husband, Richard Banks Thomas, snapped at the Beaux Arts Ball.

PHOTO - MISHKIN, N.Y.

IT IS OF GOLD LACE, shimmering in four shades, this striking costume of Jeanne Gordon.

PHOTO - UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD N.Y.

HE SANG TO EXP
when his New Yor honor recently.

TWO PETS has Frances Nash and both appear to be well-tem

PICTORIAL SECTION

D OF THE AIR: es about to broad- VJZ . . . Mrs. nggenheimer and M. Alexander guests of Willem

THE PRIZE of the Prize Song: Elisabeth Rethberg poses as Eva in The Meistersingers.

E: Gladys iet hour

PHOTO MISHKIN, N.Y.

E IN QUESTION: ullio Serafin and Italo Montemezzi

PHOTO - UNITED NEWS PICTURES, INC. N.Y.

CONGRATULATIONS for Esther Dale who assisted in the capture of Mme. d'Alvarez's impersonator.

thanks, did Tito Schipa, gave this dinner in his

PHOTO - LUMIERE, N.Y.

THE THREE MUSICTEERS of the New York Trio: Clarence Adler, Cornelius Van Vliet and Louis Edlin.

PHOTO - MISHKIN STUDIOS, N.Y.

ALEXIS KOSLOFF adds many amusing touches to Coq d'Or pantomiming His Majesty.

On The Music Highway

FRANCES NASH played with the newly organized Omaha Symphony Orchestra at Omaha, Neb., on March 11 at the final concert of the Symphony's first season. The concert was given under the auspices of the Women's Division of the Omaha Chamber of Commerce, of which Grace Rowland is president. It was this organization that was responsible for the launching of the orchestra.

Included on Joyce Bannerman's tour of the Middle West is an appearance in Indianapolis on April 20.

Mary Allen, soprano, will make her first appearance in her home city, Detroit, when she sings in Elijah with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

On March 1 Abby Morrison, soprano, was soloist with the MacDowell Club in Springfield, Mass.

Following the completion of his American tour, Marcel Grandjany, French harpist, returned to Canada for two engagements before his return to France to take up his work at Fontainebleau for the summer. M. Grandjany plans to return to this country next November.

The Norfleet Trio, which is at present appearing in Middle Western States, spent February in the South, giving concerts in North Carolina, Georgia, and Texas.

The New York String Quartet will appear in Elyria, O., on March 23 and in St. Louis on March 26. This will be the third consecutive year in which this organization has played in St. Louis.

On April 23 John Coates, English Lieder singer, will make his American debut in a recital of Shakespeare's songs at Town Hall, New York. Mr. Coates is appearing in America under the management of Loudon Charlton.

Ethyl Hayden, as soloist of the Cincinnati Festival, which is scheduled for the week of May 4, will be heard in both oratorio and operatic numbers. She will sing in Bach's St. John's Passion; in Pierne's St. Francis of Assisi; in the Brahms Requiem; also the role of Elizabeth in the third act of Tannhaeuser, and of Eva in the third act of Die Meistersinger.

Miss Hayden has already sung in the Brahms Requiem with the New York Oratorio Society, and is engaged for performance of the work with the Harvard Glee Club in April.

Vera Jachles, a Russian pianist new to New York, will make her debut at Town Hall on Tuesday evening, March 24.

Emma Roberts, contralto, was soloist with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra March 15.

Mario Chamlee, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appears in recital in Chicago Sunday afternoon, March 29. Some of his appearances immediately before this recital include concerts in Fort Worth, Texas, and Oklahoma City.

Claire Dux is to give a recital in Lowell, Mass., on March 31.

A tour for the entire State of Florida is being arranged for Caryl Bensel for next season, following her successful appearances there this season

Frieda Hempel announces her only recital of the season at Carnegie Hall, New York, Wednesday evening, March 25, just before leaving for her tour of the Pacific Coast. She will give an entire popular program, which includes operatic arias from I Puritani and The Daughter of the Regiment. Coenraad V. Bos will be at the piano and Louis P. Fritze the assisting flutist.

Ralph Errolle, the new tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be one of the members to go on the annual spring tour of that organization, during which he will appear in Atlanta, Ga., and Cleveland, O. While on tour Mr. Errolle will fill a number of individual engagements, including a recital in Rock Hill, S. C., on April 24, and a performance of Faust in concert form at Hartford, Conn., on May 5.

Edgar Schofield is appearing tomorrow in Bethlehem, Pa., in joint recital with Frances Callow, harpist. He has been engaged also for two joint appearances with Mildred Dilling at the University of Alabama on March 28, and at Gulf Park College, Gulfport, Miss., on March 30.

Cecil Arden of the Metropolitan Opera Company has been engaged by Arthur M. Oberfelder for a series of recitals next season on the Pacific Coast.

The Goldberg Variations of Bach will have what probably is their first public performance in this country tomorrow evening when James Friskin will play them in their entirety at his recital in Aeolian Hall. These variations are thirty in number and average a trifle more than a minute each in length. They were written by Bach for his pupil, Johann Gottlieb Goldberg, at the request of Count Kaiserling, and include nine short canons, a fughetta, and a fugue.

Sophie Braslau is to be heard in Sharon, Pa., on March 18 and in Harrisburg on March 19. Then Miss Braslau goes South, appearing in Pineville, La., on March 30. Miss Braslau's recital in Chicago this season will take place early in April instead of this month, as previously announced.

Elizabeth Gutman gave a costume recital for children at the Goucher College Auditorium in Baltimore on Saturday afternoon, February 28, for the benefit of the Goucher fund.

Laura Stroud, young American pianist, who made her New York debut this season, reappears at Aeolian Hall this afternoon. Her program on this occasion includes Beethoven's D major Sonata, Op. 10, No. 3, a group of Chopin, and works by Bach, Brahms, Debussy, Liszt and Rachmaninoff.

Singing the title role in Madama Butterfly, Mme. Helen Stanley will be heard again with the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company Thursday.

Wilderness, a piece for string quartet by A. D. R. Sullivan, had its first hearing on March 2 in the Criterion Theatre, New York, where it was played by Josiah Zuro and four members of the Sunday Symphonic Society, Drago Jovanovitch, Leo Trebacz, William Kautzenbach, and Harry Rabinowitch. The composition is one of those chosen by Mr. Zuro in his American composers' contest.

The Brooklyn Orchestral Society, composed of business and professional men of the borough, aided by members of professional New York orchestras, gave its second public concert of the season last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the leadership of Herbert J. Braham. Anna Fitziu was the soloist.

The Sunday night concert at the New York Metropolitan on March 8 consisted of the presentation in concert form of Cavalleria Rusticana and excerpts from La Forza del Destino, Butterfly, Africana and Tannhaeuser. Mmes. Peralta, Mario, Wakefield and Anthony, and Messrs. Schorr, Tokatyan and Picco sang, and Giuseppe Bamboschek conducted.

The Elshuco Trio and the Festival Quartet of South Mountain gave the seventh concert in their cycle of Brahms chamber music in Aeolian Hall, New York, on March 6. The program was made up of the string quintet in F major and G major, and the D minor Sonata for piano and violin, played by Hugo Kortschak and Aurelio Giorni.

Competing with the glee clubs of Syracuse University, Missouri, Wisconsin, Fordham, Columbia, Harvard, Middlebury, N. Y. U., Penn State, Wesleyan, Princeton, Dartmouth, and Amherst the Yale singing organization won the ninth annual intercollegiate glee club contest at Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening of March 7. Ralph Baldwin, Arthur Bodanzky, and Kurt Schindler were the judges. Princeton, Dartmouth, and Missouri came next in order.

Josef Hofmann, pianist, is planning once more to spend the summer abroad at his summer home in Switzerland, sailing for Europe sometime in May. Mr. Hofmann has been engaged to make a number of appearances in Great Britain in the early fall and will return to the United States to begin his next American tour on November 9.

Bernard Wagenaar's Chinese Songs, which had a first hearing last year at the MacDowell Club, when they were interpreted by Louise Stallings, were included in the program of the concert of the Friends of Music in Town Hall, New York, a week ago Sunday. Charlotte Ryan sang them on this occasion.

JOSEPH SCHWARZ
BARITONE
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA CO
Management
Edna Nicholson Sovitt
501 Oakdale Ave., Chicago
KIMBALL PIANO

RATA PRÉSENT
Pianiste of Re-Engagements
Management of Rata Present: Hotel Ansonia, New York City
AMPICO RECORDS

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones
Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

Fleta
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

Anton BILOTTI Pianist
Management: Lionel Powell & Holt, London, England
Steinway Piano
Welte-Mignon Records Exclusively

Sensational in Opera Triumphant in Concert
Jeritza
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
Sole management Metropolitan Musical Bureau Aeolian Hall New York City
Knabe Piano
Victor Records

A Conductor in Milan

A Conversation With Ettore Panizza, Leader of La Scala, Touching on Many Musical Subjects.

by FEDERICO CANDIDA

Milan.

IT IS five o'clock in the afternoon, the hour when most Milanese are at their tea. In La Scala, however, they are working continually. A solitary spectator, I wait for Maestro Ettore Panizza to bring his rehearsal to a close. The voice of the orchestra rises and falls, the conductor speaks to his musicians as they play. On the stage Hansel and Gretel have lost their way in the forest. At last the rehearsal ends, and Maestro Panizza appears in the doorway of the stall in which I have been sitting. . . .

My first question was concerning the Scala leader's health, for several evenings ago he was forced for awhile to relinquish his baton during a performance of Mefistofele because of illness.

"I am quite well now," replied Maestro Panizza. "My illness of the other evening has entirely passed off. It was nothing serious, but the news of it seems to have crossed the ocean, for I received several cablegrams asking about myself.

"In fact, I had a headache the night of the Mefistofele, and to relieve my pain I took a dose of pyramidon. It suddenly gave me some moments of severe suffering during the performance. I could have put the conducting of the opera in the hands of one of the substitute leaders, but Maestro Toscanini, after having helped me to my room, kindly volunteered himself to lead the performance until I was better. After an act I was able to return to my stand. Incidentally I think that this is the first time that an opera has been conducted by two leaders in a single evening at La Scala."

Maestro Panizza turned his attention, in response to my questions, to his experiences in America, where he conducted at the Chicago Opera the two seasons before this present one. "I really enjoyed my stay in Chicago immensely," he said, "but it was unfortunate that it should have turned out so badly." He was referring to the death of his wife during the voyage back to Italy.

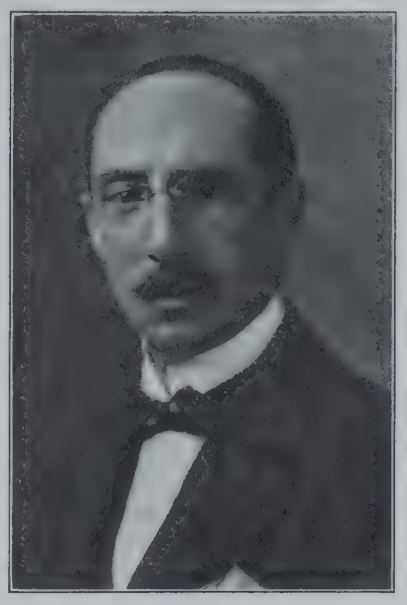
"I have unforgettable memories regarding America. The activity of the country, the immense variety of its pursuits, its vast productive and intellectual energy! These will always remain in my mind.

"My experiences there included some of the greatest artistic satisfactions which I have ever had. Of course in the front rank of my pleasures stands the playing of my symphonic poem for chorus and orchestra at the Auditorium. Then, besides, I conducted my own Variations when it was played by Mr. Stock's Chicago Orchestra. I shall never forget the cordiality with which that remarkable man and musician treated me during my stay in Chicago. As for the orchestra, everyone by now knows its superb qualities, just as everyone knows of the general high standard of orchestral playing in all the large cities of the United States."

This called to mind comparisons with the orchestra of La Scala. "They are all of the front rank," was all that Maestro Panizza would say. "Our own orchestra," he continued, "is indeed large for a theatre. We have sixty-three strings and a full measure of winds and percussion. In the operas of Wagner and Strauss our personnel reaches 110 musicians. The best that can be said is that our orchestra is worthy of the rest of the theatre.

"Being a resident in Milan and a lover of music, you know in what light we of La Scala regard its productions. Our love of opera is like religion, and we indulge in it always with the utmost seriousness. If the management, for example, should find in rehearsal that the ensemble effect of an opera which is being prepared cannot be brought up to our highest standard, it would not hesitate to call off the opera until comparative perfection in every detail should be possible.

"That was what happened this year with Trovatore. Some of the details of the production were excellent, but certain qualities that Maestro Toscanini thought necessary were lacking. Although rehearsals had proceeded considerably, he called off the presentation of Trovatore for the season, and that was all there was to it."



ETTORE PANIZZA

Maestro was quite willing to talk over the intentions of the management of La Scala regarding next season's productions. "Of course," he said, "we shall give Turandot. Then we are going to put on the entire Ring cycle of Wagner in its correct order, just as they are doing this season at the Metropolitan in New York. That will mean the first performance in several seasons of the Rheingold and Goetterdaemmerung. We hope to put on the four Wagnerian works in immediate succession, with nothing intervening.

"Turandot will certainly be an attraction of the first order. Poor Puccini! I spoke with him just as he was leaving for Brussels. He was serene and apparently had no thought of death. His operas can never pass out of the public interest, no matter how much the language of music may change in coming years. His works come directly from the heart, and the human heart never changes from year to year and from place to place.

"This is a time in the history of music in which much is changing in musical idiom," continued Maestro Panizza, going off on another tack. "Sometimes it seems to me an era of chaos. Progress? Decadence? Who can say what is going on? The period is one of unsettlement and revolution, and the music which is written now expresses these moods. Doubtless the future will again bring a measure of surety. It is to be hoped that the individual Russian school of music which has been developing will keep to its own path. In Italy, France and Germany, however, all schools are inter-mixed and inter-reacting, and the result of it all is the music of today."

Maestro Panizza insisted, in reply to a question of mine, that he had no favorites among the operas which he conducted. "Often," he said, "operas which make no impression whatsoever on me on first reading gradually reveal their beauties as I begin to do them more, and they, too, become flesh of my flesh . . . but—I must admit—my greatest satisfactions come from Wagner and from Verdi."

The Scala conductor spoke somewhat of his history in the Italian theatres, of his experiences in England, in North and South America. In Milan he became widely known during his first seasons with the Dal Verme Theatre, to say nothing of his leadership of one important orchestral concert as early as 1908. He is now with La Scala for the fourth season. He has conducted from year to year the leading works in the repertory of the theatre, including Spontini's Fernando Cortez, Mignon, Ernani, Siberia, Elisir, Tosca, Lucrezia Borgia, Segreto di Susanna, Macigno, Parsifal, the Barber, Wally, Quatro Rusteghi, Walkuere, Mefistofele, and others.

The conversation turned to other kinds of music than opera. Maestro Panizza regretted the small number of symphony concerts to be heard in Milan; he spoke of his series of appearances in Turin as soon as the present season is over, of his intentions to return for a time to composition next summer, of many things.

While we talked on the house was darkened. We left the building, La Scala, Europe's leading opera house, and as we walked slowly from it the conversation turned inevitably to the man who has brought this theatre up to its present high level, Arturo Toscanini. Then we parted.

Violist and Pianist Play Together

Under the auspices of the Washington Heights Musical Club an unusual program of music for viola and piano was presented by Edward Kreiner and William Bachaus, guest artist, in Aeolian Hall, New York, last Tuesday.

According to the Herald Tribune, in Hindemith's Sonata, Opus 11, Mr. Bachaus "showed marked skill as an ensemble player, giving a vigorous performance, but never overwhelming the viola part, played with technical dexterity, but a rather dry tone, by Mr. Kreiner." This reviewer continued that "in the melodious, thoroughly conservative Legende from the Sonata by Miklos Radnai, of Budapest, dwelling on the mellower lower notes of the viola, Mr. Kreiner produced a delightfully smooth and rich tone."

Name New Music Library Head

Jefferey Mark, Doctor of Music of the Royal College of Music, has been appointed chief of the music division of the reference department of the New York Public Library. He succeeds Otto Kinkeldey, who left his position last year to become head of the music department of Cornell University.

GRAVEURE

IN

LEADING MUSIC CENTERS

"I do not recollect ever having heard such phrasing, such an interpretation of nobility and poise, and tonal suavity and wonderful control of the mechanical manipulation of the voice.'' (Devries, Chicago Evening American.)

Management:
Metropolitan
Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City

Samaroff

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON

Fisk Building
New York, N. Y.

Pennsylvania Building
Philadelphia, Penn.

VICTOR RED SEAL RECORDS

STEINWAY PIANO

Los Angeles Approves Cortot in Beethoven

French Pianist Plays Emperor Concerto; Rothwell Leads Two Programs.

Los Angeles, March 3.—Alfred Cortot was soloist in Beethoven's Emperor Concerto with the Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell conductor, on Friday afternoon. The novelty of the program was Debussy's La Mer.

Ralph Greene (Examiner) wrote that Mr. Cortot gave a "magnificent" performance. The reviewer in the News thought the Concerto "gave an opportunity for the artist's wonderful skill and expression." Francis Kendig of the Times felt that the work gave but "a very little idea of his real musicianship. . . . Cortot is a splendid artist, and he puts his soul into his playing."

According to Bruno David Ussher of the Express, the pianist's outstanding qualities were "superlative equipment, gripping rhythmic incisiveness and resiliency and, best of all, glorious, truly glorious, tone." In the Record Jose Rodriguez commented that Mr. Cortot gave the Concerto "a workmanlike, routine reading."

Of the Debussy sea sketches, Mr. Greene remarked that "by some subtle magic color and movement are translated into sound." Mr. Ussher wrote that the composer's "color technique is amazing. . . . It is uncanny music, difficult to comment upon, without a definite program. It is bleak, pure and overwhelming in the infinitude of pictures evoked. . . . La Mer once more shows Debussy at his best in instrumental and thematic weaving of infinitesimal threads into a great tapestry." The News reviewer thought them delightful musical pictures, although not particularly vivid.

* * *

Mr. Rothwell arranged an "international" program for the last popular concert, including Grieg's March of Homage, Massenet's Scenes Alsaciennes, Ippolitow-Iwanow's Dans l'Aoule, Spendiarow's Crimean Sketches (first performance here), Goldmark's Negro Rhapsody and the Largo from Dvorak's New World Symphony. Isabella Piana, the soloist, showed "a brilliant, well schooled voice and sang with dramatic warmth," according to the Examiner.

The reviewer in the News mentioned that Mme. Piana had a chance to display "considerable expression, ample volume and a comprehensive range."

Federation Furthers Plans For Portland Convention

Los Angeles, March 8.—Mrs. Cecil Frankel, first vice president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, and chairman of the biennial at Portland, Ore., to be held from June 6 to 12, announces in a special communication to The Musical Digest, that practically the complete cast for The Echo, Frank Patterson's opera scheduled for its premiere during the biennial, has been made up, although the part of Yfel is still to be filled. Forrest Lamont will sing Theudas, Marie Rappold will take the part of Acantha, and Lawrence Tibbett will sing the role of Cunnan. Walter Henry Rothwell, director of the Philharmonic orchestra at Los Angeles, will conduct.

Rehearsals of the ballets are in progress with the Portland Symphony orchestra. Special costumes and scenery are being designed and club executives and members all over the country are busy on details, under Mrs. Frankel's instructions. Mrs. Frankel has been in conference with Mrs. W. E. Thomas, director, at Portland, and final general details and assignments will be concluded soon.

In addition to the opera premiere, features of the convention include the finals of the National contests, which are to be worked out from the various State and district contests now being conducted throughout the United States. This contest will cover young musicians in voice, violin and piano, the State contests taking place between February 15 and March 30; district contests between April 15 and May 5; the finals during the biennial.

Bertha Morena as Isolde

Bertha Morena will make her first appearance of this season at the New York Metropolitan Opera House on April 8 as Isolde, it is reported. She has sung this role in Germany, but never in New York.

Maria Ivogun Heard In New York Concert

In the opinion of Olin Downes of the Times, the songs chosen by Maria Ivogun for her recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 7 "were well selected to the quality of her voice and her tendencies as an interpreter."

Mr. Downes continued that "the voice in most instances was of a singularly beautiful and limpid quality. It was admirably controlled, and when the music was of the most superficial or purely decorative quality it was made interesting by the high intelligence and refinement of the singer's art." This reviewer also commented that Mme. Ivogun's virtuosity did not preclude emotional expression—"her uncommon technical dexterity remains the useful vehicle of musicianship and feeling." Her only fault, according to Mr. Downes, "was a tendency to overinterpret familiar airs."

The writer in the Herald Tribune found her voice "had a notable fluency and smoothness of tone" and added that "there was no departure from steadiness even in the highest notes, which achieved altitudes with an effect of ease and commendable devotion to the pitch. The voice seemed to have gained in volume over earlier seasons. . . . In general, Mme. Ivogun's interpretations were marked by her usual expressive skill." In the Post, her "unusually fine voice," her "spirited singing" and her "splendid range" were mentioned.

The Sun reviewer wrote that her singing gave "much delight," although she was "not at all times in her best vocal condition." He added that her "general understanding of moods and sentiments throughout her list was of very high merit." Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) thought her voice "delightful in tone quality, refined legato, fluent execution and skill in ornament, while now and then it carried an emotional suggestion not always at the behest of florid sopranos." However, Mr. Peyser considered that her diction sometimes was not good.

JOSEF HOFMANN AT HIS STEINWAY

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

From under those miraculous hands a Chopin Nocturne ripples in delicate, lacy perfection. A Liszt Rhapsody becomes a thing of glamour and passion. A shadowy theme from Debussy assumes delectable contours, gleams with cool, floating light. Here speaks the immortal genius of great composers. And here, also, under the touch of a master pianist, speaks the glorious voice of a great instrument—the Steinway. Long ago Hofmann chose the Steinway as the one perfect medium for his art. Rachmaninoff knows how exquisitely it interprets a subtle nuance or a profound emotion. Paderewski knows how magnificently it responds to his imperious demands. Levitzki, Cortot, Grainger, Nikisch,—these are but a few of the celebrated pianists who, if only sincerely artistic motives are involved, invariably choose the Steinway.

To meet the requirements and acoustic conditions of every home, the Steinway is made in numerous styles and sizes. Each embodies all the Steinway principles and ideals. And each returns to those who buy it, not only unending pleasure and delight, but the definite gift of permanence. You need never buy another piano.

*There is a Steinway dealer in your community or near you through whom you may purchase a new Steinway piano with a small cash deposit, and the balance will be extended over a period of two years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange.

Prices: $875 and up

plus transportation

Steinway & Sons, Steinway Hall
109 East Fourteenth Street, New York

Recitals Heard in Philadelphia

London Quartet, Crooks, Hofmann, and Flesch Appear; Mme. Farrar Sings in Carmen.

Philadelphia, March 10.—The London String Quartet played the program in the concert given by the Chamber Music Association in the Bellevue-Stratford Sunday afternoon.

The Public Ledger reviewer commented that "there were so many points of superlative excellence in the rendition of this beautiful program that to expatiate upon them would require unlimited space. . . . But the supreme excellence of the London String Quartet lies rather in the musical personality of its members than in technical achievement or in the things which may be acquired by practice."

Equally enthusiastic was the writer in the North American, and Stanley Muschamp (Inquirer) wrote that "there was a finely performed ensemble at all times." The Record writer remarked that their playing "came as near perfection as any ensemble can hope to approach. There is always a beautiful sympathetic balance of tone. The coloring is varied and interesting, while the accuracy of dynamics continually demonstrates the extent of drill to which the players have evidently submitted themselves."

* * *

Geraldine Farrar presented her "modernized version" of Carmen at the Academy Saturday afternoon, and, to quote the Ledger, "an audience of capacity size, attracted by Miss Farrar's immense popularity as well as her consummate artistry, viewed and heard the performance with every indication of interest and generous approval."

The Ledger reviewer did not think that the condensation of the Bizet opera had added to it, although "scenically and in the dance there are some delightful moments." He wrote that Miss Farrar "is unquestionably an artist of the first rank. . . . She was in fair voice, but acted with spirit and conviction." Emma Noe, as Micaela, sang "with splendid effect."

According to the Bulletin, Miss Farrar acted the part "with skillful animation. Her voice is best in some of the upper-middle tones, where much of its mellow sweetness remains, and the high tones have less of the strident quality than they once had." This writer also commended Miss Noe for her "felicitous rendering in clear, sympathetic soprano tones" of her songs. Others in the cast were Luigi Pasinati, Joseph Royer, Marcel Vision, and Neira Reigger. The ballet consisted of Ruth Laird, Mildred Leisy, Gladys Meredith and Star Woodman. In the words of the Ledger reviewer, Carlo Peroni "conducted admirably."

* * *

The second of a series of recitals by members of the faculty of the Curtis Institute drew a capacity audience to the Academy Foyer Thursday evening. Carl Flesch and Josef Hofmann played a Beethoven program.

As the North American writer put it, their playing was marked by "unusual beauty of tone, of phrasing, and depth of poetic and emotional insight that transforms notes into music" and by an "even perfection." The Record reported that "the most amazing quality of the performance was the perfect manner in which the instruments complemented each other and the exquisite beauty of tonal balance achieved in the ensemble through the three sonatas. Their intellectual adaptability and temperamental versatility enabled them to utilize their gifts in a rarely beautiful manner."

Mr. Muschamp found qualities of "freshness and clarity" in their playing and the Ledger writer thought it a concert "of surpassing beauty."

* * *

Richard Crooks, tenor, was heard here Tuesday as guest artist with the Matinee Musical Club. According to the Ledger, in the English songs "in the subtle phrasing, color, timbre and sympathy the singer left no room for doubting his mastery." The North American chronicler noted that he displayed "a varied range of vocal emotionalism." This writer considered that he sang "with a great delicacy of feeling that gave place to clear enunciation and genuine understanding of the compositions in more intense movements."

In the Record Mr. Crooks was credited with "a voice of natural beauty, clarity and smoothness." The reviewer in the Inquirer wrote that his voice "is a tenor of unusual loveliness of quality, which quality extends the entire gamut of its range. There is simple directness in his singing that makes a strong appeal." Others assisting on the program were Blanche V. Hubbard, Ruth M. Barber, Josephine Gemberling, Elizabeth Gest, and Martha E. Petit.

* * *

Other concerts were given by Zabelle Aram, whose "supple" voice of "Oriental smoothness" was commended in the Ledger; the Manuscript Music Society of Philadelphia, celebrating its thirty-fourth season; the Philadelphia Music Club, conducted by Clarence K. Bawden; and the Civic Junior Symphony Orchestra.

Detroit Passes on Visiting Composer

Detroit, March 9.—Igor Stravinsky was introduced to Detroit last week at the Symphony concert as conductor in the Song of the Volga Boatmen, the Scherzo Fantastique and the Suite from Petrouchka, and as soloist in his new Piano Concerto. Victor Kolar, concertmaster, conducted Mozart's Overture to The Marriage of Figaro and the Concerto in the absence of Mr. Gabrilowitsch.

Writing in the Free Press, Charlotte M. Tarsney commented that "the biting, acrid Piano Concerto, ranked the leading and most individualistic among his recent compositions, has little in common with the melodious shorter pieces . . . the Concerto has a strangely thrilling effect for all of that. The force of the music, the propelling power of its accumulative momentum, could not help but stir its hearers."

W. K. Kelsey wrote in the News that the Concerto "is intellectual, and in a somewhat elemental or barbaric manner, it is dramatic. . . . It is relentless, it is ruthless." According to Ralph Holmes (Times), "it is decidedly a thrilling work if for no other reason than the speed of certain of its passages, the assaulting color of its harmonic structure, the baffling intricacies of its rhythms."

Miss Tarsney wrote that "as a pianist Stravinsky is much more impressive than as a conductor. In the latter capacity he has not the electrifying personality his music would indicate, but his beat is clearly indicated, and each player knows exactly his entrance and the interpretation desired under his baton. Stravinsky knows his orchestra and obtains splendid results, but he is not the sensation he proved as a piano soloist in his new work."

MARJORIE MEYER

Soprano

SCORES SUCCESSES

Impresses Critics and Audiences

"She impressed as a youthful artist with a voice of more than ordinary charm and considerable understanding of the concert hall." Glenn Dillard Gunn, CHICAGO HERALD EXAMINER.

"She is the possessor of an artistic voice and has a fine art of using it. This, backed by her distinct enunciation and charming personality, immediately won her audience." PASSAIC NEWS, N. J.

"Miss Meyer gave a skillful and artistically arranged program. The young lady's voice has ample volume, carrying power and solidity of tone." Herman Devries, CHICAGO AMERICAN.

Four New York Appearances This Season

"She sang with good intonation and with remarkable composure of manner and mood." W. J. Henderson, NEW YORK SUN.

"She has a lyric voice of sweet and unvarying timbre." Olin Downes, NEW YORK TIMES.

"Miss Meyer's program showed a refreshing independence from that Book of Etiquette by which so many singers seem to be guided." F. D. Perkins, NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE.

SEASON 1925-1926 NOW BOOKING

CERTIFIED BY THE MUSICAL DIGEST

Write or Wire for dates and terms

Management: STANDARD BOOKING OFFICE, 17 East 42nd St., New York.

SPALDING

TRIUMPHS PLAYING RESPIGHI'S CONCERTO WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN NEW YORK AND BOSTON

Philip Hale in the Boston Herald:

"Mr. Spalding gave an admirable performance, admirable in every way, technically and aesthetically. He richly deserved the tribute paid him by conductor, orchestra and audience."

The Christian Science Monitor, January 10, 1925:

"Mr. Spalding is one of the very few violinists (if in point of fact not the only one) who ventures to play a new concerto at the Symphony concerts. The quality of Mr. Spalding's playing yesterday was no less fine. Mr. Spalding's playing of the work was flawless, technically and musically as well."

"Albert Spalding, an American violinist deservedly much admired, was cordially applauded by yesterday's Symphony audience both before and after he played the solo part in Respighi's new 'Gregorian Concerto.' Mr. Spalding, a fine musician and therefore bored by mere show pieces, has sought diligently and successfully on more than one occasion for new pieces. The performance was a beautiful example of controlled and intense emotion from Mr. Spalding and the orchestra. He is a really great violinist." (Boston Globe, January 10, 1925.)

"Albert Spalding, the foremost American violinist, is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. He received an ovation after his brilliant performance in Respighi's 'Gregorian Concerto' at yesterday's matinee. His was not merely a technical triumph, flashing and dazzling. His interpretative power was equally impressive.

"It was indeed a pleasure to see a native born artist fairly sharing honors with the famous Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky."—Boston Advertiser, January 10, 1925 (E. F. Harkins).

Deems Taylor in the New York World, March 13, 1925:

"Mr. Spalding played it with deep sincerity, and with such tenderness and beauty of tone, such fine authority and spaciousness of style as I have seldom heard him or any other violinist display. It was a performance thrillingly worthy of the music, and one that fully deserves the adjective 'masterly'."

Olin Downes in the New York Times, March 13, 1925:

"As for Mr. Spalding, he played in a way that displayed to the full his admirable accomplishments as violinist and musician. Very few players of whom we know have a tone of such unfailing beauty on all of the strings, a tone of such warmth and texture that it leaves no expressive capacity of the instrument untouched. Then there is the authority and the breadth of style which Mr. Spalding has gained gradually with the passing years. The performance impressed the audience; no doubt it would have gratified the composer."

F. D. Perkins in the New York Herald Tribune, March 13, 1925:

"The soloist was Albert Spalding, who has been serving as the herald of Ottorino Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano. The violinist gave an excellent performance, with his usual technical finish and beauty of tone."

W. J. Henderson in the Evening Sun, March 13, 1925:

"Mr. Spalding played it with so much beauty of tone and such exaltation of feeling that he vitalized it from beginning to end. The cadenza which forms the bridge passage between the first and second movements is particularly effective in its use of the low register of the violin. Mr. Spalding's tone here was especially beautiful, though it was excellent always."

Paul Morris in the Evening World, March 13, 1925:

"Mr. Spalding unquestionably is in the first rank of violinists. He made his playing comply with the underlying religious spirit of the themes. There is nothing showy about this music, and Mr. Spalding's playing of it was always artistically restrained, dignified and all but perfect in a technical sense."

Irving Weil in the New York Evening Journal, March 13, 1925: "Spalding's Superb Fiddling"

"The chief factor in the success and effectiveness of the performance of the piece was Mr. Spalding. There was a splendid dash about the way the violinist played his part of the music, and a thoroughly well grasped knowledge of what the fiddle was expected to say. His tone was rich and alive."

Pitts Sanborn in the New York Telegram and Evening Mail, March 13, 1925:

"Albert Spalding's fine and devoted playing of the Respighi won proper recognition."

The New York Evening Post, March 13, 1925:

'Mr. Spalding gave a characteristically finished interpretation of a composition which supplied ample opportunity for a display of his mastery of the violin."

H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript:

"Never was applause more certain and not a little of it was of right for Mr. Spalding. He plays Concertos from living pens. He also played Respighi's violin-part with a mingling of songful sweetness and graver austerity; of reticence without and exaltation within that transfigured the Concerto beyond desert. Mr. Spalding studied in Italy and there gained a fine-strung, lustrous sweetness of tone. Mr. Spalding has become a serious, sensitive, studious, finely touched musician. The Spalding of the younger and the elder day met matured in the Concerto and to its greater glory."

Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post: "Spalding's Masterly Playing a Feature"

"It is high time Mr. Spalding was hailed as a violinist of the first importance. Indeed, had he first come to us from Russia or from Bohemia it is altogether likely that his name would long ago have been one with which managers might conjure.

"A musician of serious aims and of high ideals, Mr. Spalding has in the main elected to identify himself with unfamiliar music of interest rather than to be party to the ten-millionth performance of a concerto of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, or Saint-Saens. Thus on the occasion of his last appearance with our Symphony Orchestra he introduced to us the Concerto of Dohnanyi, while yesterday he was responsible for the Boston premiere of that of Respighi.

"That Mr. Spalding's playing of a concerto which nowhere truckles to popular favor should have received the acclaim bestowed upon it yesterday, is token not only of the innate worth of the music but also of the mastery, the fine fervor, the musicianly insight of his performance of it."

Available Next Season for Concert Dates

Management:

WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU, Inc.

250 West 57th Street New York City

STEINWAY PIANO

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:

J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Berlin Takes Over Opera House

Municipality Puts Bankrupt Organization on Its Feet; a New Composition by Krenek.

Berlin.

The German Opera House, which recently went into bankruptcy, has been put on its feet again. The city council of Berlin decided to step into the breach, and has taken over the house, orchestra, chorus, and the ensemble.

The fact remains that the music public of Berlin, despite the population of some four million inhabitants which the city claims, is not sufficient to maintain three active opera houses without a deficit. Two of the opera houses of the German capital are now in the hands of the state, and the third is the property of the municipality of Berlin.

That is as it should be, for it has been proved here time and again that only those opera houses can prosper which are aided substantially by the Government.

Management Undecided

The question as to who is to reign in the resurrected theatre has not yet been settled. It seems that the present manager of the Breslau Opera has the best chance, although the stage manager of the Berlin State Opera is making a strong bid for the position. Leo Blech and Bruno Walter are also considered as possibilities for the directorship. Either one of these in the managerial office would divide his attention between management and actual conducting of the operas.

One of the most discussed of the first performances of this season was that of Krenek's Concerto Grosso, which had its world premiere under Klemperer's baton at the Philharmonic concerts recently. Herr Pisling, whose reviews of Krenek's music always tend to be favorable, found a new proof of the composer's talent in this composition.

This reviewer is among those—and their number in Berlin is not small—who believe that Krenek is another big figure in music like Stravinsky and Schoenberg. Other writers on music feel that the time is yet premature to decide Krenek's artistic stature.

Professor Weissman wrote of the Concerto Grosso, "It was written some time before the violin concerto, and it must be said that it does not come up to the newer work. In the violin piece one finds a feeling that is not unfolded in the Concerto Grosso."

Schnabel Is Soloist

Arthur Schnabel, pianist, gave a new proof of his outstanding ability at this same concert of Klemperer when he played with the orchestra Schumann's A minor Piano Concerto.

Incidentally the son of this artist made his Berlin debut as a composer during the same week. In her song recital Lulu Mysz-Gmeiner sang several still incomplete compositions of Alexander Maria Schnabel. A greater success was won by several songs of Rudolf Mengelberg which Harriet van Emden gave a fresh and understanding interpretation at her song recital. This young singer won cordial praise in the press for her art.

Among the artists visiting Berlin lately for concerts was Lauritz Melchior, tenor of the Copenhagen Opera. He and Fausto Ricci, of the Milan Scala, had warm receptions in their recital appearances. Ricci showed a good voice with insufficient finesse, but Melchior proved an artist of well-rounded talents.

The reviewer of the Boersen-Courier said, "The splendid voice, perfectly equalized throughout its range, brilliant in its high tones, perfect in its middle, and powerful below, flows with marvelous beauty from Melchior's throat. Not one impure tone disturbs the pleasure."

New Music Controversy

Interesting as the concerts have been, musical circles have been paying even more attention to the informal discussion of the new music in which many persons have been privately and publicly engaged. Adolf Weissman gave his final lecture recently on Music of the Present Day, and a capacity audience was on hand in the auditorium of the Democratic Club to hear him.

The lecturer summed up his impressions of two differing currents in the trend of music at present. "There is one class of composers," he said, "who aim with their music to divert the listener from all thought of the external world of material. They practice a kind of mystic transcendentalism. The other group has the exactly opposite intention. The composers of this type aim as much as they can to put the life feeling into music, to express all the energy and rhythm of modern life in tones.

"As a general thing, the composers of Germany fall into the class of the transcendentalists. Under the leadership, more or less, of Arnold Schoenberg they are wrestling with the problems of form. The French and Russians, on the other hand, lean to the other side. Led, also only to a certain extent, by Igor Stravinsky, they have very strongly and very definitely the empiric pre-occupation. Into this class, consisting of musicians who are interested in life and actual experience, one must put the composers of American jazz.

"Not all composers of the present day allow themselves to be perfectly classified. Paul Hindemith is partly in each group. His interest in pure form is German, his strength and vigor of rhythm are Franco-Russian.

"For the most part this is an era in which musicians are struggling toward some more or less definite goal. In only a few cases can the destination be clearly observed, but the clarifying process is advancing. The connection with the music of Bach will yet be found."

ARTHUR KURSCHNER.

Opera by Occidentals To Be Given in Peking

PEKING, Feb. 10.—An opera the music and libretto of which have both been written by Occidental residents of Peking will shortly be presented here. The work, called Kuan Yin, the Goddess of Mercy, was composed by A. Avshalamoff to a libretto of Carroll Lunt.

Mr. Avshalamoff is active in Peking as a conductor of the orchestra of the Institute of Fine Arts, and Mr. Lunt is a newspaper man.

The score of the opera is an adaptation by the composer of Chinese scale and harmonic intervals to the instruments of Western music.

In order to insure the performance of the opera, which will take place in April or May, the moral support of the Institute has been secured and tickets are being sold by subscription at the rate of $10 per couple.

Mme. Butterfly Sung By American at Nice

Nice.

A gala performance of Madame Butterfly at the Nice Opera House, which was filled to capacity for the occasion, brought two English speaking artists before the Riviera music public. Miss Keltie, a young American soprano, who has been singing in Italy, made her debut as Cio-Cio-San. She showed a knowledge of the subtle implications of the character and sang the part as well as she acted it.

She had a worthy supporter in G. E. Chadwick, the English baritone, whose Sharpless was a finished performance.

M. Tharaud, as Pinkerton, and Mlle. Anita Gianni of the Naples San Carlo Theatre, as Souzouki, completed the list of principals. These two artists shared the general success. Paul Flon, the conductor, was also called before the footlights.

Ballet at Monaco

The Ballet Russe, under the direction of Serge de Diaghileff, gave recently a gala performance in the Grande Salle of the Palais of Monaco before the guests of the Prince of Monaco. Mmes. Nemtchinova and Tcherincheva did several dances of their repertory, and Mlle. Nikitina gave for the first time a selection from M. W. Dukersky's new ballet, entitled Zephyre et Flore, accompanied by the author. This ballet will be given in full some time next April.

Antoine Doline danced the Nocturne from Les Facheux, by Georges Auric, and Mlle. Alicia Markowa, a thirteen-year-old dancer, was warmly applauded in several numbers.

A special season is now being given by the Ballet Russe in the Nouvelle Salle de Musique of the Casino. Such ballets as Le Spectre de la Rose, Les Sylphides, Carnaval, L'Apres-midi d'un Faune and Les Femmes de Bonne Humeur are figuring in the repertory.

The opera season at the Monte Carlo Casino Theatre has been flourishing this year under the direction of Raoul Gunsbourg. After the opening performances of Lohengrin and Carmen there were some excellent productions of Thais, with Mme. Kousnetzoff and M. Arnal, and of Massenet's Manon, with Mlle. Luart. K. S.

J. HENRI BOVE
FLUTE SOLOIST
Recitals and Obligatos
191 Claremont Ave. New York
Phone—Morningside 4595

STELLA de METTE
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Formerly with Metropolitan Opera
Touring with San Carlo Opera Co.
Exclusive Management of
ANTHONY BAGAROZY
Aeolian Hall New York

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

BONCI
VOCAL STUDIO
For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900.
Knabe Piano

RUTH ST. DENIS with TED SHAWN and the Denishawn Dancers
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Now Touring the Pacific Coast
Exclusive Management DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York
STEINWAY PIANO

OLD-WORLD HIGHLIGHTS

Present New Opera of Wolf-Ferrari

Gli Amanti Sposi Is Given for the First Time in Venice; Forzano the Librettist.

Venice.

Gli Amanti Sposi, an opera by Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari, was given its world premiere at the Teatro Fenice in Venice on February 19. The new work is in three acts, and its libretto was written by Giovacchino Forzano. The applause was enthusiastic, beginning with the close of the overture, whose melody evidently appealed to the audience, and the composer was called out more than a dozen times during the opera to take his bow in person.

The correspondent of Il Corriere della Sera wrote of the premiere, "The composer has taken full advantage of the richness and variety of the elements combined in the libretto to develop with unusual prodigality music of graceful beauty and rich ensembles which spare no resources of technique.

"The manners of expression of old and new composers in the style of the melodrama have been combined by Wolf-Ferrari in Gli Amanti Sposi, and even though one gets unavoidably from time to time the unmistakable impression of sudden transition from one epoch to another, the listener hears throughout the opera a sort of stylistic compendium of the history of comic opera from Mozart to Strauss, all colored with the personal manner of expression of Wolf-Ferrari himself. That is another way of saying that no matter what the style may be at any moment there remains this composer's inexhaustible willingness to sing melodiously and gracefully."

German Influence Felt

The same writer added further, "The abundance of ideas, many of them of brilliant invention, in Gli Amanti Sposi, is one of the new characteristics displayed in this opera by the composer, who, living in Germany, has preferred more and more the solidity and strength of the German style to the rapid grace of the Venetian manner with its light touches and subtle lines.

"The exquisite episode of the bell, the song of Nini, the structure of the third act signify a return to the manner of the Amore Medico and the Vita Nuova of the same composer," according to the writer of Il Secolo, who visited Venice to hear this premiere. The passage in which the Marchioness sings Era di Sera, in the opinion of this reviewer, is one of the most beautiful which has ever come from the pen of Wolf-Ferrari.

The summary of the impressions of the Secolo correspondent was that Gli Amanti Sposi is full of inspiration, humor, vivacity and moving sentiment.

The crowd at the premiere of the new work was quite large, and in point of fashion it was one of the best which has gathered in Venice in recent years for any musical event.

The performance of the work was prepared and directed by Piero Fabbroni, an enthusiastic worker for the popularity and recognition of Wolf-Ferrari's works, who has for more than a dozen years been regarded as one of the Venetian composer's most able exponents.

Signora de Martino displayed a beautiful voice, which was smooth and even in all ranges. The tenor, Polverosi, sang and interpreted his role with surety and ample means. A powerful voice was displayed by the baritone, Parmeggiani, in the part of Filadoro. Also Signore Bonetti and di Marzio did very well in their roles. The ensemble effects were thoroughly efficient. Piero Fabbroni won great applause. F. C.

Operetta Success in Milan

Milan.—A new operetta with music by Mario Costa, given for the first time at the Teatro Lirico on February 11, was cordially received by the public and the music reviewers, who considered it a work of high rank in music of the theatre. F. C.

Borovsky Returns to Paris

Paris.—Alexander Borovsky, pianist, immediately on his return from the United States, gave the first of the series of six recitals which he is scheduled to present in Paris.

Ukrainians Sing in Rome

Rome.—The Ukrainian Chorus, directed by Wasil Ewglewsky, sang here at the end of January. The singers, dressed in colorful national costumes, were warmly received, according to La Tribuna.

Koussevitzky to Honor Scriabine

London.—Serge Koussevitzky will signalize his return to London in the spring, after the Boston season, with a Scriabine memorial concert.

ERMANNO WOLF-FERRARI

Italian Composer Whose Opera, Gli Amanti Sposi, Had Its World Premiere Last Month in Venice.

Brescia Hears La Cena

Brescia. — Umberto Giordano's La Cena delle Beffe, which recently was given for the first time at La Scala in Milan, had its premiere here on January 25. The Teatro Grande thus kept up its tradition of following hard upon La Scala in the matter of new operas.

Choose Prize Opera

Rome.—The board of judges of the government competition for lyric operas, consisting of Maestri Cilea, Failoni, Franchetti, Montefiore and Mule, has selected for first honors one opera only from those submitted. The prize work is an opera in one act, Volpino il Calderaro, by Renzo Bossi. It was submitted by the impresario Oreste Poli of the Teatro Lirico in Milan.

New Director for Florence School

Florence. — Giacomo Setaccioli, at present professor of composition and vice director of the Santa Cecilia in Rome, has been made director of the Florence Conservatory of Music. He is the composer of a number of symphonic works and operas.

Opera by Laccetti Has Premiere in Rome

Rome.

A new three act opera by Guido Laccetti, Carnasciali, libretto by Giovacchino Forzano, had its premiere at the Teatro Costanzi on February 13. The author was called before the curtain together with the artists and alone after each act by an applauding audience. Gabriele Santini conducted.

The music of Carnasciali has the virtue of being in the flowing Italian style. Both the orchestra and the soloists have melodies to sing. According to the reviewer Incagliati, however, the music is not quite as expressive of the action in the libretto as it might be. Sometimes the melody suddenly becomes transformed into declamation which at times has a certain nobility, but which for the most part is lacking in psychological significance.

The humor is accomplished for the most part by grotesque caricature throughout the opera, but it is not sustained.

Signor Gasco, music reviewer of La Tribuna, expressed the opinion that Laccetti's music mostly aimed to enhance the story provided by the librettist and that only rarely did it win attention to itself by distinctive qualities. According to this writer, the new opera contains some moments of happy melody and elegant lyricism and some robust choral passages. Always the influence of Wagner, Verdi, Mascagni and Zandonai is heard at work.

The orchestra in the score is treated by the composer with a sure hand, but it lacks originality, although it is often multi-colored. An interlude which presents the mood of night in the first act was effective on the audience, and at the beginning of the third act the orchestral part stepped to the fore with some music of genuine fervor and intensity. The reviewers found the second act easily the most effective of the three, and one of them called particular attention to the air for baritone at the beginning of the opera, Le Nostre Belle Donne Fiorentine.

The writers were unanimous in praise of the performance of Carnasciali. Gabriele Santini, the conductor, was held largely responsible for the excellent presentation. The baritone, Parvis, the tenor, Francesco Merli, and the soprano, Ottavia Giordano, had the leading roles. Signor Parvis was lauded for his acting as well as the purity of his voice and the expressiveness of his singing. The voice of Signora Giordano was fresh and brilliant. The secondary parts were done with honor by Signori Nardi, Pellegrino and de Petris.

The mise-en-scene and the work of the chorus were equal to the rest of the performance. F. C.

Genoa Hears La Wally

Genoa.—The opera season opened here in January with a revival of Catalani's La Wally at the Teatro Carlo Felice. Margaret Sheridan sang the leading role.

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

RAYMOND HAVENS Pianist
Solist with BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 8 performances
Soloist with CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 2 performances
Soloist with MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 3 performances
For Dates and Terms Address:
EVELYN LIGHT, Sec. 87 Pinckney St., Boston, Mass.

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON 1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

ABBY MORRISON
SOPRANO SAN CARLO GRAND OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: H. J. ANDERSEN, 67 East 55th Street, New York City
Telephone Plaza 7147

Ethyl HAYDEN
Lyric Soprano
Management: Loudon Charlton—Carnegie Hall, New York

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

New Opera Syndicate Formed

Walter Will Conduct at Covent Garden; Irene Scharrer and Szigeti Appear.

London.

Announcement is made of the formation of a new syndicate for the production of grand opera at Covent Garden. With the co-operation of the old Grand Opera Syndicate, a start will be made with a season of German and Italian works about the middle of May. No details of repertory or company are announced as yet, save that Bruno Walter, who has won so much respect in London, will be in charge of the German operas.

Meanwhile the "spring floor" of one of London's largest public dance halls has been taken up and moved to Covent Garden, which for the present has been turned into a popular price ballroom, admission half a crown (50 cents).

Prokofieff Novelty

At the fourth Philharmonic concert on February 26 the violinist Joseph Szigeti introduced Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, Ernest Ansermet conducting. The work was not very seriously taken, audience and orchestra players being wreathed in smiles during most of the performance. Both the first and third movements begin with themes interesting if not startling—the mediocre but acceptable kind of music that under the hands of a Brahms or a Strauss might yield a beautifully wrought and arresting structure. The opening of the first movement in particular seemed attractively lyric in character, though modern in its dry chromaticism—a relief from diatonic sweetness like that afforded by a chant of modal cast after an evening of selections from Elijah.

But in the workings out, and in the middle, scherzo movement, the composer went wholly to pieces; he seemed to write in rhythm only, if that can be imagined, using scale passages of varying compasses to give his rhythms sound. Development consisted wholly of the baldest fioritura on fragments of the main themes.

Tremendously difficult to play, the novelty was brilliantly presented by the soloist, who was duly commended by the press next day.

Irene Scharrer in Chopin Program

During the same week Irene Scharrer devoted an evening to Chopin, from her hands "an oft-told tale," wrote the Daily Telegraph, but one "that loses none of its attractiveness in the telling." The Sunday Times critic noted "the graceful play" of her "gift of sentiment." A very large audience was present to welcome the pianist back to London. Other recitalists of the week who confirmed the good opinion of press and public were Elena Gerhardt and Emil Sauer, the pianist, both of whom gave the last of paired concerts during the week under review.

A newcomer on the concert platform was Mme. Eide Norena, the Scandinavian coloratura soprano, who was one of the best-liked of the singers during last Spring's "grand" opera season. Only the Telegraph review is available for the moment. Commenting on the hackneyed character of her program, it goes on: "She sang this faded music with such brilliance, and where possible with so much sense of character, that one could have wished that her choice had fallen on something of greater musical value. The runs and trills and high notes were negotiated as if they were no more than elementary tests of a singer's proficiency, while a couple of Lieder, added in response to demands for more, proved that Mme. Norena's success need not necessarily be limited to things in which the manner of performance is of more importance than the music itself." P. L.

Foreign Notes

Liverpool. — Two opera companies appeared here simultaneously for their seasons at the end of February, the British National Opera and the Carl Rosa. The two visiting organizations interfered with each other's financial success unmistakably.

Sheffield, England. — At the subscription orchestra concert of the Queen's Hall Orchestra on February 10 Sir Henry Wood conducted Schumann's Manfred Overture, Dohnanyi's Suite, Op. 19, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and the Brahms Concerto for violin and cello, with Misses May and Beatrice Harrison.

Bristol, England.—Clifford Hellier played Grieg's Piano Concerto at the concert of the Colston Hall Orchestra on January 24, Pease Clark conducting. Elgar's Second Symphony was played at the Philharmonic Society's concert on January 31, with Arnold Barter conducting. The program included Bridge's Sea Suite and Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, played by Irene Scharrer.

Amsterdam.—Joseph Szigeti played recently here Prokofieff's new Violin Concerto.

Brussels.—Rhena, the lyrical drama by Jean van den Eeden and Michel Carre, has been revived at the Theatre de la Monnaie. It was last played here twelve years ago. Mme. Cortot sang the role of Rhena, and the part of Don Gesualdo was taken by M. Tilkin-Servais. M. Fontaine sang Falco, and Corneil de Thoran conducted.

Rome.—The first performance of a ballet Il Lago dei Cigni arranged by Marius Fetipa to music of Tschaikowsky took place at the Costanzi Theatre on February 15. The performance was given by the Ballet Russe, with Julie Sedowa as the prima ballerina. Luigi Ricci conducted.

Photo Reproduced from Melodia, Genoa.

Ottorino Respighi is a leader among the contemporary Italian composers and one of the foremost teachers of composition in all Europe. He was represented on the New York program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday evening by his Gregorian Concerto for violin and orchestra in which Albert Spalding was soloist.

No Bayreuth Festival in 1926

There will be no festival of Wagner's operas at Bayreuth in 1926, according to an announcement made by Jules Daiber, American representative of the Bayreuth Festival Association. At the 1925 festival, Friedrich Schorr, Maria Ranzenberg, Fraulein Steinmeyer, Fritz Wolf, and Eva Liebenberg will sing for the first time in the roles respectively of Wotan, Fricka, Eva, Loge and Waltraute.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

CECILE de HORVATH
PIANIST
Management: Clarence E. Cramer, 1102 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Baldwin Piano De Luxe Welte-Mignon Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1921
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

The Cleveland Institute of Music
ERNEST BLOCH, Director
ENROLL NOW FOR NEW TERM FEBRUARY 9
Complete courses in all branches of music. Supplemented by eurythmics, choral and orchestral training, concert and lectures by visiting artists.
For information write MRS. FRANKLYN B. SANDERS, Assistant Director,
2827 EUCLID AVENUE CLEVELAND, OHIO

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

OF THE FOUR operas from which excerpts will be given at the operatic concert of the David Mannes Music School in Aeolian Hall this evening. Gluck's Orpheus will have the fullest rendition. Twelve selections from the second and third acts will be given by Sonia Essin, Ethel Aaron, the chorus and orchestra. Janet Mabon and Richard Koch will sing selections from The Barber of Seville and an ensemble including Sarah Bodine, Eveline Frank, Edith Klein and Angelo di Palma will give parts of Bellini's Norma.

For the excerpts from Sonnambula Mabel Murphy is cast as Amina, Miss Aaron as Lisa, Miss Mabon as Teresa, Hillary Parry as Elvino and Mr. Koch as the Count. Giulio Silva, who is to direct the performances, joined the faculty of the school four years ago, coming from his post as Maestro di Canto at the Royal Academy of St. Cecilia in Rome. He conducted operatic performances in Italy for some years. Books of his authorship on singing have been published in English and Italian.

A second Aeolian Hall concert will be given by students of the school in April when instrumental soloists and the string orchestra will be heard.

The following is the address delivered by Dr. William C. Carl at the celebration of the 1,000th free organ recital played by Prof. Samuel A. Baldwin at the College of the City of New York on March 8:

"It is a pleasure to honor Professor Baldwin today. I am happy to convey the cordial greetings and best wishes from the Mayor's Committee on Music; from the American Guild of Organists, Mr. Frank L. Sealy, Warden; the National Association of Organists, Mr. T. Tertious Noble, President, and from the faculty and student body of the Guilmant Organ School, together with my personal congratulations.

"This unusual event of playing one thousand organ recitals in the College of the City of New York, is a milestone in the musical history of the city which Professor Baldwin is the first to reach. His advent at the College was made possible through the efforts of Mr. Edward M. Shepherd, then its President, whereby he was engaged as Master of the Music. This superb organ, which has been such an uplift in the life of the institution, and the joy of the multitudes who have heard it, was planned and inaugurated by him.

"The first recital was played seventeen years ago. From the beginning the recitals were received with high favor. The programs have been chosen with rare ability and artistry including selections chosen from all schools of organ music together with those from other fields thus giving to the people the opportunity of an acquaintance with the best in music and neither the fundamentalists nor the modernists have been neglected. He has brought to the masses music they otherwise would not have heard or known. He has made hundreds of appreciative listeners during this long period of creative work. A wider appreciation of the art of music has been accomplished not only for New York City, but for the entire country, extending to the Old World where he has appeared with signal success.

"Professor Baldwin is an indefatigable worker. Several hours daily are devoted to practice, and this in addition to his classes in harmony, counterpoint, the appreciation of music and public school music at the college.

"It is an achievement to give 7,996 performances of 1,486 different works,—but how much more to infuse in each of these compositions a personal appeal! It requires an intellectual grasp that few persons can even imagine. The interesting side of Professor Baldwin's work is that he plays with brains back of the music. Attention to the minutest detail has invariably been attended to, coupled with a spiritual insight that only those who have heard him can understand and appreciate. He is a man of ideas who knows how to employ them.

"We are eager to honor one who has so generously and modestly accomplished such a monumental work.

"Professor Baldwin has brought the best in music to the people and this magnificent tribute proves that the people are with him heart and soul."

The Hunter College Music Club (New York) presented Clarence Adler, pianist, in a program of Chopin and Mozart on March 2.

Jessie B. Gibbes and Margaret Hopkins, directors of the Music Education Studios and the Parents' Association, gave a tea on Sunday afternoon at their studio in New York, in honor of Charles Wakefield Cadman whose new opera, The Garden of Mystery, will have its premiere Friday night at Carnegie Hall. The composer spoke on the history and development of American opera and emphasized the vast field of untouched American literature and legend which could be used as the basis for opera or programmatic music.

SIGISMUND STOJOWSKI

Who Displayed All His Old Mastery of the Piano in His Recent New York Recital, Will Move His Teaching Activities From New York to the Pacific Coast for a Time This Summer

Two of the youngest pupils of the Sherwood Music School, Chicago, appeared in a piano and violin recital on March 5. They were Marcella Shiels, ten year old pianist and pupil of Elizabeth Lovell, and Cecilia van Atta, seven year old violin pupil of P. Marinus Paulsen.

Artists from the Yeatman Griffith Studio who appeared in the concert given at the De Witt Clinton Hall on Sunday evening, March 1, were Florence Balmanno, contralto, who recently won the alto prize in Philadelphia in the Eisteddfod Contest, in competition with many other singers, and Marguerite Cobbey, coloratura soprano, who sang the role of Gilda in Rigoletto this season with the Manhattan Opera Company.

French Composers to Teach Interpretation of Own Music

Paris.

Vincent d'Indy, Paul Dukas, Maurice Ravel, and Albert Roussel will give next June courses in the interpretation of their works at the Ecole Normale de Musique de Paris, it has been announced. At the same time Jacques Thibaud will conduct violin classes.

Believing that it is the fundamental intention of every interpreter to produce in his playing exactly the effects planned by the composer, the directors of the Normal School have followed their belief to its logical conclusion by engaging a number of masters of compositions to tell students in person what they intend in each measure of their music. The courses of study of the composers who have been mentioned above will include piano works, songs, and chamber music.

The educational lecture series offered by the Cleveland Institute of Music was brought to a close last night with the appearance of Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist, who gave a program of music of the eighteenth century.

The fifth Young Artists' Contest to be held by the Connecticut State Federation of Music Clubs, under the direction of Mrs. Clayton E. Hotchkiss, of Glenbrook, State Chairman of Contest, took place on March 7 in Sprague Memorial Hall, New Haven, where a large audience had assembled in the gallery to hear the contestants. The judges were Dean David Stanley Smith, Mrs. Hildegarde Nash Donaldson; Mr. Robert Prutting, of Hartford; Mr. Frederick Weld, Women's College, New London; Mr. Walter Edwards and Mr. J. L. Dashiell, of Stamford, and Mr. Isaac B. Clark, of Waterbury. The seventeen contestants were from Ansonia, East Hartford, Meriden, New Haven, New London, South Manchester, South Norwalk, and Stamford.

The winner in women's voices was Evelyn Marcel, of East Hartford, contralto, while George A. Leach, baritone, of Stamford, won in the men's. Robert Doellner, of South Manchester, won in the violin. Ralph Eggleston Linsley, of this city, won two prizes, one in the piano class and the second for displaying the best artistry and musicianship with greatest promise of fulfillment upon entering a musical career. Each prize was twenty-five dollars in gold. These winners go to Boston on April 23 to enter the Plymouth District Contest to be held in Steinway Hall.

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

V. TREVISAN Chicago Civic Opera Association
VOCAL STUDIO 74 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of Pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
16—Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

EMILIO ROXAS VOCAL COACH
Studio: 2231 Broadway, N. Y. C.
Phone: Endicott 6306
Coach and Accompanist to MARTINELLI for six years

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

ARTHUR J. HUBBARD — VINCENT V. HUBBARD
Teachers of Singing in All Its Branches
246 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, MASS.

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephone: Circle 10117

HILDA GRACE GELLING
VOCAL STUDIO
128 West 72nd St., N. Y. City
Telephone Endicott 1587
ASSOCIATE TEACHER WITH PERCY RECTOR STEPHENS

THE musical criticisms of Percy Scholes in the London Observer are known outside the bounds of London, and even of England. A large number of his writings, short and long, on musical subjects of most diverse interest he has combined in a volume published by the American Branch of the Oxford University Press, New York, under the title of Crochets.

One of the eminent qualities of this book, just as of the ordinary periodical reviews which Mr. Scholes writes, is its continual readability. Granted that a person has as prerequisites an original interest in music and only a little experience in the hearing of it, he is guaranteed some hours of entertainment and enlightenment in the perusal of Crochets.

No matter Mr. Scholes' subject for the moment, he approaches it with a good sense which is likely to put him in the wrong much less often than most other writers. Sometimes one may feel that he is wrong, but there is no offense to be taken, for a captivating good humor and wit color the sentiments from page to page.

The fifty-four essays are for the most part short, some of them merely a couple of pages in length, and they are all written in such a way that the musical connoisseur with his funds of technical knowledge cannot be bored any more than the genial dilettante who hears one concert for every dozen that he may read about.

The subjects are more or less general. Mr. Scholes speaks of audiences, what they hear and what they want, of Stravinsky and Scriabine, of Handel, Bach, church music, the violinist's repertory, polytonality and atonality, opera from a half dozen points of view, and what not. Only rarely does his subject matter seem confined and uninteresting to the non-Englishman.

Musicians Can Aid Cathedral

The musicians of the United States have been invited to aid in the campaign to complete the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York City. A committee of which Albert Stoessel is chairman has already begun work collecting donations and organizing activities to procure funds. Mr. Stoessel is receiving donations at 330 West Ninety-fifth street or care of the office of The Musical Digest.

Four Soloists Assist New York Symphony

Felix Salmond and Paul Kochanski were the soloists with the New York Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter, conductor, in Aeolian Hall on March 8. Mr. Salmond played the cello solo in Strauss' Don Quixote, and he and Mr. Kochanski appeared in the Brahms Concerto for cello and violin. The other number was Johann Christian Bach's B flat Symphony, which was given its premiere in New York.

On Thursday, at Carnegie Hall, Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis were the soloists in Mozart's E flat Concerto for violin and viola, and Mr. Walter introduced to America Franz Schrecker's The Birthday of the Infanta. Other numbers were Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream Overture and the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony.

According to Olin Downes of the Times, in the Brahms "the two soloists thought together, felt together, and, so far as it was possible, matched tone qualities together." Lawrence Gilman (Herald Tribune) found it a performance of "superlative beauty and insight and musicianly skill."

Deems Taylor of the World expressed the critical reaction of Mr. Salmond's work when he wrote that "his performance was not only exquisite in tone dynamics and phrasing, but revealed the breadth of perspective, the sureness of grasp, the unerring command of mood that are the marks of a great artist." In Pitts Sanborn's (Telegram-Mail) opinion, Mr. Salmond has never before played "with a richer accomplishment, a finer and fuller poetry." W. J. Henderson of the Sun lauded his "wealth of beautiful tone," his "commanding" individuality of style, and his "variety of expressive accent."

Typical of the opinion of the reviewers of the Bach work was Mr. Downes' comment that the Symphony "is deliciously clear and spontaneous in its manner, full of melody, not a deep work, but a very fine and charming one." The Don Quixote was, to quote Mr. Sanborn, given an "exceptionally clear, sympathetic and persuasive performance" under Mr. Walter's baton.

The World reviewer mentioned that Mr. Dushkin and Mr. Tertis "played with imagination, feeling and beautifully blended tone." The Sun considered their work "delightful," and F. D. Perkins of the Herald Tribune wrote that Mr. Dushkin "displayed a clear, fluent tone" and Mr. Tertis played with "his usual mastery." Olin Downes thought that the interpretation, "as a whole, did not do entire justice to the music." Mr. Sanborn was agreed.

According to the Post, the novelty "is modern music rich in melody, abundant in ideas and beautifully orchestrated." Mr. Downes wrote that "the writing is clear and melodious, the instrumentation is richly colored, the music has feeling."

SUMMY'S CORNER

Emil Oberhoffer, noted conductor, writes: "There is a wealth of information, counsel and advice in the book besides the expected laws or rules of harmonic upbuilding and progression. * * * One could rhapsodize over many pages of the book, but chapters beginning 'Altered Chords' and especially the one on 'Modulation' are unique, in that they throw a new 'high' light on matters touching tendencies of modern music making in the creative sense. Altogether the most fascinating book on the subject!"

Harmonic Material and Its Uses
by ADOLF WEIDIG
Price, $3.00, plus postage
Published by
Clayton F. Summy Co.
429 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Photo by Miller.

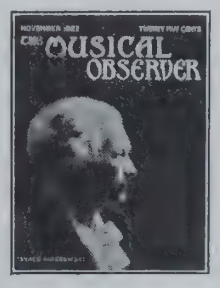
UNMASKED!

Weyland Echols is Tenor Who Aroused Curiosity by Singing Anonymously at a Roosevelt Musical Recently. He Will Give a New York Recital on April 29.

TWO groups of comparatively simple pieces for the piano by Leo Ornstein have been published by G. Schirmer. One of these sets is entitled Musings of a Piano, the other Memories From Childhood. The first's four numbers are called: The Professor Walks By; The Piano Thinks Out Loud; The Music Lesson and the Complaining Child; and I Wish I Knew.

All four of the compositions are simple in style and untraditional in idiom. They are catchy without being pretty. These pieces as well as the childhood cycle (including A Tale From the Moon; The Organgrinder and the Monkey; In Grandpapa's Big Rocker; An Arabian Fable; In the Swing; The Funny Story; The Sleeping Doll, and the March of the Tin Soldiers) give the impression that the composer is crystallizing his individual and modernist style by composing in a vein of the utmost simplicity. The intrinsic persuasiveness of a great volume of tone or a smashing rhythm are not taken advantage of. The pieces stand or fall as bits of sheer music.

The Oliver Ditson Company has published for the piano a new edition of the Brahms Valse in A flat. The editor is Rafael Joseffy. The issue is clearly printed, and is marked for phrasing, fingering, pedalling, and dynamics with the insight and authority which one is led to expect in reading the name of the editor.



This Coupon Is Worth 25c

LET'S GET ACQUAINTED!

If you are interested in a Music Magazine full of good, practical, interesting, novel reading matter and carefully selected musical compositions, mail this coupon with 25 cents and let us send you two issues of the MUSICAL OBSERVER.

THE MUSICAL OBSERVER CO.
62 COOPER SQUARE, N. Y. CITY

NAME .....ADDRESS .....
CITY .....STATE .....

The David Mannes Music School

David and Clara Mannes, Directors

157 East 74th Street

Telephone: Butterfield 0010

Faculty of the Artists' and Teachers' Courses

Piano
Katherine Bacon
*Berthe Bert
Howard Brockway
Vladimir Drozdoff
Ralph Leopold
*Assistant to Alfred Cortot

Violin
Scipione Guidi
Sandor Harmati
David Mannes
Wolfe Wolfinsohn

Voice
Fraser Gange
Giulio Silva
Greta Torpadie

Composition
Rosario Scalero

Solfege
Anne Marie Soffray

Violoncello
Felix Salmond
(Course in Interpretation for Cellists)

Organ
Melville Smith

Siegfried Given in Cycle at Metropolitan

Siegfried, the third drama of Der Ring des Nibelungen, was given its first production this season at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Wednesday afternoon.

Artur Bodanzky conducted, and in the cast were Nanny Larsen-Todsen as Bruennhilde, Curt Taucher as Siegfried, George Meader as Mime, Friedrich Schoor as the Wanderer, Gustav Schuetzendorf, as Alberich, William Gustafson as Fafner, Marion Telva as Erda, and Charlotte Ryan as the voice of the forest bird. W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun that "the orchestra played admirably and Mr. Bodanzky conducted a soundly musical interpretation of the score."

In the opinion of Olin Downes of the Times, Mme. Larsen-Todsen gave "dignity and a fair degree of significance" to the music in the scene where Bruennhilde awakens. Mr. Henderson said she sang in dramatic style, "with her now familiar vocal peculiarities."

Lawrence Gilman commented that Mme. Larsen-Todsen "impressed us again by her sincerity of feeling, her distinction of person, her intensity." According to Deems Taylor of the World, she gave "a rather routine performance" and Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) spoke of the difficulties of the scene and added that she "attacked the problem with superb spirit and often the results were gratifying." The Post reviewer considered that she gave "an emotional rendering."

This writer thought Mr. Taucher's "a noteworthy performance, in which the music and the acting made a perfect blend which only the highest points in opera attain." Mr. Gilman commended him, as did other writers, for his pluck in continuing the performance after his accident (which is reported elsewhere in these columns). Deems Taylor thought he "sang the title role with generally good effect, and acted parts of it very well indeed." Mr. Sanborn found it a "thoughtful, carefully considered impersonation" with the "merit of seeming spontaneous." According to Mr. Henderson he "sang more lyrically than formerly" and Mr. Downes reported that "he interpreted his role with a sense of line and tonal texture which was not destroyed by the severe fall he had suffered."

Mr. Henderson asserted that "the most satisfying impersonations were those of Mr. Meader and Mr. Schorr" and that the former's "skill in the treatment of the vocal melody makes it the most subtle and convincing Mime the Metropolitan has known." Lawrence Gilman considered Mr. Schorr "an imposing Wanderer, admirable in voice and diction." The Post reviewer lauded these two as well as Mr. Schuetzendorf and Mr. Gustafson.

According to Mr. Taylor, Mr. Schuetzendorf "sang the role better than anyone I ever heard." He also praised Mr. Meader for a "wealth of characterization" and Mr. Schorr for singing with "vocal artistry and tragic power." Pitts Sanborn had "little but praise" for Messrs. Meader and Schuetzendorf, and commended Mr. Schorr's diction. Mr. Meader, he thought, was particularly noteworthy for "his exhaustive treatment of the music and the absolute clarity of his diction." Mr. Downes stated that Mr. Schorr's was "the best singing" of the afternoon, and that Mr. Meader and Mr. Schuetzendorf were "an admirable pair." W. J. Henderson said that Wotan was "sung nobly."

He mentioned that Miss Telva was commendable, while Olin Downes wrote that it was "thoughtfully considered and of considerable vocal excellence." Mr. Sanborn admired the distinctness with which she enunciated and Deems Taylor commented that she sang "exceedingly well." Of the same opinion was Mr. Gilman.

MISS LOUISE HUNTER

Whose Portrayal of the Role of Musetta in Boheme at the Metropolitan Has Been Warmly Praised.

Heldenleben Has St. Louis Premiere

St. Louis, March 10.—The first local performance of Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, Ein Heldenleben, was given by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Rudolf Ganz at the subscription concerts on February 27 and 28.

Name Coast Festival Artists

The soloists so far announced for the second annual spring festival in San Francisco are Helen Stanley, Mme. Charles Cahier, and Rudolph Laubenthal. The concerts, which will enlist the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Alfred Hertz, and a chorus of 600 voices, will take place in the Civic Auditorium April 18, 21, 23, and 25.

Metropolitan Voice Trials Start

The first voice trial for admission to the free Choral School of the Metropolitan Opera Company took place on Saturday. Auditions, which are open to all young American singers, will close on March 28. Those wishing to have a hearing are requested to write to Edoardo Petri, director of the Choral School, at the Metropolitan Opera House Studios, New York City.

Lines o' News AND Chatter

William Andrews Clark left New York last Saturday for the University of Virginia, of which he is an alumnus, to have bestowed upon him an honorary degree. Apart from his mining and music activities Mr. Clark is a bibliophile; and the library he is now having built on the plot of ground adjoining his Los Angeles residence is to be one of the finest private libraries in the country.

* * *

Mr. G. D. Markham, "father" and present head of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, is in New York, accompanied by Mrs. Markham.

* * *

Another recent visitor of Gotham is Mrs. Max Goldstein, active in St. Louis Symphony councils.

* * *

Miss Louise Van Wagenen, of the Rome (N. Y.) Civic Music League, stopped off for a few days in New York on her way to Asheville, S. C.

* * *

Engaging Walter Rothwell to conduct Frank Patterson's new opera, The Echo, insures an authoritative directing head for the premiere of that work in Portland, Ore., in June.

* * *

Guests who partook of the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Berthold Neuer, when they gave their now memorable party a few weeks ago at New York's St. Regis hotel, are still talking about it. Moriz Rosenthal, in whose honor it was given, was like most of the others present—he didn't go home until morning.

* * *

The first name of the tenor de Lucia is Fernando, not Ferdinando as some would have it. And he was first before Caruso, not after the great, great Enrico, in point of time at least.

* * *

It may surprise you to know that Titta Ruffo's real name is Ruffo Titta. But don't let him sign his checks to you except with the first signature, for that is the way he is known now.

* * *

Paul Morris is doing the music reviewing for the New York Evening World for the present. Frank Warren has taken his golf clubs and gone to Aiken, N. C., for a while.

* * *

Antonio Scotti's annual "Bicchierata" will take place on the evening of March 28. The genial Tony every year near the end of the Metropolitan season invites the newspapermen out to have a good time on him. Of course—there will be milk on hand for all.

* * *

As usually happens at this time of year, there is a shifting of artist attractions from one managerial bureau to another.

The national capital is showing an interest in its own opera which may lead, later on, to an increased number of performances annually.

* * *

"In splendid voice" seems to be the unanimous verdict concerning Rose Ponselle, who is concertizing continuously these days.

* * *

Mrs. Frank Gates Allen, member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra auxiliary board and chairman of the Pasadena concerts, sends a postcard signed by her and Mr. Allen from Algiers. Mrs. Allen writes that she has missed some copies of The Musical Digest, and that in time she may learn to read Arabic music.

* * *

When last Lines-O'-Newser talked with Frances Nash that admirable pianiste was trying to decide whether she would accept an offer to make some Paris appearances this spring with orchestra.

* * *

Now for Pelleas et Melisande, in a new setting (the Metropolitan) and with a new cast of artists.

* * *

Although he is no longer on salary, Samuel E. Macmillen has offered to accompany the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra on its forthcoming spring tour—which he booked—and the offer has been appreciatively accepted.

* * *

The always courteous Erich Siemon, of the Wolff and Sachs concert management, of Berlin, will serve the Metropolitan Opera Company in negotiating for artists and new operas . . . for the consideration of that institution. Mr. Siemon accompanied Willem Furtwaengler on his recent trip to New York.

* * *

Busy Howard Hanson finds his time rather taken up these days, between his music conservatory duties and dashing from one symphony orchestra to another to conduct his compositions.

* * *

It runs in the family—devotion to a good cause. While Kendall Mussey, chairman of the concert committee of the Association of Music School Settlements, is putting on Cadman's new American opera, The Garden of Mystery, next Friday night, his cousin, Templeton Crocker, has just witnessed the premiere of Fay-Yen-Fah at Monte Carlo, another American opera of which he wrote the book to Joseph Redding's score.

* * *

Not too late was the dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. Max Rabinoff last Monday week at the New York Waldorf-Astoria. But—it was a charming affair.

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld

RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street

"THE DRESSMAKER FROM PARIS"

Leatrice Joy and Ernest Torrence

RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA

RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street

"THE AIR MAIL"

With Billie Dove and Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.

FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA

Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door

World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre

Edward Bowes, Managing Director

BUSTER KEATON in "SEVEN CHANCES"

PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL

Capitol Grand Orchestra

Capitol Ballet Corps

Elisabeth RothBerg

SOPRANO

METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON

FISK BLDG. NEW YORK

PACKARD BLDG. PHILA., PA.

BRUNSWICK RECORDS

HARDMAN PIANO

M U D

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

A Plea for the Unfamiliar
See Page 13

VOL. VII. NO. 23 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

Myra Hess is again touring from coast to coast in the United States where her popularity as a pianist has risen to the level of enthusiasm at which it has long been in her native England. Miss Hess will make her farewell New York appearance of the season on April 1.

Bulletins of News

The summer exodus of artists to Europe has started. Among those who sailed Saturday were Claudia Muzio, Ottavio Scotto, Mr. and Mrs. Edouard Cotreuil, Desire Defrere, Charles Lauwers, Elvira de Hidalgo, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hackett, Olga Forrai, Mr. and Mrs. Giorgio Polacco, Friedrich Schorr, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Schwarz, Rosa Raisa and Giacomo Rimini.

Los Angeles, March 14.—Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, has been engaged to open the season of the Hollywood Bowl Symphony Orchestra on July 7. Mr. Reiner last summer conducted some of the symphony concerts in the New York Stadium. Rudolph Ganz will also conduct during the week of August 17, it is announced, and negotiations are under way with Walter Damrosch, Leopold Stokowski and Sir Henry Wood for guest appearances.

Paul Longone sailed on the Conte Rosso Saturday to manage a five weeks opera season in Paris (beginning May 18) to be given by a new organization which has been named the American-Italian-French Grand Opera Company. Among the artists whom he has announced to appear are Mary Garden, Rosa Raisa, Elvira de Hidalgo, Toti dal Monte, Queena Mario, Lucille Chalfont, Grace Moore, Yvette Ruzel, Vanda Nomicos, Eva Clark, Mary Lawrence, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, Giacomo Rimini, Giuseppe de Luca, Adamo Didur, George Baklanoff, Fernand Ansseau, Desire Defrere, Virgilio Lazzari, Angelo Bada and Ludovico Oliviero.

Leopold Godowsky, pianist, has filed suit in the New York Supreme Court against the Hotel Ansonia for $50,000 damages for injuries he alleges he suffered taking a shower in his apartment at the hotel when, after turning the faucet marked "cold," he was deluged with scalding water. Mr. Godowsky asserted that the resulting shock threw him off his balance and precipitated him against the side of the tub and that his injuries prevented him from filling several concert engagements.

Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Stillman Kelley have just returned from London where they were present at the broadcasting of Mr. Kelley's The Pilgrim's Progress, which has its first hearing at the Cincinnati May Festival in 1918. This was the first choral work to be broadcasted by the British Broadcasting Company.

The work was broadcasted from Covent Garden on March 12 (where it was repeated March 21) by the Wolverhampton Choral Association and the Birmingham Celestial Chorus augmented by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Joseph Lewis. The soloists were Ursula Greville, John Coates, Joseph Farrington, Harold Williams, and Denis Noble.

Forecast Metropolitan Novelties for 1925-1926

EACH year The Musical Digest has been able to give its readers much in advance of any official announcement an authentic forecast of the novelties and revivals planned for the coming season by the New York Metropolitan Opera Company. In seasons past our forecasts, carefully gleaned from many conflicting rumors, have been correct.

For the season of 1925-1926 The Musical Digest is assured that the schedule of the Metropolitan will include the first performance in America of Stravinsky's Chanson du Rossignol in operatic form; the first performance in the United States of Giordano's new opera, La Cena delle Beffe; and Spontini's Vestale, Wolf-Ferrari's Jewels of the Madonna, Smetana's Bartered Bride. Probably Massenet's Don Quixote also will be given with Feodor Chaliapin.

Name New Conductors Of State Symphony

Dohnanyi and Goossens to Lead Orchestra in 1925-1926.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, composer and conductor of the Philharmonic Society of Budapest, and Eugene Goossens, English composer and conductor, will lead the State Symphony Orchestra next season, according to an announcement made Friday night by Jacob Altschuler, manager of the orchestra.

During the season 1925-26 the orchestra will give twenty concerts in Carnegie Hall and will also hold private rehearsals of the works of young American composers. Mr. Dohnanyi will conduct the first eleven concerts, from October 21 to January 9, and Mr. Goossens will take up the baton for the remaining nine performances.

Mr. Dohnanyi, who is a Hungarian, is a pianist as well as a conductor, and is at present on a concert tour in California. He has been heard twice as soloist with the State Symphony in programs of his own works. Eugene Goossens, known in England as conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra and the British National Opera Company as well as composer, has for two years been guest conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra.

The private rehearsals will be for the purpose of giving native composers the opportunity of hearing their own works played by full orchestra. Under an arrangement made jointly with the National Music League, only the composers and critics will be present at these hearings.

The orchestra will next season be under a governing board with Mr. Altschuler as orchestra manager. Its twenty concerts will come in three series,—eight on Saturday evenings, beginning October 24; six on Tuesday evenings, beginning October 27; and five on Wednesday evenings, beginning October 21. The orchestra also plans to give young people's concerts in both Brooklyn and Manhattan.

Annual Convention of Eastern Supervisors Held at New Haven

Five Hundred Educators From Twelve States Confer in Three Day Session.

ELECT NEW OFFICERS

New Haven, March 21.—More than five hundred educators from twelve Eastern States attended the Eastern Music Supervisors' Conference held here this Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Round-table discussions of various problems in public school music instruction, clinics, and demonstrations were conducted by prominent educators in several schools during the mornings, and in the afternoons addresses were delivered by Mayor D. E. Fitzgerald; Dr. James R. Angell, President of Yale University; F. H. Beede, Superintendent of New Haven Schools; Dr. Hollis Dann, Director of Music at New York University; Charles A. Ames, of the Connecticut State Board of Education; Peter Dykema, Director of Music Education at Columbia University; Dr. Max Schoen, Director of the Department of Psychology at Carnegie Tech.; Frantz Proschowsky, New York voice teacher; and George Gartlan, Director of Music of New York City. The afternoon meetings were held in Sprague Hall, of the Yale School of Music.

Programs of music were contributed by Albert Edmund Brown, of the Ithaca Conservatory; the Yale University Glee Club; the Horatio Parker Choir, of New Haven, conducted by Dean David Stanley Smith, of Yale University; the Waterbury, Conn., High School Orchestra, led by F. C. Evans; and a rendition of Haydn's Seasons was given by the New Haven High School Chorus of 600 voices, under the direction of William E. Brown, with the following soloists: Helen Marek, Charles Kullman, and George Devaul.

Dr. Charles M. Blakewell, Professor of Psychology at Yale, was the speaker at the banquet held at the New Haven Lawn Club Friday evening, which brought the conference to a close.

The following officers were elected at the business session held Thursday afternoon—George J. Abbott, Schenectady, N. Y., president; Eldridge Pitcher, Auburn, Me., vice-president; H. A. Spencer, Niagara Falls, N. Y., second vice-president; Bertha D. Hughes, Utica, N. Y., secretary; Clarence Wells, Orange, N. J., treasurer; Ruth Storms, Wilmington, Del., and Claude Rosenberry, Reading, Pa., directors.

Atlantic City was suggested as the conference city for next year.

National Supervisors' Conference

The National Supervisors' Conference will hold its eighteenth meeting next week in Kansas City, Mo., and it is estimated that more than 1,500 music supervisors from all over the country will attend. The conference will open Monday morning and extend through until Friday evening.

Spalding Plays With Bostonians in N. Y.

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra in Fourth Gotham Pair of Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave its fourth pair of New York concerts on Thursday and Saturday, March 12 and 14, in Carnegie Hall. Albert Spalding was the soloist at both concerts in Respighi's Concerto Gregoriano and Bach's E major Concerto respectively.

The Respighi work was played by Mr. Spalding, to quote W. J. Henderson of the Sun, "with so much beauty of tone and such exaltation of feeling that he vitalized it from beginning to end." The Post reviewer felt that "Mr. Spalding gave a characteristically finished interpretation."

F. D. Perkins wrote in the Herald Tribune that the violinist "gave an excellent performance, with his usual technical finish and beauty of tone, and Mr. Koussevitzky, with whom he has played it more than once before this, furnished thorough co-operation. The resulting ovation was prolonged." According to Deems Taylor (World) the Concerto is music "of the greatest purity and seriousness, always interesting and containing many passages of grave and haunting beauty . . . Mr. Spalding played it with deep sincerity and with such tenderness and beauty of tone, such fine authority and spaciousness of style as I have seldom heard him or any other violinist display. It was a performance thrillingly worthy of the music, and one that fully deserves the adjective 'masterly.'"

Writing in the Times, Olin Downes commented that the work has "noble thoughts and an exalted beauty" and was played by the soloist "in a way that displayed to the full his admirable accomplishments as violinist and musician."

Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) spoke of his "fine and devoted playing."

Other numbers on this first program were Boccherini's C major Symphony, Dukas' La Peri, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. Olin Downes wrote of the Dukas work that it was "imaginative and scintillating" and "of genuinely symphonic texture" with "the feeling of spectacle and instrumentation as gorgeous as a peacock's wing." To Deems Taylor it was "attractive, melodious music." Mr. Henderson thought that it "gave Mr. Koussevitzky opportunity to display his warmth of feeling and his poetic imagination and the orchestra scope for all the splendors of its tone and its technical finish."

At the second concert the program consisted of Glazounow's Eighth Symphony, the Bach Concerto, Rabaud's Nocturnal Procession, and the dance music from Strauss' Salome.

The Post reviewer thought Mr. Spalding demonstrated in the Concerto "a technical mastery of his instrument that was only equaled by the spirit of his playing. His tone was nothing short of ravishingly beautiful." The writer in the Sun agreed that he played "with his habitual sincerity and with admirable art."

Both Olin Downes and the chronicler in the Herald Tribune felt that this performance was not quite up to Mr. Spalding's playing on Thursday, although they agreed that the accompaniment was largely at fault.

The Herald Tribune writer said that Mr. Koussevitzky played the Glazounow superbly, "but why he played it at all we are unable to guess." Other reviewers expressed similar opinions.

METROPOLITAN OPERA BILL

WEDNESDAY

Juive — with Mmes. Larsen-Todsen, Ryan, and Galli; and Messrs. Martinelli, Mardones, and Errolle; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

THURSDAY

Meistersinger (matinee)—with Mmes. Mueller and Howard; and Messrs. Taucher, Bohnen, and Rothier; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

Oracolo, Petrouchka, and Cavalleria Rusticana (evening)—the first with Mmes. Bori and Wakefield, and Messrs. Tokatyan, Scotti, and Didur, Mr. Papi conducting; the second with Mmes. Galli, Rudolph, and Leporte, and Messrs. Bolm, Bonfiglio, Bartik, and Agnini, Mr. Serafin conducting; the last with Mmes. Peralta and Alcock, and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and Ballester, Mr. Papi conducting.

FRIDAY

Pagliacci and Coq d'Or (matinee)—the former with Mme. Mario, and Messrs. Martinelli, Danise, Tibbett, and Bada, Mr. Papi conducting; the latter with Mmes. Sabanieva, Telva, Ryan, Galli, and Rudolph, and Messrs. Diaz, Didur, Kosloff, Bartik, and Bonfiglio, with Mr. Bamboschek conducting.

Pelleas et Melisande (evening)—with Mmes. Bori, Howard, and Hunter; and Messrs. Johnson, Whitehill, and Rothier; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

SATURDAY

Freischuetz (matinee) — with Mmes. Rethberg and Dalossy; and Messrs. Taucher, Bohnen, and Schuetzendorf; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

Tales of Hoffman (evening) — with Mmes. Sabanieva, Peralta, Mario, and Bourskaya; and Messrs. Errolle and de Luca; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

MONDAY

Emergency Fund Benefit (matinee)—Excerpts from Rigoletto, Carmen, Walkuere, and Romeo.

Boheme (evening)with Mmes. Mueller and Hunter; Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and Didur; Mr. Papi conducting.

Los Angeles Pianist Soloist At Philharmonic Pop Concert

Los Angeles, March 9.—At the last popular concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell conducting, Marvin Maazel, the soloist, "swept the assemblage from its feet" by his playing of the Liszt E flat Piano Concerto, to quote the Record.

The reviewer in the News commented that Mr. Maazel "puts a great deal of fire into his offerings. He excels in the forte movements." Ralph Greene wrote in the Examiner that he has "all the qualifications of a very fine virtuoso pianist—a firm touch, a fascinating shimmer in his passage work and dazzling octave technique."

Carl Bronson of the Herald thought that Mr. Maazel's appearance, "taken as a whole, was one of the outstanding features of the season in that it was a local performer and a scarcely expected triumph. . . . The performer caught the contagious fire of Liszt." The Express reviewer noted that the artist "has gained strength of technique and control, though he may tend to wild tempos. His rendition was not only brilliant, but of intense musical feeling."

Dohnanyi Assists Chamber Society

San Francisco Ensemble Features His Music; Cortot, Hayes, de Reszke Singers, and Pavlowa Appear.

San Francisco, March 12.—Three recitals which the reviewers considered among the most interesting of the season were the fifth concert of the San Francisco Chamber Music Society Tuesday with Erno Dohnanyi as assisting artist, and the appearances the week previous of Alfred Cortot, French pianist, and Roland Hayes, Negro tenor.

The Hungarian composer played in two of his own compositions with the Chamber Music Society—a Sonata for piano and violin, and the Quintet in C minor. Charles Woodman wrote in the Call that the latter, which was heard here for the first time, was played "magnificently. Indeed, the whole concert was notable for the best work ever done by the quartet."

Beethoven's E flat major Quartet was "the occasion of the best work I have ever heard the members of the San Francisco Chamber Society do," wrote Redfern Mason in the Examiner. "It was sympathetic; it was authoritative; it was masterly." Mr. Woodman commented that "Persinger played, I think, as never before. His round, clear and even tones were thrilling and Ferner gave the cello part of the last movement with unusual brilliancy."

Mr. Dohnanyi gave "lucid and forceful interpretation of the work with remarkable skill" in the Quintet, wrote Mr. Woodman, and Mr. Mason found the performance "admirable." In the Sonata, to quote Ray C. B. Brown of the Chronicle, Mr. Ford's reading of the violin part "had serenity and fire admirably welded, and the distinction of his fine phrasing matched the authoritative pianism of the composer." Mr. Ford's "fine musicianship" was praised by Mr. Woodman, and other writers commended his work.

The Bulletin reviewer liked the vitality and freshness of the Dohnanyi music, and William Foster Elliot of the Herald, wrote that "both are brilliant works with a superabundance of thematic material and conspicuous clarity of development, at once fresh in quality and precisely logical in their working out." Messrs. Persinger, Ford, Firestone, Ferner, and Dohnanyi received general commendation for their work.

Of the recital of Mr. Cortot Ray Brown wrote in the Chronicle, "The poet's warmth and the artist's eye for color are evident in his playing. His sense of proportion is always just and the structural lines of music are clear." In the Call Charles Woodman wrote his opinion that "Alfred Cortot's recital revealed him as a great poetical pianist, creating immense enthusiasm. He has a way of getting tight to the hearts of his audience and appealing to them as associates in the enjoyment of the music he interprets."

For Roland Hayes there was also great praise. In the Examiner Mr. Mason wrote, "Hayes is a great artist, he is great because of the depth of his sympathy and the penetrating keenness of his vision." Likewise enthusiastic was Mr. Woodman: "Roland Hayes' recital was the most remarkable feast of song I can remember—a perfect tenor voice—a perfect demonstration of the art of singing." Mr. Brown on the other hand was not wholly enthusiastic. He felt that "Hayes has not the instinctive singing characteristics of his rhythmically endowed race but a singing guided by intelligence and taste. He knows the subtleties of accent and phrase and the strength of restraint. In dramatic power he is distinctly limited."

The de Reszke Singers appeared on Washington's Birthday at one of Alice Seckels' Matinee Musicals in the Fairmount ballroom. They were assisted by Mildred Dilling, harpist. The quartet and the assisting artist were heartily praised in the press for the beauty of their concert.

Anna Pavlowa opened a week's engagement at the Curran Theatre on Monday evening, offering at her first appearance her new ballet, Don Quixote. "She seemed as inexhaustible, as radiantly prodigal of energy, as lightsome in her spurning of the earth as at any time in recent seasons," wrote Ray Brown, and the reviewer of the Herald felt that she was in better form than at her last appearance.

Mr. Mason wrote, "If it is Pavlowa's last visit, then she is taking her leave royally. She has brought us the best company she has ever had, and her dancing last night revived the happiest memories of what she has shown us in the past."

M. J. C.

Exclusive Management
National Concerts, Inc.
1451 Broadway
New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

RUDOLF LAUBENTHAL
TENOR, METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones
Aeolian-Vocalion Records
Aeolian Hall, New York

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street, New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

A New Note in Song-Recital Giving Charming Programs of Melodious Beethoven Songs—With Talks.
Management:
DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York City
FREEMANTEL

New Symphonic Poem Of Hanson Performed

Director of Eastman School Conducts Rochester Philharmonic in His Lux Aeterna.

Rochester, March 17. — Howard Hanson, young director of the Eastman School of Music, conducted the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in his new symphonic poem, Lux Aeterna, at the most recent concert of the orchestra in the Eastman Theatre. The composer's Nordic Symphony and his symphonic poem, North and West, have been played by several of the larger orchestras in the United States.

According to Stewart B. Sabin, reviewer of the Democrat and Chronicle, Mr. Hanson's attempt "to set down his thoughts as he surveys life, its conflicts, passions, strife and victory," succeeded in creating a deep impression, where "the expression is understood." This writer said, "Mr. Hanson is original, passionately in earnest and a thinker. His musical idiom is purely his own; the last thing that he is is imitative." Nevertheless he felt that the fullness of Mr. Hanson's score prevented some of his ideas, for the present, from being entirely understandable at first hearing.

The composer's "brilliant technique" was remarked by Ernest A. Weiss, reviewer of the Herald. He felt that Mr. Hanson, "wrapped up in the intellectual aspect of his art," made demands on the musical capacity of his audience which were sometimes too great to be met. He agreed that the music had its beautiful passages.

"Each work that one hears by Mr. Hanson adds further testimony to this young composer's talent and to the distinctively affirmative quality of his musical point of view," declared A. J. Warner in the Times-Union. "His equipment includes not only the mastery of the mechanical and mathematical side of writing music, but the ability to create a definite mood. . . . The score contains passages that are of rare tonal richness and stirring beauty, and it rises to an ultimate climax that is movingly exultant."

"Mr. Hanson conducted with authority and great conviction, and was accorded a notably cordial reception," added this report, and the other writers spoke likewise of his conducting and the manner in which the audience greeted him.

The writer of the Journal and Post Express felt that the composer had succeeded in portraying the difficult program which he had in mind.

New York Trio Plays Again

The New York Trio, composed of Clarence Adler, piano; Louis Edlin, violin, and Cornelius van Vliet, cello, gave its second New York concert in Aeolian Hall the evening of March 16. A Beethoven sonata and trios by Haydn and Schubert made up the program. The three artists, according to the Herald Tribune, "proved to be in beautiful form, with a thoroughly blended combined tone of smooth, ingratiating quality and a unity of interpretation and performance, giving the trio a high rank among active chamber music organizations."

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

Serafin Conducts at Petrouchka Revival

Stravinsky Is Present; Mme. Galli and Bolm Have Leading Roles.

Igor Stravinsky was present the evening of March 13 at the Metropolitan Opera House to witness the revival of his ballet Petrouchka, conducted by Tullio Serafin. The ballet was staged by Adolph Bolm, who took the part of Petrouchka.

Writing of the score in the Telegram-Mail, Pitts Sanborn commented that "for the most part it is agreeable, diverting music, apt in its characterization, delightful in its instrumental coloring, of an individual sub-acid pathos." Lawrence Gilman of the Herald Tribune wrote that "hearing this irresistible music, so richly veracious, so completely achieved' one realizes it is "a work of authentic genius, unexampled and unstaled." According to Olin Downes (Times), the score "is one of Stravinsky's most original and inspired productions."

Mr. Serafin conducted, to quote Mr. Gilman, "as if he had led nothing but Stravinsky's music all his life." Pitts Sanborn wrote that "in general, Mr. Serafin's conducting, appreciative and charged with authority, deserves only cordial praise." In the World, Deems Taylor mentioned that his reading was "a masterly analysis of an extremely difficult score."

The writer in the Sun agreed that Mr. Serafin "absorbed and gave forth the spirit of the unique score" and added that Wilfred Pelletier deserved special praise for his performance of the difficult piano solo. Mr. Downes thought the conductor lacked "the nervous thrill, the incisiveness, and, apparently the imagination and authority which the work requires. This was surprising in so gifted a conductor."

Mr. Bolm embodied his part "with complete understanding and fine skill," according to Mr. Sanborn, and Rosina Galli gave a "cunningly formalized impersonation—the top notch of her own artistic achievement." Olin Downes commended them both for their expressive skill, and Mr. Gilman considered Mr. Bolm's staging "deft and canny" and his miming "well invented and often subtle in suggestion and communication. Miss Rosina Galli was a marvel of flexibility and delicately comedic grace."

Mr. Taylor and the Sun reviewer joined in commending them as well as the rest of the cast, which included Giuseppe Bonfiglio, Ottokar Bartik, Armando Agnini, Florence Rudolph, Rita de LePorte, Lilyan Ogden, Jessie Rogge, and Florence Glover.

The scenery, painted by the Russian, Serge Soudeikine, was liked by all the reviewers. According to Mr. Gilman the settings were "superb" and Mr. Sanborn noted the "vividness and quaint design of scenery and costumes." Mr. Soudeikine, to quote the Sun, "displayed a most vivacious fancy and a mastery of color." As Deems Taylor expressed it, he "combined gorgeous coloring, sensitive imagination and distinguished design, and managed to create a perfect illusion with hardly a single concession to realism. It was one of the evening's most stimulating contributions." Olin Downes admired the vividness and richness of the settings, and thought the costumes "vivid to the point of extravagance, as they should be."

Pagliacci, with Mme. Bori and Messrs. Johnson, Danise, and Tibbett followed Petrouchka.

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

CURT TAUCHER
German Tenor of the Metropolitan, Whose Fall in Siegfried Resulted in Injuries Which Kept Him From Several Scheduled Appearances in Last Week's Operas.

Will Pay Funeral Expenses

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has agreed to advance funds for the funeral expenses of Moritz Moszkowski, the Polish composer, who died before he could benefit by the $9,700 fund raised for him at the piano festival given last December at the Metropolitan Opera House by fifteen pianists. The decision of the company to give the cash value for the annuity, which had not yet become payable, was announced by Vice President Charles F. Ayres following a conference with Ernest Schelling, one of the organizers of the benefit concert.

Mary Garden Sails

Mary Garden, soprano of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, sailed on March 14 on the Aquitania for Europe. She will spend the summer at her villa in Monte Carlo.

Tibbett Appears in Recital in New York

Lawrence Tibbett, American baritone, was heard in recital at Carnegie Hall, New York, the evening of March 16. Beginning with Giordano's Caro mio Ben, he sang numbers by Handel, Gay, Schumann, Brahms, Verdi, Bridge, Somervell, Rachmaninoff, Moussorgsky and by Frank La Forge, who was his accompanist.

The singer presented, in the words of the Telegram-Mail reviewer, "an evening of vocal mastery, admirable diction and a veritable spectrum of dramatic color." The World found him "much at ease upon the concert stage, and the beauty of his voice and the excellence of his diction meet the test of recital singing with triumphant completeness. He displayed notable poise and style throughout his program."

The Herald Tribune writer considered that his voice, "when not pushed too far, is of an appealing quality, clear and smooth. His singing is intelligent and expressive, with climactic passages made amply dramatic." In the Times Mr. Tibbett was commended for "a manly voice of mellow resonance, range and clarity" and for the "dramatic intelligence" in his delivery of the Verdi air. The Post reviewer noted that his "good method, beautifully clear diction and beautiful tones lend themselves well to recital."

To quote the Sun, his tones "were well produced, always fluid and liquid, and his voice was used with skill. Mr. Tibbett has a well developed style of delivery. His voice is uneven in quality, especially in sustained passages, but last night he displayed surprising resources in volume and power of tone. His phrasing was good; his diction admirable, and there was plenty of warmth and color in his interpretations." This writer added that Mr. La Forge's "excellent accompaniments were important contributions to a thoroughly enjoyable occasion." Other reviewers were of the same opinion.

KA-REN-NI-O-KE
SUMMER MUSIC CAMP
of
CLARENCE ADLER
EMINENT PIANIST
at
LAKE PLACID
IN THE ADIRONDACKS
Address
137 WEST 86TH STREET
NEW YORK CITY

GIGLI

DUSOLINA GIANNINI
DRAMATIC SOPRANO
Management: Daniel Mayer
Aeolian Hall, New York City
STEINWAY PIANO
Victor Records

ANNA FITZIU
SOPRANO
Management: R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 23

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.: Canada, $6.00: Foreign Countries, $7.00
Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

New York Politics and Music

Evidence sufficient to put the brake of restraint upon Mayor Hylan's proposal to establish in New York City a Civic Music and Art Centre has been supplied by Mayor Hylan himself.

Hizzoner and City Chamberlain Berolzheimer, and the rest of Hizzoner's official crew who participate in such matters, have again demonstrated that they cannot keep politics out of whatever music the present City of New York administration may control. If the taxpayers of New York foot the bills for a concert authorized by one of the Hylanites acting for Hylan it is utilized to advertise Hylan. Hylan the bold, Hylan the friend (?) of art (?), is overlooking nothing which can contribute to keep his name before the New York public. It might be amusing if it had not become so wearisome; if the manoeuverings of Berolzheimer, et al, were not operating to the music disadvantage of New York people.

Readers of The Musical Digest will recall how the Goldman Band concerts (made possible last year through funds supplied by the Daniel and Murray Guggenheims) were for a time designated on the programs as "Mayor Hylan's Concerts." That was about as cool a piece of nerve as can be imagined. Only a politician-for-politics-only would resort to such procedure.

Now comes Berolzheimer, with a set of conditions for the Guggenheim families to accept . . . if they wish to have continued this coming summer the Goldman Band concerts.

Those conditions bear ear-marks of an attempt at political chastising of the Guggenheims for having dared, in 1924, to affront Hizzoner's publicity agent (Berolzheimer) in an effort to gain some good will for Hizzoner. Such a matter apparently didn't disturb Hizzoner any more than it disturbed Berolzheimer. They eat at the same political table and it is all in the day's work.

But that is just evidence enough to justify every effort to defeat the Hylan plan (formulated no doubt by the ever-active Berolzheimer) to establish in a remote spot in the Bronx the aforementioned Music and Art Centre, details of which have been published in the news columns of The Musical Digest.

That plan, as outlined, contained elements regarded by certain discerning persons as weak. The site for the proposed Centre is far removed from the greater population for whose benefits it is presumed to be designed. The music school idea, unless impartially and wisely administered, could only be a farce.

Municipal aid of music is highly desirable—but only if that aid be rightly employed. Mayor Hylan and his lieutenants in New York's municipal activities have not displayed by their conduct the right to the people's confidence in any music project they may propose. Because of that fact The Musical Digest is opposed to anything so elaborate as a Municipal Music and Art Centre—so long as John F. Hylan is New York's mayor.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

A MATTER which is often forgotten in the hearing and appreciation of music is the relation of the scale upon which a piece of music is composed to that upon which it is presented. Often a composition which is intrinsically beautiful will sound thin and ragged, no matter how perfect the performance, and will fail to create its mood simply because the hall in which it is played is too big.

As a general thing nowadays music auditoriums are too big for a large proportion of the older music. The difficulty of the conductor who wishes to present a varied program is therefore great. If he keeps an intimate composition of the classical school down to its correct size, he runs the risk of making it sound inane simply because there are loud pieces being played before and after it.

WHEN Leopold Stokowski conducted recently a Bach Suite for strings with flute obbligato he made an attempt to readjust the size of the work and the scale of its dynamics to the conditions in which he was playing it. To increase the number of strings was easy—he simply retained almost his full choirs. But what was to be done about the flute part? Obviously that could not be doubled.

The result was that the performance, regardless of its virtues, was out of proportion. Often the flute could not be heard at all, and much of the time when it could be heard it sounded weak and fragile, simply because one flute played much of the time in its lower range has no chance against a mass of fifty strings.

It would have been better to have diminished the strings to half and to have had them play more quietly than the Philadelphia Orchestra ever does play for more than a dozen consecutive measures. One could have avoided then the queer feeling when the strings took up a theme from the solo instrument, that they were sympathetically translating or interpreting an idea which the flute, poor chap, could not quite get across on account of an unfortunate weakness of breath and puniness of voice.

THE wholly admirable Metropolitan performance of Debussy's Pelleas and Melisande awoke similar thoughts. At the general rehearsal I sat in one of the front rows where the text of the play was clearly audible. That seemed to be the very best way to hear the music and to follow the action of the story. I must say that the smallness of the surrounding audience was in a way a pleasure too.

For public performances, where the majority of the audience is seated too far from the stage for even the most perfect enunciation to make the text clear, one has no recourse but to learn the words all by memory.

The regular subscription audiences are notoriously hopeless in their behavior. I have seen masses of them troop out before the Love-Death, for example. Why does anyone come to hear Tristan who does not want to reach the summit of its mood? One would imagine that the very exclusive audience of the general rehearsal would have been better disciplined. Perhaps it was to an extent, but even then there was considerable conversation, and the interludes during the changes of scene each time had to compete with gossip.

AS the popularity of artists increases and their clientele grows, the temptation to move into continually larger auditoriums is strong. It is hard upon a good chamber ensemble that the best artistic interests of its music demand performance in little halls, while an equally popular orchestra or singer can gain the profit of a full armory.

One would think that if a solo violinist can be heard in all parts of a large hall, four instruments equally powerful certainly will be clearly audible. In fact the effects of such an ensemble are harder to hear because the instruments as a general thing ought all be equally prominent, and in a way they interfere with each other.

When small string chamber groups play in larger auditoriums, one can frequently observe that they deal with the problem of being effective in the farthest reaches of the house by changing the emphasis of their playing from the ensemble to one solo instrument, usually the first violin. The other members of the group then subordinate themselves, perhaps unconsciously, and their music becomes wrenched out of proportion.

A first violin with a striking tone can achieve this transformation himself, purposely or otherwise, without the size of the hall being concerned at all. As ensemble music is composed, the continual emphasis of a single instrument is wrong. Pleasing music may remain, but there will be more—just as much as the composer intended—if the ensemble is perfectly balanced. Thus Cesar Franck's Sonata for violin and piano is beautiful music even if it is played as a violin piece with piano accompaniment (that is how it is usually heard), but it is better as a genuine duet.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

Communication

Editor Musical Digest:

You are undoubtedly already aware of the fact that by a mutual agreement dated December 15, 1924, all American and European steamship companies have decided to make no reductions in their prices to artists, people of social position and the like.

Naturally, these concessions of the steamship companies have been grossly imposed upon, but to the artist, who has always (with few exceptions) repaid the courtesy by giving his services at the ship's "concert," this decision has come as a severe blow and a great disappointment.

In very few cases are the winnings of artists during their season in America so great that they can afford the high prices of the ships to and from Europe, and in view of the mission of artists in life—that of bearers of culture—they should be given every help and encouragement.

That the name of a well known artist on the ship's list is of publicity value to the shipping companies we have proof enough in the daily accounts in the papers of who have sailed or arrived by the different ships—these lists are of course given out by the lines themselves.

If the steamship companies persist in refusing their old reductions, then it is the duty of every artist to refuse his services for the benefit of the companies' charities or their patrons' amusement. C. A.-T.

March 16.

Two in One

"But Not One!"—Declare Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, Duo-Pianists, in a Single Voice.

by ALEXANDER FRIED

"WHEREVER we go," declared Guy Maier and Lee Pattison emphatically, "we have been told in person and we have read in the newspapers that we play like one man with many fingers, and we don't like it! Our great pride is that although we play well together (permit us to quote our friends), each of us has retained his musical individuality."

The American duo-pianists supported each other in conversation beautifully, just as they do in their ensembles. I was convinced without a murmur and promised straightway not ever to say that Guy Maier and Lee Pattison played as one artist.

"But," I qualified, "you must explain. I heard you in a Bach concerto some time ago, and I was sure that in certain passages where you handed themes back and forth you did your very best to imitate exactly each other's tone and phrasing."

Mr. Pattison (he is the one with the youthful features and the graying hair) took a few bars rest, and Mr. Maier (he with the spectacles) developed the theme.

"You are right," he said. "In that piece we did. There is music and music, however. In much of our classical repertory we find that the composer's intention is apt to be to play cleverly on a theme, to give it from one instrument to the other, to have clever devices of fugato and stretto. If one is to regard this music in orchestral terms, one can think of this classical music as being arranged for small conservative orchestras of the type that Bach used in his suites. Orchestral color is the least of the effects employed, but design is almost everything.

"With modern music of two pianos it is much different. Here, when a composer gives a theme to each of the instruments in turn, the interpreter is likely to feel instinctively that he is implying some difference in tone quality."

Mr. Pattison leaped into the ensemble. "That is so," he said, "and we find that in the interpretation of such music a slight difference of treatment, in phrasing and dynamics, of the identical thematic material on the part of the two players is very effective. In fact, sometimes we think that an ideal arrangement for a two-piano team would be to employ instruments of different manufacture so that the tone quality of the pianos would be individual."

Mr. Maier took his cue: "And you must not think, while we are on this subject, that the ideal combination of pianists for an ensemble of our kind is one in which both temperaments are perfectly alike. That would never do. We two, for example, get along very well because we are so different. Pattison here is poetic. He supplies our combination with soul. I—I just bump along."

Mr. Pattison did not make any remark on this subject, but it was plain to see that he thought his partner somewhat more useful to the combination than simply to bump. Anyone who has heard the pair must agree.

"Doesn't it make trouble to decide on interpretation with this fundamental difference in temperament?" I asked.

GUY MAIER AND LEE PATTISON

"It makes work, of course," replied Mr. Pattison. "To have any sort of really good ensemble costs work, but we also are likely to have an advantage in the end in that two active opinions have worked on each other to bring about our final interpretation. And that is not fixed, mind you! Sometimes we play a piece one way, sometimes another, depending on the situation, on how we feel, on how we are carried along by our own moods. Good ensemble play consists of more than simply playing well together. It includes also the ability of each individual to sense and sympathize with his partner's attitude toward a piece of music at any moment without any premeditation at all. In the years we have been together we have learned to play with each other with all the elasticity of tempo and rhythm that we use when we play separately."

Mr. Maier saw a certain glint in my eye and leaped into the conversation. "You are going to ask us how we happened to come together," he said to me, "everyone does." I pleaded guilty.

"Nobody knows," was the answer. "We even don't know. Both of us studied with Schnabel abroad and intended to be soloists. Then we were in various branches of the service during the war. All of a sudden, when it was over, we decided to try a few concerts together there, and we did.

"Our first American concerts were in Boston in 1915-1916. Maybe we had to play together because neither of us had enough money to arrange a recital of his own, I don't know. As it was, it was difficult enough. We finally scraped our cash together and painfully made up the sum. . . . And here we are."

Incidentally all three of us were seated at the moment in one of the larger upper rooms in old Steinway Hall, where Messrs. Maier and Pattison were shortly to rehearse. The chamber was in semi-darkness, but through the twilight one could see a number of large paintings—one of Liszt at his piano, another of Beethoven among the trees, a third of Chopin in a salon—on the high walls.

"We have had our troubles," said Mr. Pattison, "and we have seen a kind of progress and change of taste among music lovers in the United States. Some years ago we found to an extent that the less sophisticated music public tended to regard the two-piano recital as about just twice as deadly as the one.

"Things are different now. The invasion of the country by the leading pianists of the world since the war has given Americans practice in hearing piano music, and gradually our instrument is becoming nearer and nearer to the solo violin and to the voice in popularity as a recital medium."

It was Mr. Maier's turn, and he took it. "The two-piano combination," he said, "has had some stunning things written for it at all stages of the history of music, and we have had the advantage of a very interesting repertory in building up an interest in this type of ensemble music. The classical composers before the symphonists turned out many suites and concertos for two keyboard instruments which can be effectively played on two pianos. Sometimes they wrote for two harpsichords, and later they composed to set off against each other the tone qualities of the old harpsichord and the new piano.

"The moderns are active too. Godowsky, Sowerby, Tailleferre, Bliss and Hill have written compositions for combinations of pianos, sometimes with orchestra, sometimes without. Most of them are vivacious and interesting. Incidentally we almost never play arrangements of important compositions originally written for other instruments. Our repertory is big enough."

"Many of the works which we play were written especially for us," put in Mr. Pattison, and Mr. Maier named several of them.

The latter went on, "There is a notion about that the best way for two artists to become good ensemble players is for them always to play with each other and practically never with anyone else or alone. We do not find that so. A good part of the off-season we spend apart. We enjoy that immensely." I took it that Mr. Maier was jocular, but in any case his partner in music was an equally good partner in humor, for he assented to the sentiment.

"We find that individual activity is good for our ensemble work. It keeps us alive and interested. We do not get tired of each other, and when we join again we both have new ideas. Both of us appear from time to time in our own recitals. We teach in separate schools, I at Ann Arbor, Pattison in Chicago. When it comes time to join again for our concert work after a period of separation we are actually glad to see each other."

Mr. Maier looked at Mr. Pattison and obviously he was glad to see him. Mr. Pattison looked at Mr. Maier, and obviously HE was glad to see HIM. Both looked at two pianos, which, I suppose, looked in their way at each other and at their two masters. The duo-pianists with one motion moved to their respective stations. They commenced to practice, playing as one man—with two personalities.

Stravinsky Returns to France

Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer who has been touring the United States as guest conductor and pianist, sailed for Paris on March 14.

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

GEORGE PERKINS RAYMOND
Tenor
CONCERT—RECITAL—ORATORIO
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1423 Broadway, New York City

B O N C I

. . . . . "The world's foremost tenor took the audience, filling the Metropolitan Opera House, by storm." . . . . .

—North American, Philadelphia, Pa., February 15

"BONCI STAR OF ADMIRABLE PERFORMANCE OF BALLO IN MASCHERA"

"With Alessandro Bonci in the role of Riccardo, as the featured member of an excellent cast, a performance of Verdi's 'Un Ballo in Maschera' was given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Saturday evening . . . the famous Italian tenor was received with great enthusiasm and the audience gave its approval to the performance as a whole. The return of Bonci after an absence of several years was a noteworthy event, as was attested by the continued rounds of applause to greet him, which held up the performance for several minutes, an enthusiasm that was emphasized after all of his important numbers, particularly the barcarolle, 'Di'tu se fedele' (The Waves Will Bear Me) in the second act, which was inimitably sung.

"Bonci, of course, was the 'star' of the occasion. He was, as ever, ingratiating in person and manner. His voice is as flexible and appealing as ever, and there is real joy in listening to such artistic singing, unforced, refined and marked by a rare degree of spontaneity and sincerity of feeling."

Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, Pa., February 16.

"Alessandro Bonci, heralded as Caruso's successor and the world's foremost tenor, took the audience, filling the Metropolitan Opera House, by storm last night in the role of Riccardo in Verdi's brilliant 'Un Ballo in Maschera'. His voice cleaved its way thru the vast silent sea of humanity and left it in tumultuous waves of applause. While encore after encore called Bonci before the curtain at the end of each of the four acts, especially after the second and fourth acts, the audience was more than generous in its appreciation of the other artists."

North American, Philadelphia, Pa., February 15.

Bonci will appear again at the Metropolitan Opera House in Philadelphia on Saturday evening, March 28th, singing the role of Nemorino in Donizetti's opera Elisir d'Amore.

"BONCI SCORES BRILLIANT SUCCESS"

"Verdi's opera, 'Un Ballo in Maschera,' which, incidentally, will be 66 years old next Tuesday, was given a Philadelphia 'revival' last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House before a large audience and proved to be a great success. The cast was excellent, including Alessandro Bonci, still a brilliant artist with a method of voice handling and control which few singers have, as Riccardo. Mr. Bonci scored a brilliant success throughout the performance and showed to what lengths real art in singing may be developed in the management of the voice and general technique. The concerted number at the close of the second act had to be repeated and all through the opera he was received with every manifestation of approval which was deserved."

Public Ledger, Philadelphia, Pa., February 15.

"OLD FAVORITE'S NEW TRIUMPH. BONCI GIVEN OVATION BY AUDIENCE"

"Alessandro Bonci, long a stranger to music-lovers of this city, but still a great favorite here, was welcomed enthusiastically last evening, when, at the Metropolitan Opera House, he was seen and heard in Verdi's opera, 'The Masked Ball.' His first entrance upon the scene was the signal for an ovation that was long continued and each aria that he sang—and he sang each divinely — brought a new outburst of applause. One of the trickiest of arias is that in the second scene of the opera, when the tenor must assume a care-free laughter as he sings. It was a superb rendition that Bonci gave and, what with the ensemble that so ably supported him there was such a wealth of melody that the audience was stirred to shouts of approval and there were demands for repetition that had to be granted. Bonci still remains one of world's greatest tenors."

Philadelphia Record, February 15.

Bonci's Vocal Studio

in New York is located at the Majestic Hotel Central Park West and Seventy-second Street

KNABE PIANO USED

Address all communications directly to Signor Bonci, Hotel Majestic, 72nd Street and Central Park West, New York City. Telephone Endicott 1900

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

SINGING, a Treatise for Teachers and Students, is the title of a book by Herbert Witherspoon which has just been issued from the press of G. Schirmer. It is in two parts: the first dealing in a general manner with various matters relating to the technique and the art of singing, the second portion treating illustratively of the author's method of teaching.

The volume is physically compact, and so arranged as to be visually attractive and inviting to read. The phraseology is simple and clear, the attitude of the writer generally broad in his view of the subject matter and of the ideas and opinions of others.

Because of his prominence in his field, Mr. Witherspoon's book becomes an important contribution to the published literature on singing—a literature which, as he himself points out, represents a diversification of attitudes towards vocal technique and the teaching of it.

NO ATTEMPT will be made in this consideration of Mr. Witherspoon's book to proffer an opinion as to its contents. They will assuredly invite widespread affirmation, just as, in different circles, a contrary verdict may be set up. But that is to be expected for any writing having to do with so elusive a subject as singing. Acknowledged experts disagree amongst themselves over what constitutes its fundamentals.

What is interesting is the actual recording of the professional beliefs of a pedagogue who has achieved distinction in his craft, and the elucidation of his practises in his daily work.

In his approach to his subject material Mr. Witherspoon reveals the analytical and trained mind. He seeks, manifestly, to exhibit tolerance for the opinions of others even in his utterance of views he has reached through his years of activity as a concert and opera singer, and a teacher of singing on both its technical and interpretative sides.

Clearly meant to be represent conclusions arrived at after much study and experience, this book possesses the further charm of direct and constructive expression. One carries away the feeling, after reading it, that the author has written sincerely.

CHAPTER I is devoted to the purpose of the Witherspoon book, "the dangers of specializing," and "technique and expression are inseparable." The acquiring of technique, the laryngologist, the separation of technique from expression, empiricism versus science, and the laws of the vocal organs form Chapter 2.

The primes of speech and tone, language, breath, resonance, actions of vocal organs, pronunciation, sensation, diagnosis, hygiene, exercise, diet, pupil and teacher, ethics, repertoire for study, and fads and fancies in the teaching of singing are embraced in the remaining seven chapters which make up the first part of the book.

The breath (with illustrative figures); the vocal organs and their action; anatomy of the vocal organs; action and reaction; table of faults; the lift of the breath; phonetics; exercises recommended after the removal of tonsils; how to remove nodes; habit and incorrect action due to disease; empirical ideas; ethics; and practical vocal exercises are embraced in the seven chapters forming the second part of this book.

BOXED, on a single page opposite the first chapter, appears: "The object of art is expression." "The essence of expression is imagination." "The control of imagination is form." "The 'medium' for all three is technique."

At the outset the author arrays himself as opposed to the teaching of singing by localized control. He states his belief in the need of a book, "somewhat in the nature of a text-book, useful alike to teacher and pupil, which will show the natural laws governing the voice organs, the established and accepted facts upon which these laws depend, the best means of insuring obedience to these laws, and the faulty results due to disobedience. I have been a close student of the existing literature on the human voice, but I know of no such book."

Mr. Witherspoon then classifies existing books treating of the singing voice into: Those of the "local effort" school; those advocating fads and fancies; and those more or less empirical in their ideas, as gathered by men and women who are not prejudiced.

THE AUTHOR declares that "There is only one way to sing: with obedience to natural law. If we disobey the law we must pay the price." He then asserts that "The American mind is not an obedient mind, but an enquiring mind. The American pupil is certain to ask 'WHY?' at every turn of the road, and the teacher must be ready with the reason, or fail."

Dangers of specialization and of superficiality are pointed out in this book, which brings its writer to emphasizing his belief that "thoroughness, then, is paramount." He holds intuition, the "singing sense," to be "a large and important factor * * * and any system of education which interferes with this singing sense is bound to fail."

Terming art "a noble calling" Mr. Witherspoon warns significantly: "But woe betide the singer who works for money alone, yes, for glory alone, for he is sure to fail."

He stresses also the "tirade about present-day conditions in comparison with the glorious past," which he terms as of no use. "Perhaps," he observes, "if we heard the singers of a century or two ago we should not care for them."

OFFERING material which he believes to be new, Mr. Witherspoon writes that "Part of the object of this book is to attempt to make these laws [nature's] and their actions clearly understood."

And with respect to imagination in the singing art he feels that it "enters even into the singing of scales and exercises." Thereupon is consideration given to one of the chief difficulties which the voice educator has to treat with: "The teacher of singing deals with the half-visible, the half-unseen."

Analytical scrutiny is given by the author to the importance of the "simple laws of co-ordination which must be obeyed." He attaches great importance also to the exercising by the teacher of "hearing" well.

But the interesting attention to the many fundamentals of the technical side of singing is not limited to those matters alone. Breath, the various resonances, pronunciation, and the mouth all have their places in this book . . . and diagnosis occupies pages which have clearly been given careful thought.

Farther along in the volume may be found subjects of outstanding value in the consideration of singing. There is much practical treatment of hygiene, diet, and the care of the throat; and many will find in the two pages set apart for repertoire for study matters to dwell upon.

WHAT is likely to stimulate amusement in the reader, in addition to supplying information not commonly so assembled, is the section devoted to Fads and Fancies in the Teaching of Singing. Fifty-two of these fads are detailed by the author: some of them representing practises in more or less widespread use, and therefore entitled, at least, to respectful attention, the others seemingly with little reasonableness to them.

Valuable too is the Table of Faults, which classifies them into those hearable and those visible; then a table in which detailed analysis is made of the faults touched upon.

Mr. Witherspoon's book is, in one way, an assembling of material (with which he of course agrees) which has appeared in the books of other writers —most of them of previous times. And it should arouse amongst singing teachers and the pupil fraternity a high degree of interest.

AMERICANS are surely "coming," musically. Every little while one meets with some new bit of evidence to show the way the wind is blowing. Nor is it wholly in the interpretative field, either; the creative members of the craft are meeting with recognition, the latest to prompt gratification being accorded Deems Taylor and Theodore Stearns, both music chroniclers for New York daily newspapers . . . the former writing of music happenings for the Morning World, the latter, for the Telegraph.

After listening to the New York Philharmonic play the Taylor Looking Glass suite, Tullio Serafin (who followed the performance with a score in his hands) remarked his amazement that so fine a piece of music could have been created in the United States. He meant it as a great compliment.

I am able to state that Mr. Gatti-Casazza has suggested to Mr. Taylor that he concern himself with an opera, which, when it is completed, the Metropolitan Opera management would be happy to examine and consider for production.

MR. TAYLOR has not yet written a serious opera, and I am informed that he is not altogether certain how well pleased he will be with such a first effort. But it is understood that he will take advantage of the opportunity thus afforded; and it may be that he will be as successful in this idiom as he has been in writing for orchestra.

Mr. Stearns, whose Snow Bird was presented a year or more ago by the Chicago Civic Opera Association, is fortunate in having the backing of his newspaper in finishing his score of the opera Atlantis. And now Mr. Stearns has been looking through certain works of Edgar Allan Poe in a search for a libretto suitable for still another opera.

It is to be hoped that both these American composers will acquit themselves in their newest tasks in a manner helpful both to themselves and the cause of which they are a part. The native musician has experienced a hard time of it, and for years; so it is right and proper that conditions should be undergoing a gradual change . . . at least for those whose talents and energies merit being ushered to the Door of Opportunity.

SINCE AMERICAN OPERA is a pertinent subject it is fitting to call attention to the tea and musicale held recently at the Chicago Fortnightly Club by the American Opera Society, which is, as many people know, the organization of which Mrs. Edith Rockefeller McCormick is the honorary head . . . Mrs. Archibald Freer being the active executive officer.

While I have not received details of what happened at the above mentioned function I am informed, unofficially, that certain matters of an encouraging nature happened. Among those who were concerned in it are Mesdames McCormick and Freer, and Mrs. Louise K. Boyeson, Erich Gerstenberg, Mrs. Thatcher Hoyt, Mrs. Joseph B. Long, Mrs. Ogden T. McClurg, Mrs. Calvin A. Whyland, Mrs. Russell Wilson, Mrs. Howard Willett, Mrs. Howard Spaulding, Jr., and Mrs. Americus V. Callahan.

As has been observed before in these columns, one day Mrs. McCormick will elect to carry forward the American Opera Society in a well ordered and fully organized way. When that moment arrives opera in English, and by a company consisting of as many American artists as can qualify to the standards demanded, will become an actuality.

AN ACTIVE DRIVE is under way to swing into a still stronger position the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. I was interested in listening to what President G. D. Markham had to say in the matter, during a chat I had with him in New York a few days ago. Mr. Markham, who rightly is termed "the father" of St. Louis's orchestra, is deeply gratified over the increasing appreciation which is being shown for the welfare of the society.

And only recently one hundred St. Louis women assembled in the home of Mrs. Edward A. Faust, where they formed themselves in a feminine Committee of One Hundred . . . to work for the orchestra.

Mrs. Joseph W. Lewis acted as temporary chairman at the meeting during which Mrs. J. J. Barton, Jr., of Philadelphia (principal guest of the afternoon) was the principal speaker.

But Conductor Rudolph Ganz had some pertinent matters to touch on, one being the aid which he feels has come to the orchestra through the broadcasting of certain of its concerts.

I look for distinct strides to be made by the St. Louis organization during the coming season. It is well on its way to the accomplishment of things which its well-wishers have for a long time felt were justifiable.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

New York Symphony Society

Dusolina Giannini as soloist and the presentation of Daniel Gregory Mason's Symphony in C minor were the features of the most recent programs of the New York Symphony Orchestra, those on March 12 and 17.

According to Olin Downes of the Times, Miss Giannini delivered Weber's Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster, with "a breadth and authority that matched the spirit of the composition. . . . There was temperament and imagination in the treatment of Weber's music; there was the manner unmistakably indicative of an artist with the instinct for operatic music." Mr. Downes warned the singer of the danger of proceeding too rapidly and forcing her voice, for "nothing should be permitted to interfere with the beauty, the richness and the dramatic quality of such a voice."

Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) thought that at times Miss Giannini "sang as only the great sing" although there was a certain "unevenness of immaturity" still occasionally apparent. F. D. Perkins of the Herald Tribune found "her remarkable volume of tone, her smooth, soaring high notes were thoroughly in evidence." In the opinion of the World reviewer she sang "with a wide range of expressiveness and a certain golden maturity in her opulent voice which fulfilled the first promise of her early concerts." The Sun writer admired her "sweeping style and dramatic intensity" and asserted that "on the whole it was a brilliant piece of singing" in spite of some hardness in her lower medium.

The quasi-novelty on the program was Braunfel's Fantastic Apparitions on a Theme by Berlioz which was played here in New York before. To quote the World it was "a more or less skillfully woven fabric of reminiscent themes." The overture to Oberon, and Smetana's Vltava completed the program conducted by Bruno Walter.

At the Sunday concert, Mr. Walter conducted Mr. Mason's Symphony, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Liszt's Les Preludes. The Mason Symphony, which was heard here in 1922 under Josef Stransky, received general commendation from the reviewers, who considered it serious, well constructed, and effective in mood, a composition which had an emotional message to deliver and delivered it clearly.

Christian Gives Wanamaker Recital

Palmer Christian, organist of the University of Michigan, gave a recital in the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York, on March 12. To quote the Herald Tribune, Mr. Christian proved, as he did in his earlier appearances, "to be a skilled, expressive master of his instrument."

Denishawn Dancers

Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn and the Denishawn Dancers gave their first New York performance of the season at Carnegie Hall last Tuesday. According to the Sun, "the performance as a whole was delightful. The rare skill of the solo dancers, the beauty, grace and finish of the ensemble work and the harmonious coloring of scenes and costumes all united in a production bringing splendid tribute to the cause of American art."

Deems Taylor wrote in the World that he admired Miss St. Denis for her clever program-building, her sense of time as well as of rhythm, her ability to forget herself in the interest of the dance, and her sense of humor. The Post reviewer found the program "characterized by originality and ingenuity," and that Miss St. Denis and Mr. Shawn impress "their own vivid and attractive personalities" on everything they do. They were lauded not only as "excellent" dancers, but as "fine teachers and genuine originators."

In the opinion of F. D. Perkins of the Herald-Tribune the evening "lacked nothing in variety, geographical or emotional, and was distinctly more than a mere display of colorful costume and agile, graceful motion." The Telegram-Mail writer commented that the various numbers were done "as this sterling and progressive ensemble always does them."

The novelty was a rhythmical pantomime without music, Tragica. The Times chronicler expressed the prevailing opinion of this attempt when he wrote that, although it had a certain rhythmic effect, it was too long and vague in its meaning. All the reviewers commented on the humor and cleverness of Eastwood Lane's sketches, Crapshooter, Around the Hall, Gringo Tango, and Boston Fantasy—1854.

Levitzki Plays Season Farewell

Mischa Levitzki, at his last New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall March 14, introduced a Waltz Burlesque by George Hopkins, young American composer. According to the Sun, it "proved to be a well written work, savoring of Strauss and possibly Chopin, and in execution calling for bravura style." Mr. Levitzki's playing won its usual praise in the press.

N. Y. Hears Mme. d'Alvarez Again

Marguerite d'Alvarez gave her last New York recital of the season at Town Hall last Tuesday evening. The Post reviewer thought her program "afforded her rich voice, with its wealth of coloring and expression, full range, to the delight of a good sized audience." The World reported that vocally the recital was "uneven" and the other reviewers did not find Mme. d'Alvarez in her best vein.

James Friskin

Bach's Goldberg Variations were the main offering of James Friskin in his piano recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, Wednesday evening. W. J. Henderson (Sun) wrote that the group of variations, although it takes forty minutes to play, "is extraordinarily interesting from beginning to end, and reveals a marvelous fecundity of invention."

According to Mr. Henderson, Mr. Friskin "has an abundance of technique and he presented the composition not only with amazing fluency and swiftness, but also with clarity in the rapid passages and in the slow tones with much beauty of tone and style." Herbert F. Peyser commented in the Telegram-Mail that his performance "was admirable in every respect."

The Herald Tribune writer considered his playing "brilliant, smooth and clear-cut as he pursued the theme through its many metamorphoses, with a light, but distinct performance of the numerous ornaments." The Variations, in the opinion of the Times commentator, were played "with a smooth and flowing technique and a delicate appreciation of their dexterity."

Debutante Gives Second Concert

Laura Stroud, young American pianist, who made her New York debut earlier this season, made her second appearance at Town Hall last Tuesday. The Herald Tribune commentator noted that she showed "a well developed, agile technique and marked poise." In the Times Miss Stroud was commended for the "quick, breezy energy" she brought to the recital, and W. J. Henderson of the Sun asserted that "she has well schooled fingers and is evidently blessed with musical taste," although "her art rarely penetrated beneath the surface." Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) found "fluency and facile charm" in her playing, but lack of imagination.

Miss del Vecchio Assists Society

The fourth concert by the American Orchestral Society, under the auspices of the People's Institute, was given at Cooper Union, New York, Sunday evening. Chalmers Clifton conducted Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Tschaikowsky's B flat minor Concerto for piano and orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Dance of the Buffoons, from his opera, Snegourotchka. Bianca del Vecchio was the soloist in the Tschaikowsky Concerto.

Miss Harvis—Mr. Wolkow

Charlotte Harvis, soprano, and Frederick Wolkow, tenor, were heard in a joint recital in Town Hall, New York, Wednesday evening. Included among Miss Harvis' offerings were songs by La Forge, Burgmein, Verdi, and a duet with Mr. Wolkow, who sang German Lieder, some Jewish songs and others by Donaudy and Durante.

To quote the Sun, Miss Harvis "revealed a small voice of pleasant quality. Its tone color was fresh and immature, and these very characteristics were used to advantage in some of her light offerings. Mr. Wolkow had a voice of good quality, but he did not use it with skill. His tone was sonorous and expressive, but his vocal technique was unequal to the demands of his offerings."

The Times reviewer mentioned that Miss Harvis made her "most telling success" in Caro Nome, "in which she displayed the runs, staccati and timbre necessary." According to the Herald Tribune, Mr. Wolkow displayed a voice in the quieter passages "of smooth and very agreeable quality, but apt to assume a metallic timbre in louder top notes." This chronicler recorded that Miss Harvis sang "with a pleasantly fresh tone, clear when not hard worked, but then inclined to hardness."

Penelope Davies Sings

Penelope Davies, mezzo-soprano, gave a recital March 16 in the new Chickering Hall, New York. Coenraad V. Bos accompanied her in American, English, French, German and Scandinavian songs. According to F. D. Perkins of the Herald Tribune, Miss Davies displayed a voice "of good size and agreeable freshness," and made a "pleasing impression" on the large audience. The Times reported that she proved to be a singer "of bright and animated style in Easter carols and light airs." Other newspapers did not report the concert analytically.

Harpists to Convene in Detroit

The fifth annual convention of the National Association of Harpists will take place in Detroit, Mich., on March 30 and 31.

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ALLEN McQUHAE
TENOR
RECITALS—ORATORIOS—ORCHESTRAS
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Bldg., 57th St. & B'way, N. Y. C.
Brunswick Records

CLARENCE ADLER
PIANIST
Instruction for Advanced Pupils
137 West 86th St. New York Telephone Schuyler 3580

PERSIS COX
Pianist and Teacher
Address: Pierce Building, Copley Sq., Boston, Mass.; or Dana Hall, Wellesley, Mass.
Baldwin Piano Welte-Mignon Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1924
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. New York City Telephone Circle 8815

EFREM ZIMBALIST
EMINENT VIOLINIST
EXCLUSIVE MANAGEMENT S. HUROK, Inc., Aeolian Hall New York
Victor Records
Steinway Piano

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

Siegfried

Curt Taucher's indisposition, resulting from his recent fall on the stage of the Metropolitan, necessitated the substitution of Siegfried for Tristan und Isolde the evening of March 14.

The title role was sung by Rudolf Laubenthal for the first time. Other new members of the cast were Karin Branzell as Erda and Max Bloch as Mime. The other roles were sung by Mmes. Larsen-Todsen and Ryan, and by Messrs. Schorr, Schuetzendorf, and Gustafson. Artur Bodanzky conducted.

Writing in the Telegram-Mail, Herbert F. Peyser commented that Mr. Laubenthal "acquitted himself with no small credit" and that his work "seemed rather tentative and unresourceful, but may be trusted to develop in essential details." Mr. Peyser considered him a personable Siegfried and thought that he sang with "considerably more confidence and success as the opera progressed." According to the Herald Tribune, "he is young and lithe and personable, and last night he suggested effectively the impetuosity and naivete of Mime's exuberant ward."

The Sun chronicler thought he was inclined at first to overact, "but he sang the music with freshness and a full fluid tone that caught more than a hint of romanticism and lyric beauty."

According to this writer, Mr. Bloch's Mime "was a good, competent characterization, well sung, well acted and convincing." Mr. Peyser thought it a "competent, workmanly impersonation which had some really striking moments in the final colloquy with Siegfried." Other writers commended him, and Mme. Branzell was praised for her work.

Mme. de Hidalgo as Gilda

Rigoletto was given at the Metropolitan Opera House on March 6 for the last time this season with a cast familiar, except for Elvira de Hidalgo who sang the role of Gilda. Mr. Serafin conducted.

According to Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail), "her singing of Gilda had commendable qualities. She disclosed a feeling for style; her phrasing, if sometimes personal unto herself, had skill; her treatment of ornament was often eminently neat." Mr. Sanborn added that often, however, she sacrificed spontaneity. The Sun reviewer said Mme. de Hidalgo was "in possession of her best vocal abilities, which are of pleasing quality but not of distinction. She sang her music creditably and conventionally portrayed the sufferings of a helpless victim of circumstances."

The Herald Tribune writer considered that she sang the role "with no little fluency and won prolonged applause for her top notes in Caro Nome. . . . Her acting fared well." The chronicler in the Times remarked that her voice "was brilliant to hardness."

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of Pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

Miss Rozsi Varady

At her only New York recital of the season in Town Hall, March 16, Rozsi Varady, young Hungarian cellist, played a new work by her modernist countryman, Zoltan Kodaly—his Hungarian Airs. Miss Varady was assisted by Arthur Loesser, accompanist.

The Times spoke of her "as a fluent technician and the possessor of an easy and graceful style. Her tone was remarkably good and she played her lighter passages with animation and precision." Qualities in her performance which were admired by the writer in the Sun were her "agreeable tone, which takes on richer hues in slower passages" and her style which nas "skill and grace."

According to the commentator in the Herald Tribune, Miss Varady "proved a first-class cellist, with notable technical skill and a tone of full, canorous quality, especially in the depth and resonance of its lower notes. In one or two swift passages a slight drought affected some of the higher ones, but otherwise her tone had unimpeded flow."

Miss Elizabeth Hoeppel

Elizabeth Hoeppel, German contralto, made her first American appearance at Aeolian Hall, New York, on March 15. According to the Herald Tribune, Miss Hoeppel displayed a voice "of true contralto quality, of notable power and resonance, and a tone generally clear, though sometimes assuming a certain metallic timbre." William Reddick accompanied.

The writer in the Sun liked the "power and fine natural quality" of her voice as well as her "dramatic instinct and knowledge of style." He added that "her singing had a tendency to false intonation and it had little variety of color. Her stage presence was attractive."

To quote the Telegram-Mail chronicler, she disclosed a "heavy voice of real contralto timbre that proved to possess some worthy qualities, once freed from the effects of initial nervousness." The Times writer asserted that her "fine contralto was enhanced by a beautiful stage presence. . . . Mme. Hoeppel did not infuse much variety in her expression, but she certainly possesses a voice of more than usual value."

Boy Pianist Strengthens Impression

Shura Cherkassky, the thirteen-year-old Russian pianist who made his New York debut last November, played here again in Aeolian Hall March 15. In the opinion of the Times reviewer, his "clear and clean" technique was praiseworthy, and "the facility of his right hand in particular was remarkable, while his gift for phrasing placed him far beyond his years." Other writers commended his technique and interpretative ability.

Francis Rogers
Concert Baritone and Teacher of Singing
Member American Academy of Teachers of Singing
144 East 62d St., New York City

Michael Zacharewitsch

His first American recital was given by Michael Zacharewitsch, Czech violinist, in Aeolian Hall the evening of March 13. Mr. Zacharewitsch was accompanied by Erno Balogh.

According to the World, the newcomer combined "technical efficiency with an earnest devotion to the varying moods of his numbers." The Herald Tribune writer found him "an accomplished violinist, with a tone of ample volume and notable smoothness, especially in the lower notes, which had a pleasing rich, mellow quality in the slow movement of the Elgar Sonata." This commentator said he played with "marked technical brilliance" although with a "slightly dry" tone.

The Times reported that the artist "proved at once his technical dexterity and musical intelligence." The chronicler in the Sun wrote that he "revealed few qualities of distinction or brilliancy, although he was obviously an artist of sound musicianship and considerable talent. His technique was impressive, his bowing firm and vigorous and his readings were confident and consistently well played." This reviewer found "little variety or sparkle" in his coloring, although "most of his playing was noteworthy for intelligent and competent workmanship rather than for any qualities of imagination or emotion."

Miss Edna Thomas

Edna Thomas, the Louisiana mezzo-soprano, gave a second recital of Southern songs in the Booth Theatre, New York, on the evening of March 8. This program also included Southern street cries, creole melodies and negro spirituals. Miss Thomas, who was assisted at the piano by Mary Hyams, spoke in explanation of the numbers on her program from time to time.

The reviewers commented on the increasingly good impression which Miss Thomas has made on each successive appearance. She is not "a fad," reported the Mail-Telegram, "but a fast-developing institution." The "entertainment was delightful," said both the Sun and Herald Tribune reviewers, and the Post writer thought it his "good fortune" to hear this authority on Southern songs sung as Miss Thomas "has heard them sung by their creators."

Richard Fuchs-Jerin

An all-Beethoven program was played by Richard Fuchs-Jerin, German pianist, at Aeolian Hall, New York, on March 12. Included were four sonatas and the Thirty-two Variations in C minor.

According to the Sun reviewer, the pianist "revealed in his playing the art of a sound and conscientious musician, possessed of a sensitive touch, with an intelligent insight into Beethoven's music. . . . His tone was full and sonorous and never hard." This writer found little imagination in his work, and, although his art was "always intelligent," his playing "lacked the inner spark of distinction." He added that his legato was smooth and fluid, and he showed "a well developed sense of structure and continuity."

The Times referred to him as "an experienced and seasoned musician" and the chronicler in the Herald Tribune thought that "vigor and authority marked his playing, a tone of canorous quality in calmer passages and a liking, it seemed, for high speed in stormier ones, sometimes at the expense of note-for-note accuracy." Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail wrote that "he displayed academic correctness, but little else."

Tommy Thomson

An unusual program was played by Tommy Thomson, Dutch pianist, in his American debut at Town Hall, New York, on March 12. It included numbers by Reger, Cyril Scott, Busoni, Alkan, Wagner, Elert, Bisquerri, Sapereira, and Kryten.

Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) wrote that Mr. Thomson "played with considerable beauty of touch, a sensitive command of tone color, technical clarity and unexceptionable taste. The young man has palpable qualities of imagination and delicate musical feeling." His recital gave "artistic pleasure" to the Sun commentator, who wrote that "his performance had musical intelligence and appreciation above the average. Technically he was well equipped, his piano tone was generally good and his style varied and often brilliant."

Mr. Thomson's "brilliant technique" was commended in the Times, and the Herald Tribune writer found him "a well versed pianist, with a tone of resonance and shading and well polished technique, knowing, it appeared, just what he wanted and being able to produce it."

Mme. Marie Gabrielle LESCHETIZKY
WILL CONDUCT MASTER CLASSES THIS SUMMER IN PARIS AT ECOLE LESCHETIZKY, 76, AVENUE MALAKOFF
RECITAL TOUR 1925-26 NOW BOOKING
Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, 250 West 57th St., New York

DOROTHY MILLER DUCKWITZ
AMERICAN PIANIST
Will accept a limited number of pupils
CHICKERING PIANO WELTE-MIGNON RECORDS
Management Dorothy Miller Duckwitz, 145 West 77th St., New York City

RHYS MORGAN
THE WELSH TENOR
Management: ROGER DE BRUYN, 1540 Broadway, N. Y. C.
DR. J. O. HOWELLS, Associate

ERNESTINE SCHUMANN HEINK
Exclusive Management, S. Hurok, Inc., Aeolian Hall, New York
STEINWAY PIANO- VICTOR RECORDS
KATHERINE HOFFMAN, Accompanist
FLORENCE HARDEMAN, Violinist

Three Pianists Aid In Orchestra Concert

Maier, Pattison, and Shattuck Play Ensemble Music With Chicago Symphony.

Chicago, March 17.—Three pianists were heard as assisting artists with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, Friday afternoon. They were Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the duo-pianists, and Arthur Shattuck, who joined them in J. S. Bach's Concerto for three pianos and string orchestra. Messrs. Maier and Pattison also played an unfamiliar two-piano concerto by Arthur Bliss, and one by P. E. Bach.

Glenn Dillard Gunn wrote in the Herald Examiner that their performance was a "masterpiece of ensemble. Unanimity of intention in tone values, in inflection, in tempo variations set a standard, both technical and musical." According to Mr. Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, "the pianists presented their parts with clear technical precision and with sharp accents . . . The soloists all proved themselves virtuosos on the piano and were greeted with enthusiasm by the audience." The Bliss Concerto was given a "brilliant technical performance" by Messrs. Maier and Pattison, he added. Other writers agreed.

The attention of Edward Moore (Tribune) was held from the beginning to end by the Bliss work, and Karleton Hackett of the Post found the music "entertaining, very clever rhythmically, with surprising tone shadings, and brilliantly played." Mr. Rosenfeld found in it "no consistent melody, nothing that approaches form" although it possesses "a certain rhythmic steadiness." To Mr. Gunn it was a "fascinating combination; jaunty, colorful, fantastic." Mr. Stock conducted in addition Schumann's Spring Symphony and Strauss' Don Juan.

* * *

"A stirring and successful debut," according to Mr. Moore, was made by Rae Bernstein, pianist, in her appearance as soloist at the popular concert of the orchestra last week. Mr. Gunn wrote that her playing of the Beethoven C minor Concerto "had every technical and musical virtue to commend it." Miss Bernstein was winner of the contest under the auspices of the Society of American Musicians.

D. EDWARD PORTER
Associate Manager of the New York Philharmonic Society, Who Is Retiring From This Position in Order to Take Up the Management of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Rosenfeld admired her "sure and firm technique," excellent tone shading, and appreciation and understanding of Beethoven's style. Karleton Hackett observed that there were "understanding of the music, rhythmic accent and clean technique in her playing."

* * *

At the concert of the Chicago theatre yesterday under the direction of Nathaniel Finston, the soloist was Stell Anderson, pianist. To quote Mr. Rosenfeld, in the Liszt E flat Concerto she "earned for herself much praise for her admirable interpretation of this Concerto and her brilliant technical display." The Post reviewer lauded the "brilliance of her playing."

Bach Festival in May

Bethlehem, Pa., March 18.—The Bach Festival will be held this year on Friday and Saturday, May 29 and 30. The Christmas Oratorio will be sung on Friday, and the Mass in B minor, on Saturday, each to be given twice.

The soloists of the festival will be Mildred Faas, soprano; Mabelle Addison, contralto; Nicholas Douty, tenor, and Charles Trowbridge Tittmann, bass.

JOSEPH SCHWARZ
BARITONE
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA CO.
Management:
Edna Richolson Sollitt
501 Oakdale Ave., Chicago
KIMBALL PIANO

INA BOURSKAYA
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Metropolitan Opera Company—Chicago Civic Opera Company
Concert Management: S. HUROK, INC. Aeolian Hall, New York City

M U Z I O
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Musical Chicago En Courant

Opera Company Returns After Seven Weeks' Trip; English Opera Performances Planned for Windy City.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, March 17.

THE Chicago Civic Opera Company reached home Sunday night from its spring tour. Since leaving home seven weeks ago last Saturday night, the company has visited twelve cities, traveled just short of five thousand miles, and given fifty-two performances. The longest stop was the first, two weeks in Boston; then the company moved on to Washington and Baltimore and in a generally Southwestern direction as far South as Dallas, Tex., and up to Tulsa, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and finally closing in Milwaukee, giving two, three and four performances in each place.

The cost of the undertaking has been $760,000, entirely met by local guarantors in each of the cities visited, making an average of about $14,600 for each peformance. In most places the guarantors were called on for little or none of their guarantee. Milwaukee played in bad luck. The worst blizzard and snowstorm of the year chose the first two days of the engagement, making roads impassable for a radius of fifty miles in each direction. Even local trains lost heart and refused to run. Miss Andrews was kept discouragingly busy answering the phone to cancel reservations. However, the sun shone on Sunday, and Rigoletto drew a large crowd to applaud Macbeth, Hackett, and Schwarz in a performance familiar to Chicago.

The two previous nights had shown surprisingly fresh performances of Mefistofele with Mason and Chaliapin on Friday night, and one of Gioconda on Saturday, with Raisa in topmost shape, and Cortis, whose voice sounded vastly improved over his Chicago debut in the same role some nineteen weeks before. Rimini and Perini completed the good cast, and if the reduced number of choristers sounded a bit tired, who could blame them?

The season in Chattanooga, Tenn., was such a success that enough subscribers have already signed to bring the company back next season.

CONDUCTORS and singers are rapidly scattering for brief vacations, or to fill spring engagements. The Polaccos are sailing on Saturday for their lovely Milan home. Their stay will be brief, for they plan to return to Chicago in time to receive Dr. De Lee's expert assistance in June in receiving the young Polacco, whose birthplace will then be Chicago, Ill., U. S. A.

Raisa and Rimini stopped off in Highland Park yesterday to make arrangements for their summer dwelling during their engagement with Mr. Eckstein's Ravinia opera. They, too, are sailing on Saturday, in order to spend a little time at the beautiful Villa Rosa before entering on their summer's work. They will, however, insert a few performances with the Paul Longone opera at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre in Paris.

Other members of the Chicago Opera Company who will appear with the Longone company are Mary Garden, Forrest Lamont, Virgilio Lazzari, Desire Defrere and Frank St. Leger, who will conduct.

THOSE sponsoring opera in English are to have several opportunities of observing its success in the near future. On Wednesday afternoon, April 1, the San Carlo opera company will present Carmen in English with a cast American-born with a single exception. The translation used will be that of Charles Henry Meltzer, which is published in the Edith Rockefeller McCormick edition. Mrs. McCormick is one of those sponsoring the performance.

The singers, mostly well known in Chicago, include Lorna Doone Jackson as Carmen and Olga Kargau as Micaela. Joseph Interrante, who was born in Italy, but has had American training, will sing Escamillo. The Don Jose is announced as Charles Hart, though it is understood that Mr. Gallo is making efforts to secure Edward Johnson, of the Metropolitan, for the one performance. Isaac Van Grove, of the Chicago opera and the Chicago Musical College, has recruited an English-speaking chorus and will conduct the performance.

Mrs. Eleanor Everest Freer, president and founder of the American Opera Society of Chicago; Mayor and Mrs. William E. Dever, Mrs. James R. Bremner, Dr. and Mrs. Otto L. Schmidt, Countess Mani St. George and Marshall Sampsell are among the indorsers of two English opera performances to be given on Easter Sunday at the Eighth Street Theatre. The operas are to be Cavalleria Rusticana, and the Enchanted Bell, and are to be sung by the Smetana and University Choral societies under the direction of Stephen A. Erst. Some assistance will be lent by members of the Chicago Civic Opera Company.

THE NEWBERRY library of this city announces the opening of a special work and reference room for music students and musicians in general. A piano has been placed in the room for the use of those consulting scores. Over 13,000 volumes are in the collection, conveniently arranged for reference. The music thus gathered includes the collected works of the classical composers, operas and instrumental works for piano, organ and orchestra. A large number of books on the history of music, harmony, criticism, biographies of musicians, and other works relating to the subject are also available.

PIANISTS were numerous in the concert list of the week. On Thursday night Rae Bernstein, a very young one, appeared as soloist at the popular concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, garnering large applause for her playing of the C minor Concerto of Beethoven. She is another of the winners of the annual contest sponsored by the Society of American Musicians.

Following her the next day were three pianists of more mature years and greater fame. These were Messrs. Maier and Pattison, the incomparable duoists, who made two solo apearances with Mr. Stock and his orchestra, and joined with Arthur Shattuck in a repetition of their last year's performance of the Bach Triple Concerto. Mr. Maier was thoughtful enough to donate a score of the Bliss concerto for orchestra (minus strings) and two pianos, for observation as they played. Observation brought only admiration for their performance.

Mme. Jeritza in Chicago Recital

Pablo Casals, Alfred Cortot, Gordon Quartet, and George Liebling Also Give Concerts.

Chicago, March 16.—Among those artists heard in concert here last week were Maria Jeritza, Pablo Casals, Alfred Cortot, the Gordon Quartet, George Liebling, Norman King, Natalie Robinson, Cantor A. Kritz, and the male chorus of the Central Trust Company.

Maurice Rosenfeld wrote in the News that Mme. Jeritza sang with "emotional depth and dramatic fervor" and commented on both her "radiantly beautiful appearance" and on her highly developed art of vocal interpretation. According to Karleton Hackett (Post), her voice "was of the clear, silvery timbre which was capable of considerable dynamic variety but with no wide range of tone colors. In some of the quiet phrases it was very lovely with its soft, cool quality, but in the impassioned outbursts it became brilliant to the point of hardness."

In the opinion of Edward Moore of the Tribune, her songs were unworthy of her voice. Glenn Dillard Gunn (Herald Examiner) found her voice "brilliant and penetrating" in its upper reaches, but "lacking in power as she descends the scale." The assisting artist was Maximilian Rosen, violinist, who was warmly received. Mme. Jeritza was accompanied by Emil Polak.

* * *

Of the cello recital given Sunday by Pablo Casals, Edward Moore wrote that "such tone, such a manner with music is to be heard nowhere else." Mr. Hackett commented that "to hear him makes music come as close to pure tone as is possible to frail humanity. Whether it be a sustained melody, bravura brilliance or the most exquisitely delicate filigree, it seems the only way in which the beauty of the music could be expressed." Maurice Rosenfeld wrote that "we again heard the marvelously mellow, warm tone of Casals. And we heard again the clearly articulated, fleetly executed, technical passages in the more lively sections of this music." Edouard Gendron was commended for his accompaniments.

* * *

Alfred Cortot in his recital yesterday offered a display, to quote Mr. Hackett, of "the playing of a man of the finest artistic sensibility with virtuoso fingers at his command. The music had exquisite delicacy, clarity or dazzling brilliance as the case might be, yet always expressive of the underlying thought."

According to Maurice Rosenfeld, Mr. Cortot "thrilled his hearers with the completeness of his virtuosity and with the refinement of his musical accomplishments and natural talents." Edward Moore wrote that it was "piano playing at its best" and Mr. Gunn commented that the Franck Chorale, Prelude, and Fugue had "greater measure of beauty and logic to commend it" than any he has previously heard.

* * *

At their third recital this season the Gordon String Quartet played Frederick Stock's Scherzo in E flat, in addition to Glazounow's Prelude and Fugue for strings, and Mozart's F major Quartet.

Mr. Hackett asserted that the Scherzo "was delightful and most excellently played. . . . The tricky close was deftly played and came out well, but in less expert hands it might have been very awkward. The effect was charming." According to Mr. Gunn the playing of the Quartet "is of so fine a quality that they are justified in concerning themselves with this noblest form of instrumental music." Mr. Gunn wrote of the Stock work that "its theme is brief and incisive, its development similarly sharp and well defined." Edward Moore found it "compact, logical, and without lost motion."

* * *

George Liebling was heard again in piano recital here Friday. Mr. Hackett referred to him as "an excellent pianist" and wrote that he "brings out the contrasts with strongly marked colors and heavy dynamics, yet all governed by a feeling for the unity of the whole. Last evening he played with interpretative force and sure technique."

To Mr. Gunn, Mr. Liebling is "one of the most poetic of pianists" and has a gift for discovering "the intimate beauties" of Beethoven and Chopin. Mr. Moore asserted that he was in excellent form.

* * *

A joint recital was given Thursday by Natalie Robinson, violinist, and Norman Kling, bass-baritone, in the series of Young American Artist recitals. Miss Robinson "displayed tonal attainments of much charm," wrote the reviewer in the Herald Examiner, although she was nervous at times. This writer stated that Mr. Kling has a voice "of more than ordinary power, of virile timbre, already commanding a high degree of flexibility in the vital matters of expressive contrast."

PAUL KOCHANSKI
Was Heard at His Best With the New York Symphony Orchestra Under Bruno Walter Recently When He Played With Felix Salmond the Brahms Double Concerto for Violin and Cello.

The News reviewer considered that Miss Robinson "put forth a tone of good quality and some degree of technical proficiency" and that Mr. Kling sang with "the high baritone range, and clear enunciation." As the Post put it, in her playing "there were excellent places, and others not so good. She had understanding of the music, but her technique was not quite equal to all the demands made upon it" and Mr. Kling's middle voice was commendable.

* * *

Cantor A. Kritz, baritone, assisted by Pearl Bernstein, soprano, and Alexander Aster, accompanist, gave a recital in Kimball Hall before a large audience yesterday. His "rich, resonant" voice was praised by Mr. Rosenfeld, who noted that Miss Bernstein's voice was badly affected by nervousness.

The male chorus of the Central Trust Company of Illinois, under the direction of Elmer J. Crabbs, gave a concert Thursday and, to quote the Herald Examiner, displayed "much fine choral art, sturdy tone, admirable ensemble, flexibility in the execution of all expressive inflections." This reviewer admired the "charming" tone and style with which Helen Hedge, assisting artist, sang.

Opera Performances Given in Cincinnati

Chicago Company Presents Mefistofele, Thais, Romeo and Juliet, and Gioconda.

Cincinnati, March 16.—The series of four performances by the visiting Chicago Civic Opera Company last week was pronounced by the reviewers a complete success from every artistic point of view. The operas given were Mefistofele, with Feodor Chaliapin; Thais, with Mary Garden; Romeo and Juliet, with Florence Macbeth and Charles Hackett, and La Gioconda, with Rosa Raisa, Cyrena Van Gordon and Antonio Cortis. In each case the reviewers were unanimous in pronouncing the staging, the singing and the orchestral accompaniments excellent.

Chaliapin's art "was above reproach, his characterization a personal triumph," declared Mr. Goldenburg in the Enquirer, and he thought also that Charles Hackett's Faust carried conviction and that Augusta Lenska proved a "stately Helena." Edith Mason's Margaret was characterized as a "pleasing creation."

Of this performance Mrs. Plogstedt wrote in the Post that the entire cast "was of such caliber that criticism was well nigh impossible." Charles Hackett was referred to as "an established favorite," and his singing was called "lovely" in the press.

Mr. Goldenburg found Thais as an opera lacking in certain necessary qualities. He declared, however, "Mary Garden will never cease to cast her charm," but he thought that vocal honors of the performance belonged with Joseph Schwarz. Jose Mojica came in for praise for his "lovely lyric tenor" and his "dash, polish and gracefulness."

Romeo and Juliet was thought by several reviewers the peak of the series on account of the perfect fitness of Charles Hackett and Florence Macbeth, in voice and personality, for their respective roles. Giorgio Polacco was lauded for his handling of the orchestra, and Mr. Wilson in the Commercial-Tribune made special mention of Messrs. Defrere and Mojica.

Rosa Raisa's dramatic fervor and voice pleased all the writers in the performance of Gioconda. Mrs. Plogstedt felt that she electrified the audience with her acting and singing, although Mrs. Smith thought that she was not in her best voice. Cyrena Van Gordon, Augusta Lenska and Antonio Cortis won ovations together with Mme. Raisa.

B. G.

MARYON VADIE (LYRIC DANCER)
OTA GYGI (VIOLINIST)
with
The Maryon Vadie Dancers and Mary Izant, pianist
Management
EVELYN HOPPER
Aeolian Hall New York City

RUTH BRETON
VIOLINIST
"A welcome apparition on the concert stage."
(Lawrence Gilman, N. Y. Herald-Tribune)
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York
Packard Building, Philadelphia

Sensational in Opera Triumphant in Concert
Jeritza
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
Sole management Metropolitan Musical Bureau Aeolian Hall New York City
Knabe Piano Victor Records

JEANNE GORDON

SCORES

At Inaugural "Aida" Performance in

Washington, D. C., March 3rd, 1925

"MOST SPONTANEOUS OVATION OF THE EVENING."—Washington News, March 4, 1925.

"RECEIVED AN OVATION."—Washington Times, March 4, 1925.

"VOICE OF RARE BEAUTY, AMAZING PURITY OF TONE."—Washington Post, March 4, 1925

"PRESIDENT IS AMONG OPERA AUDIENCE."

"Jeanne Gordon, of rich depth of voice, received an ovation after her big scene just before the finale, when her Amneris disclosed a wealth of voice and fine dramatic values."

—The Washington Times, March 4, 1925.

"Jeanne Gordon as Amneris was a compelling figure. Her voice was one of rare beauty, with amazing purity of tone and with almost perfect tonal inflection from her lowest to her highest notes. She has both temperament and technique and her acting was of dramatic brilliance."

—The Washington Post, March 4, 1925.

"Jeanne Gordon has a fine voice which she uses well. She made a beautiful Amneris."

—The Washington Herald, March 4, 1925.

"PRESIDENT AND HIS PARTY ATTEND OPERA 'AIDA'

"Contented themselves with calling Jeanne Gordon and Frances Peralta back for three or four curtain calls with old-fashioned American hand-clapping."

"Gordon (Amneris) made a great personal triumph in Act III, when her beauty and charm and her ability to act her role, combined with her smooth, mellow voice to bring her perhaps the most spontaneous ovation of the evening."

—Washington News, March 4, 1925.

CERTIFIED THE MUSICAL DIGEST

NATIONAL CONCERTS INC.
1451 Broadway, New York City

KNABE PIANO VICTOR RECORDS

A Plea for the Unfamiliar

Pitts Sanborn Approves of the Performance of Novelties, —Both Modern and Classic.

by KAY KENNEDY

"WE have unquestionably a rich and varied musical life here in America, but it still is not comprehensive enough." Thus, without introductory pleasantries, Mr. Sanborn plunged into his subject. "I believe that our established musical organizations—the symphony orchestras, for instance—ought to give more of their attention to unfamiliar music, that they might well aspire to a more representative and vivacious repertory."

Pitts Sanborn is known to musical circles in New York and elsewhere through his writing about music in the New York Telegram-Mail and other periodicals.

"The symphony orchestras are much inclined to shift the burden of introducing new music to the various guilds and leagues, a proceeding that may have its drawbacks as well as its obvious reasons. They are shy, too, of the unfamiliar music that is not old. Anyone who is curious to hear played, as I am, music that he does not know, be it old or be it new, is bound to regret this state of affairs. Sometimes the conductor of a symphony orchestra, admirable in the standard repertory, is not, because of his sympathies and prejudices, just the person to bring forward music by the ultra-moderns, but often he is quite the right man to interpret with authority unfamiliar music of the ancients, if his customers will suffer him to do so.

"The leagues and guilds, of course, make a valuable contribution to our musical life in discovering contemporary composers to the public. Their music is always interesting, although indubitably much of it is rubbish. But then, much of the music of any period is rubbish. However, the most valuable service of these smaller organizations is that they give us immediate information of what the composers are doing. Be it good or be it bad (and some of it must have lasting worth), it does possess news value.

"The unfortunate part of being obliged to rely on the leagues and guilds for our knowledge of new music is that the listener is confronted at their concerts with the task of spelling out and construing a long program of strange matter, whereas he should hardly be called on to tackle more than one such piece at a time. An ideal method would be to introduce one new work on a regular concert program.

"I realize that the symphony orchestras have to base their programs on the classics. That is right and desirable. But they should not fail to give due attention to unfamiliar compositions. And their audiences ought to do their part by receiving such works with patience and a proper gratitude, if not positively with joy.

"The Boston Symphony of late years has done important work in this respect, as has the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Stokowski showed courage in leading Bruckner's Seventh Symphony this year, and in bringing out Ornstein's new Piano Concerto, and we must not forget that once he actually dared a performance in New York of Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra. But, instead of giving him unanimous support, his patrons seem to have been sharply divided in their opinion of the advisability of presenting such works. Some concert-goers actually take it as a personal insult if they are made to listen to Schoenberg!"

Mr. Sanborn paused, and then, in his deliberate clipped sentences, he declared that audiences should be appreciative rather than affronted, and that they should commend the courage and musicianship of the conductor in rehearsing and interpreting such elusive and exacting works. Whether these composers are as good as Brahms, he pointed out, is entirely beside the point. "If they are, of course they should be heard; and if they're not—well, the sooner we find this out by capable exposition the sooner they can be relegated to the garbage lot of music!"

Mr. Sanborn somehow conveyed an impression of vehemence and emphatic conviction without raising his voice or gesticulating wildly. In the same quiet, controlled tones, he went on:

"As a case in point—I have no personal hankering after any of the symphonies of Mahler. Yet I heartily applaud any enthusiastic and authoritative performance of his works here, such as Messrs. Stokowski, Bodanzky and Mengelberg have given. In the same way, competent performances of Bruckner are welcome. To me there are magnificent pages in this composer's symphonies, and I feel that for the sake of those pages his works should not be neglected. Nothing, of course, can take the place of the symphonies of Beethoven and of Brahms—but then, no one wants anything to." Yet Mr. Sanborn feels that there is a certain danger in the too frequent repetition of their works —the proverbial danger of over-familiarity.

"A Beethoven or a Brahms symphony or overture ought to be prepared with the same care that would be bestowed on some difficult modern composer, such as Schoenberg or Stravinsky, and it should be led with the enthusiasm of re-creation, not, as is often the case, reduced to dull and slovenly routine.

Photo by Mishkin

PITTS SANBORN

"Quite naturally, constant concert attendance induces a different viewpoint from that of the casual concert-goer. The reviewer becomes surfeited with classics too often repeated, and his healthy curiosity about other works is gratified too seldom. Still, his very discontent is for the good of music.

"Not many years ago the eighteenth century masters, even Bach, Handel, Hadyn, and Mozart, were comparatively neglected. Today they are almost the rage. This phenomenon partakes of the epic conflict between father and son: the young twentieth century is now more or less at odds with the parent nineteenth, but it rollicks along in joyous fellowship with its grandsire, the eighteenth.

"The beatific moment of music in New York this winter came when Wanda Landowska at a Philharmonic concert played Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat to a flawless accompaniment led by Willem Mengelberg. The operas of Handel are returning to the stage in Germany. Eventually they must reach England and America, and what a boon they'll be to the languishing art of bel canto! The Scarlattis, Couperin le Grand, Rameau, Daquin, Cimarosa, Gluck are gaily trooping back. The progeny of Bach rejoice our better programs. Boccherini has been heard from. Piccini, proverbial enemy of Gluck, has found a champion of the pen in Eric Blom (A Misjudged Composer). Possibly the new music is a particularly abstruse sort of higher mathematics, or something fourth-dimensional. But while it's laboriously coming on we are now free to bask and glory in the scholarly, sympathetic, and vital revival of the great masters of the eighteenth century and even earlier."

Mr. Sanborn had said his say.

Summer Study in New York

DUDLEY BUCK

Teacher of Singing

For the first time in five years will hold a SUMMER COURSE in

NEW YORK

June 15th to August 1st

PRIVATE LESSONS

TEACHERS' CLASSES

REPERTOIRE-INTERPRETATION CLASSES

ADDRESS: ELSIE T. COWEN, SECRETARY

471 West End Avenue, New York City Phone, Endicott 7449

The Center for Modern Music

J. & W. CHESTER, LTD.

11 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET LONDON, W. 1

Complete catalogues post free on application

MARIA MUELLER

Soprano, Metropolitan Opera Company

Deeply IMPRESSES New York's CRITICS and PUBLIC

"The performance (Gallurese) was principally conspicuous for the vivid and emotional portrayal of Maria by Miss Mueller."—The New York Times.

"Maria Mueller successfully passed an endurance test yesterday afternoon, when "Gallurese" marked her third appearance in three consecutive days. Her singing showed no sign of this ordeal."—New York Herald-Tribune.

"Maria Mueller, as Gallurese's well beloved, really carried off the chief honors of the evening. She was charmingly simple as the miller's daughter, and her lovely, fresh lyric voice sounded better than in anything else she had yet done here. The voice was pure and liquid."—New York Evening Journal.

"Miss Mueller made indeed an excellent impression. No Eva seen at the Metropolitan in a generation has equaled her in visual appeal. And one was grateful to Miss Mueller also for not over-doing Eva's archness: She was adequately coy, but she was also charming. Her shy eagerness in the opening scene was skillfully denoted. Miss Mueller sang her music admirably; her command of pianissimi and mezza voce was especially notable. This new Eva is a valuable asset."—New York Herald-Tribune.

"Maria Mueller proved a delectable Eva, vocally superb and beautiful to see."—New York American.

"Maria Mueller, who relieved Mme. Rethberg at the last minute as Eva, looked, needless to say, delightful, and acted charmingly."—New York World.

"As the blue-eyed and golden haired daughter of a respected Meistersinger, Miss Mueller gave her role a new interest. She was in fine voice, and the fresh beauty of her tones was another appropriate investure of the part. She looked the character, and it is not often that so plausible a picture of Eva is presented. The audience was much pleased, and recalled the young singer many times."—New York Times.

"Miss Mueller was Freia, truly youthful, fresh-voiced, appealing in the expression of emotion."—New York Times.

"The ingratiating beauty and charm of Miss Mueller as Maria."—New York Herald-Tribune.

"Maria Mueller again charmed us with her lovely Sieglinde."—New York Herald-Tribune.

On The Music Highway

LAWRENCE TIBBETT, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the soloist at the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, March 28, at the Young People's concert in Carnegie Hall, April 4, and in Aeolian Hall, April 5.

In Aeolian Hall, New York, Thursday evening, Hilda Kramer, soprano, and Dorsey Whittington, pianist, will give a joint recital. Charles King will be the accompanist.

A recital will be given at Town Hall, New York, on March 31, by David J. Putterman, American tenor, assisted by the Hazomir Choral Society, conducted by Zavel Zilberts, and Philip Morrell, violinist.

In a benefit concert for the Casa del Soldato, a soldiers' home in Rome, Italy, at Carnegie Hall next Monday evening, Beniamino Gigli, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will make his last New York appearance of the season. Mr. Gigli will be assisted by Beatrice Mack, soprano. The tenor plans to sail for Italy on April 18.

Cecil Arden will sing at the National Flower Show to be held in Kansas City tomorrow.

In his appearances Friday and Saturday with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conducting, Hans Kindler played George Boyle's Concerto for cello and orchestra. This was the first performance of the Concerto in Chicago, although Mr. Kindler has played the work in London, Paris, Washington, Philadelphia, Baltimore and several other cities since Mr. Boyle wrote it for him eight years ago.

An enthusiastic reception was accorded Frieda Hempel by both the audience and the newspaper reviewers at her concert in Toronto, Canada, on February 16.

Milton Aborn has been getting in touch with various Women's Clubs and musical organizations throughout the country with a view of formulating a Grand Opera Circuit whereby the chorus will be composed of local members in the various cities.

Socrate Barozzi will appear in a concert in Pittsburgh, Pa., on March 30. This will be the Roumanian violinist's first appearance there.

On March 27, Robert Imandt, assisted by the Lenox String Quartet, will play for the People's Symphony at the Washington Irving High School, New York. He will play the Bach Concerto in E major as written in its original form for violin accompanied by small orchestra. Sandor Harmati will conduct. A Bach double concerto for two violins and orchestra will follow, and Mr. Imandt will play a Bach sonata.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann Heink will give her only New York recital of the season next Sunday afternoon in the Metropolitan Opera House. This will be Mme. Schumann Heink's first appearance in the Opera House since the days when she was a member of the company.

With her appearance in Rochester Thursday, Dusolina Giannini will practically complete her second season before the public. On April 4 she will sail in the company of her father, her accompanist, and her manager, Daniel Mayer, for Havana, where she will give three concerts before the Sociedad Pro Arte Musicale. Miss Giannini will give one more concert in this country on her return from Havana in Troy, N. Y. She will sail for Europe on April 23.

Another artist who will be heard soon in Havana is William Bachaus, who gives concerts there on March 29 and 31.

A unique instrument will be used by Louis Bailly in his New York recital at Town Hall Saturday afternoon. His viola is nearly 350 years old and is one of the few surviving made by the inventor of the violin, Gasparo da Salo, in Brescia about 1575.

The Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Inc., has announced that Charles Hackett, tenor of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, will be under its management beginning next season. Mr. Hackett has been re-engaged by the Chicago Civic Opera Company for the seasons of 1925-1926 and 1926-1927. This summer he will go abroad, where he will appear in opera in Monte Carlo, Berlin, Munich, Vienna and Paris, and will give concerts in London before returning to this country early in the autumn.

Winifrid Macbride, who has given two recitals here this season, will give a third recital at Aeolian Hall on Thursday afternoon.

Paul Kochanski, who is closing up his season's activities in America with appearances with the New York Symphony and Boston Symphony Orchestras, will sail for Europe on the S. S. Paris May 16. On June 16 the Polish violinist will play in London with the London Symphony Orchestra and on June 20 with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood. Following the London recital in June he will proceed to Paris for a recital, to be followed in early July with an appearance with the Colonne Orchestra.

The fall season will begin early in September with a set of ten concerts in Poland. Mr. Kochanski is scheduled to return to the United States the end of October for a concert tour of the country, which, as heretofore, will be under the management of George Engles.

A second Boston recital will be given by Francis Macmillen on April 1. His program will consist of a group of short pieces by Bach, the Brahms D minor Sonata, Carl Goldmark's A minor Concerto and works by Glazounow, Cortelyou, Juon and Randegger.

With the "modern evening," to be given at Rumford Hall, New York, on Friday, Cornelius van Vliet, cellist, completes a series of three period programs of chamber music, which he has presented this season with the assistance of various artists.

The program of the modern evening will be given by Evelyn Jeane, soprano; John Amans, flute, Bernard Wagenaar, piano, and the New York Trio, in which Clarence Adler is pianist, Louis Edlin, violinist, and Mr. van Vliet, cellist. The Trio, which as a unit has appeared on no other program of this series, will play the opening number, John Ireland's Second Trio.

Amy Evans, Welsh soprano, who gives her first New York recital at Aeolian Hall on Wednesday evening, is in private life the wife of Fraser Gange, baritone.

George Morgan, baritone, and Alberto Sciarretti, pianist, have been booked by Daniel Mayer for the annual Ladies' Night of the Zuleika Grotto at Elmwood Music Hall in Buffalo. The event takes place tomorrow.

Margarete Matzenauer, John McCormack and Fred Patton will sing the solo parts of Elgar's Dream of Gerontius when it is given at the Cincinnati May Festival. Mr. Patton will also sing the role of Friar Leone in Pierne's St. Francis, and Hans Sachs in the selections from Die Meistersinger, which will also be given.

Gitta Gradova is soloist with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in New Orleans on March 28, playing the first public performance in America of the Scriabin Concerto.

Daniel Mayer announces that Evsei Beloussoff, Russian cellist, will henceforth be under his exclusive management. Mr. Beloussoff will be remembered as the cellist who toured with the Ukrainian chorus. Lately Mr. Beloussoff has been the first cellist of the State Symphony and has appeared as soloist with that orchestra. Next season he will devote himself to concert work. He is planning a series of New York recitals.

Charles Stratton is to give a recital under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences tomorrow.

The first birthday of the free concerts of the Sunday Symphonic Society in New York, Josiah Zuro conductor, was celebrated with the presence of speakers at the concert of the Society in the Criterion Theatre on Sunday. Those who spoke were Philip Berolzheimer and George H. Gartlan, both connected with the city government. The program, which included the appearance of Marcel Salzinger, baritone, included Schumann's D major Symphony and works of Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Weber, and Berlioz.

A movement from Haydn's Emperor Quartet, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice Espagnol, Smetana's Bartered Bride Overture, Wagner's Meistersinger Prelude, and a Humperdinck selection made up the first of the four scheduled March orchestral concerts at the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art under the leadership of David Mannes on March 7.

MAY KORB
Lyric Coloratura Soprano
Exclusive Management
R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 W. 156th St. N. Y. City
Billings 1593

WINIFRED BYRD
America's Pianist
Management: Marie Gouled
25 West 42d St., New York

The Tours of
DAYTON WESTMINSTER CHOIR
(60 Mixed voices, singing a Cappella, from memory)
Directed by JOHN FINLEY WILLIAMSON
Now rank among the important music events

Herman Devries wrote in the Chicago American, January 18, 1924:

"The Dayton Westminster Choir, visiting here after the so-recent triple performance of the remarkable Sistine Choir, had to face the ordeal of inevitable comparison with this famous institution. "But comparison meant anything but defeat for the Daytonians. Their singing has the noble poised quality of the finest veteran choral societies. We can find no weak spot in their art equipment. The voices are admirably trained and admirably blended, beautifully shaded."

SPRING TOUR INCLUDES— Indianapolis—April 13th
Chicago — Orchestra Hall—April 14th
Detroit — Orchestra Hall—April 18th
Cleveland — Masonic Hall—April 20th

FALL TOUR, NOW BOOKING, INCLUDES—
Boston—Symphony Hall—Mg't W. H. Brennan.....Oct. 19th
Hartford—Connecticut.....Oct. 20th
New York—Manhattan Opera House.....Oct. 21st
Brooklyn—Institute of Arts & Science.....Oct. 22nd
Philadelphia—Academy of Music—Arthur Judson—(Mg't) Oct. 24th

MANAGEMENT: M. H. HANSON
437 Fifth Avenue, New York City

New Orchestra Starts Career

Pasternack Conducts Pennsylvania Symphony; Siegfried and Numerous Recitals in Philadelphia.

Philadelphia, March 18.—The Pennsylvania Symphony Orchestra, an organization of one hundred and two local musicians under the leadership of Josef Pasternack, gave its initial concert at the Academy of Music last evening. Martin Lisan, American pianist, was the soloist in Liszt's E flat Concerto.

According to the Inquirer, the orchestra "gave much promise for future performances." The Record reported that the cordiality of the audience "indicated that music-loving Philadelphia is ready and willing to support another symphony orchestra, especially when its personnel represents so many conspicuous and thoroughly competent musicians, and when the conductor is Josef Pasternack," and called the concert "an unqualified success." The writer in the North American found their performance "astonishingly smooth and fine."

In Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, to again quote this writer, "the orchestra rose splendidly to its opportunities" and the conductor "realized every chance for brilliance the beautiful score affords." Samuel L. Laciar of the Public Ledger wrote that "the tone of the organization was very good and many of the details of the performance showed a care and study which testified to the amount of rehearsal done. . . . Mr. Pasternack's readings were admirable, especially in the Symphony." The other numbers were Goldmark's Spring Overture and Smetana's symphonic poem, Moldau.

Mr. Laciar thought Mr. Lisan's rendition "more than excellent" and according to the Record, he proved to be "a young pianist of extraordinary talent, who has been largely self-taught and who has developed a fine, virile style, a dazzling technique and an interesting musical ability." He was equally well spoken of by the other reviewers.

The organization plans to give a series of five concerts next winter.

* * *

The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York presented Siegfried at the Academy of Music last night with Artur Bodanzky conducting. Rudolf Laubenthal sang the title role and, to quote the Record, he was "youth personified, heroic, splendid and a singer who awakened sympathetic response in the audience." Mr. Laciar considered his appearance ideal, and commended his singing.

Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer liked the "youthful buoyancy" in his acting, and Linton Martin of the North American as well as other writers commented on this same quality. Mr. Muschamp also admired his singing.

In Mr. Martin's opinion, Nanny Larsen-Todsen sang "with splendid volume of tone and good vocal color." According to Mr. Muschamp the awakening scene was well thought out, and Mr. Laciar asserted that Mme. Larsen-Todsen "more than confirmed the impression she made as Isolde a couple of weeks ago. Her voice was exceedingly beautiful."

The "inimitable, skillful visualization of the difficult role of Mime" by George Meader was duly praised in the Record. "His enactment of the part was perfect in every detail." To Mr. Laciar's way of thinking, it was a "superb rendition" and both Mr. Muschamp and Mr. Martin added words of praise.

Mr. Muschamp thought that the Wanderer of Friedrich Schorr "had the most vocal beauty" and Mr. Martin was agreed that "his singing was marked by a breadth and richness that were of compelling beauty." According to Mr. Laciar, his interpretation was "simple perfection." In voice, in action and in atmosphere he gave what might fairly be termed the finest interpretation of the role that has been seen here for a quarter of a century." Mr. Martin wrote that "briefly as they were heard and seen, excellent work was done by Gustav Schuetzendorf as Alberich, Karin Branzell as Erda, and William Gustafson as Fafner." Mr. Laciar referred to Mme. Branzell's "exquisite voice" and thought Thalia Sabanieva "was excellent as the voice of the forest bird."

This writer considered that Mr. Bodanzky "conducted exceedingly well" and the Record reviewer said he "did a marvelous piece of work" and that "nothing could have been more illuming or inspirational than his interpretation."

* * *

In the seventh of the series of recitals by members of the faculty of the Curtis Institute of Music, Mme. Charles Cahier, in the words of Mr. Laciar, rendered a beautiful program most artistically.

"The singer was in splendid voice and modulated its power admirably to the size of the concert room, besides which she revealed a perfect command of every technical detail known to the vocal art. But far greater than this was the consummate artistry of interpretation which she showed, and there were places in the recital, which was almost an informal one, where she reached heights of the greatest beauty of tone and musicianship."

Photo by Mishkin

SAMUEL THEWMAN

Whose Stage Direction in Das Rheingold and Other Novelties of the Season at the Metropolitan Has Won Him New Praise.

* * *

The artists appearing at the fourth meeting of the Friends of Chamber Music were Herman Weinberg, Aaron Gorodetsky, and A. Lipkin, violins, and Edmond Vichnin, piano, all members of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Their program consisted of the Kreutzer Sonata of Beethoven, the Cesar Franck Sonata and the Vivaldi Concerto. The first two, according to Mr. Laciar, "were superbly performed, with tonal, rhythmic and poetic beauty." The Concerto, continued this writer, "was beautifully performed" by Messrs. Weinberg, Gorodetsky and Lipkin. Mr. Weinberg's "beautiful tone" and "ample volume" received praise from this writer, as did Mr. Vichnin for proving to be "a natural chamber music pianist" with "a most unusual appreciation of the relation of the two parts."

* * *

Mildred Faas gave a song recital in the Foyer of the Academy of Music Monday evening, assisted by the Schmidt String Quartet, composed of Alexander Zenker and Irving Bancroft, violins; Henry Elkan, viola; and William Schmidt, cello, with John Fischer, flute, Edward Raho, oboe and oboe d'amore, and George C. Krick, guitar. Helen Boothroyd Buckley was the accompanying pianist.

In Mr. Laciar's opinion "not only as a novelty, but as an artistic achievement, the recital was remarkable. Miss Faas blended the tonal color of her voice admirably to the obbligato of both string and wind instruments."

GRAVEURE

IN

LEADING MUSIC CENTERS

"Graveure the Peer of Song Recitalists." (Los Angeles Herald.)

"A superb artist! Master of all styles of song." (New Orleans Times Picayune.)

"Graveure a Musical Master! An artist whose work is impeccable." (Milwaukee Sentinel.)

Management:
Metropolitan
Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City

GUIOMAR

NOVAES

"Not every generation hears a Guiomar Novaes."---James G. Huneker

SEASON OF 1925-1926 NOW BOOKING

Exclusive Direction:

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON

Fisk Building
New York

STEINWAY PIANO
VICTOR RECORDS
DUO-ART RECORDS

Packard Building
Philadelphia, Pa.

AS LORIS IN FEDORA

AT THE OUTSET of his career it was apparent that TOKATYAN was most fortunately endowed in the matter of voice, inherent singing talent, and a flair for the operatic stage.

Warmth of tone and a technique in which certainty and ease were conspicuous prompted experts to predict for him a splendid future.

When this young tenor was first heard in opera in this country he attracted rather special attention. Then came his opportunity with the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, which he improved steadily.

Henry T. Finck, during his final service as music reviewer for the New York Evening Post, wrote of Tokatyan: "Keep an eye on him." That was in 1923. The TOKATYAN of today is a more mature artist . . . as is evidenced by the use of his voice, its increased firmness, its growing color and appeal.

Music chroniclers for the daily press of New York, Chicago and Philadelphia have expressed themselves, often, concerning the acccomplishments of this young tenor. And it has been, generally, a highly approving expression of expert opinion.

AS FENTON IN FALSTAFF

TOKATYAN

AS CORENTINO IN DINORAH

DURING the season now approaching its close ARMAND TOKATYAN has appeared at the New York Metropolitan Opera House in the leading tenor roles of the following operas: Boris Godunoff, Thais, Cavalleria Rusticana, Falstaff, Faust, Fedora, Dinorah, and Lucia di Lammermoor. Such a record is sufficient indication of the range of the tenor's versatility and vocal and dramatic resources.

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS

The New York Post (ERNEST NEWMAN), January 23, 1925.

"Mr. TOKATYAN was a most amusing Corentino (Dinorah), always bringing a new touch of comedy into the scene, yet NEVER EXAGGERATING, and NEVER LETTING HIS RUSTIC NONSENSE GET IN THE WAY OF THE MAIN ACTION."

The New York Evening World.

"ARMAND TOKATYAN, tenor, was FENTON and sang ADMIRABLY."

The New York American, January 2, 1925.

"ARMAND TOKATYAN as LORIS in Fedora was an ARDENT and impressive lover."

The New York Evening World, January 23, 1925.

"Mr. TOKATYAN as the half-wit (Corentino in Dinorah) gave a SPLENDID PERFORMANCE."

The Bulletin (Philadelphia), February 4, 1925.

"Mr. TOKATYAN emphasized the favorable impression made last year appearance, HIS TRUE TENOR RESONANCE AND PLEASING, SYMPATHETIC QUALITY."

Concert Season 1925-1926 Now Being Booked

EXCLUSIVE MANAGEMENT: R. E. JOHNSTON

1451 Broadway, New York City

HARDMAN PIANO USED

Singers and Pianists in Boston

Dusolina Giannini Gives Recital; Guiomar Novaes, Brailowsky and Gabrilowitsch in Piano Concerts.

Boston, March 17.—Two singers and four pianists were heard here last week; Dusolina Giannini and Naardyn Lyska gave the only song recitals, and the pianists were Guiomar Novaes, Alexander Brailowsky, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Harold Bauer, and George Smith.

Miss Giannini's recital was enthusiastically applauded by the reviewers as well as by her audience. In the Christian Science Monitor, the reviewer wrote that she possesses "a voice of truly epic proportions, with powerful, sustained tones, large, resonant, and impressive. A superb dignity enhances her voice, which she uses almost faultlessly. So careful and clear is her diction that every word is intelligible." This writer made special mention of the "steadfast brilliance" of her sustained notes.

The chronicler in the Herald found Miss Giannini the possessor of "as beautiful a voice as it is vouchsafed the present day American public to listen to. From the depths of her long scale to its top she produces tones of astonishing loveliness, be they of the finest pianissimo or of full-throated strength. . . . Miss Giannini has acquired an unusually efficient technique which includes a smooth legato and distinct enunciation, and in such matters as phrasing and rhythm she sings very musically indeed." The Transcript writer asserted that "within memory no rising singer has disclosed such diversity and sustained such evenness of ability. . . . It is not only a dark, but a full-bodied soprano, free from all tinsel, teeming with warmth, alive to color."

According to the Globe, "hers is a marvelous voice, unsurpassed in beauty, with wide range and ample volume. . . . Giannini, if she does not slip back in the next five years, may well attain the topmost summits."

* * *

Unfamiliar folk songs made up the program offered by Naardyn Lyska at her recital at the Copley-Plaza for the benefit of the Jacoby Club. She sang airs from China, Iceland, Portugal, Arabia, Malabar and Ireland, as well as an ancient boat song of the Nile. The reviewers were agreed in praising the interest of her program, although they found little to approve in her singing.

* * *

According to the Monitor, Mme. Novaes again displayed her "versatile genius" in her recital here on Sunday, This writer commented that "an analysis of the playing of this pianist quickly becomes a listing of qualities as desirable as they are rare" among pianists.

Warren Storey Smith (Post) wrote that, aside from a certain over-emphasis, her playing was "quite beyond praise . . . Her instrument yields her tones of melting beauty; yet never does she revel in lusciousness for its own sake. Always there is in her interpretation proportion and control, and a pervading clarity. Again, though a brilliant technician, Miss Novaes avoids all vainglorious display. She is first and foremost a musician."

In the opinion of the Herald reviewer, "there are few pianists, if any, who have so beautiful and rounded a tone, such chordal richness, and such exquisiteness of innuendo in their playing." The Transcript writer mentioned that "not only in scope of imagination and sweep of tone, but in fancy and finesse, has Mme. Novaes also ripened."

* * *

An all-Chopin program was played by Alexander Brailowsky in his third recital here. The Globe reported that "one again felt that Brailowsky is a pianist with individuality and personal force." The writer in the Herald stated that he is a pianist "of rare impetuousness, of virility, and a searing intensity of a mood that is romantic," but that his playing was uneven.

The Monitor said that he approached his music "with the poetic attitude" and that "his sense of dynamics is strong and his feeling for beauties of form and content is apparent." This writer felt, however, that he sometimes "allowed his poetic emotion to impair his control" to the detriment of his playing. On the other hand, the chronicler in the Transcript wrote that it was a pleasure to note that the "emotional excesses of the first concert played little or no part last evening, that Mr. Brailowsky can and does play in large, broad, heady manner."

* * *

Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mr. Bauer appeared Sunday in a joint recital before an unusually large and cordial audience. Admitting that these two pianists are not "specialists" in two-piano playing, the Herald writer thought it "all very beautiful, very stirring." H. T. Parker (Transcript) wrote that they played as became "the virtuoso-abilities and the musicianly qualities of Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch."

* * *

The Transcript review of Mr. Smith's concert mentioned that he is "the possessor of a technique well above the average of concert pianists. He plays with much energy and enthusiasm without allowing himself to be carried to excess thereby."

Photo by Miller

MISS DUSOLINA GIANNINI
Taking an Afternoon Stroll on the Boardwalk at Atlantic City With Her Pekinese, Venti.

St. Louis Massenchor Gives Premiere of Bruckner Work

St. Louis, March 16.—The entire Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Hugo Anschuetz, appeared at the benefit concert last week given by the St. Louis Massenchor. The soloists were Elsa Alsen, soprano; Arthur Middleton, bass; Maude Covington, contralto, and Clarence Bloemker, tenor.

Bruckner's Te Deum, which was sung in this city for the first time, "made a profound impression of greatness," according to Richard L. Stokes. The work of the chorus, which included four hundred voices, was commended in the press, and the soloists came in for favorable mention. As the reviewer in the Globe-Democrat put it, Mme. Alsen "soon revealed a clear and powerful voice that ranged high and full above the orchestra and assembled singers." Mr. Stokes said that she sang Dich Theure Halle from Tannhaeuser "with unusual eloquence and exultant strength of voice." Through some mistake Mr. Middleton did not arrive in St. Louis until one hour before the concert, but even with only a hurried rehearsal, to quote the Globe-Democrat, he acquitted himself creditably.

RICHARD HAGEMAN STUDIOS
257 WEST 86th STREET
NEW YORK CITY

CONDUCTOR

Metropolitan Opera Co. for Thirteen Seasons; Ravinia Park Opera Co.; Chicago Civic Opera Co.; Fairmount Park Symphony Orchestra of Philadelphia.

VOCAL COACH COMPOSER ACCOMPANIST

Among the prominent artists, who are coaching or who have coached or with whom Mr. Hageman has enjoyed the reputation of being associated as accompanist, are: Frances Alda, Lucrezia Bori, Sophie Braslau, Inez Barbour, Anna Case, Julia Claussen, Emmy Destinn, Claire Dux, Olive Fremstad, Anna Fitziu, Geraldine Farrar, Lucy Gates, Alice Gentle, Thelma Given, Jeanne Gordon, Mabel Garrison, Louise Homer, Frieda Hempel, Florence Hinkle, Marie Ivogun, Margaret Matzenauer, Edith Mason, Nellie Melba, Florence Macbeth, Ruth Miller, Greta Masson, Claudia Muzio, Luella Meluis, Marie Moressey, Nina Morgana, Haru Onuki, Margaret Ober, Irene Pavloska, Rosa Raisa, Ann Roselle, Marie Rappold, Leonora Sparkes, Marie Sundelius, Renee Thornton, Marcia VanDresser, Marie Zendt, Paul Althouse, Pasquale Amato, Luca Botta, Alessandro Bonci, Pablo Casals, Guilio Crimi, Rafaelo Diaz, Mischa Elman, William Wade Hinshaw, Orville Harrold, Herman Jadlowker, Jan Kubelik, Fritz Kreisler, Morgan Kingston, Riccardo Martin, Jose Mardones, Giovanni Martinelli, Basil Ruysdael, Joseph Schwarz, Antonio Scotti, Albert Spalding, Johannes Sembach, Carlos Sedano, Reinald Werrenrath, Efrem Zimbalist, Renato Zanelli, etc.

Vocal and Dramatic Preparation for Concert, Opera, Oratorio
Instruction in Orchestral Conducting
A Limited Number of Pupils Accepted in the Art of Accompanying
Mr. Hageman will teach at the Chicago Musical College from June 29 to Aug. 1

FOR LESSONS AND APPOINTMENTS ADDRESS
MISS M. MYERS, SEC'Y. TELEPHONE 5627 SCHUYLER

Concerning

MARIE
Rappold

Philadelphia reviewers were unanimous in their praise of Mme. Rappold's singing of Aida at the Metropolitan Opera House in that city last month.

The discriminating Committee of the Biennial Convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs, and the composer, have chosen her to create the principal role of Frank Patterson's Opera The Echo at its world premiere, in Portland, Ore., June 9, 1925.

Mme. Rappold will be available for recitals next season, and I am able to quote a reasonable fee.

Yours truly,
M. H. HANSON.

437 Fifth Avenue,
New York City.

Boston Hears Varied Ensembles

Mildred Cobb Assists People's Symphony; New York Quartet, Polish Orchestra and Apollo Club Appear.

Boston, March 17.—The People's Symphony Orchestra, again conducted by Stuart Mason, was heard in the St. James Theatre Sunday afternoon with Mildred Cobb, soprano, as soloist.

Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald wrote that Miss Cobb "sang with warmth and a resonant tone in her lower register, clearly, flexibly, and with a smooth and beautiful tone in her upper reaches." The reviewer of the Christian Science Monitor said she gave evidence of "good training, her enunciation being particularly careful," and the Transcript writer commended her voice as "pleasant."

The Globe reviewer commented that her voice is "pure, well placed and for the most part pleasing save when the singer strives for too great a forte." This chronicler also wrote, "Seldom has the orchestra been heard in such pleasurable full-voiced sonority or in such mounting climax."

* * *

Smetana's Quartet, From My Life; Ethel Leginska's Four Poems for string quartet; and Franck's Quintet, with Miss Leginska at the piano, were the offerings of the New York String Quartet at their concert here Thursday. The members of this organization are Ottovak Cadek, first violin; Jaroslav Siskovsky, second violin; Ludvik Schwab, viola, and Bedrick Vaska, cello.

The Transcript found their playing "alert to the melody, the rhythm, the color and the motion of the music in hand. It courts the incisive tone, the vigorous progress, the characteristic and revealing energy of the chosen piece." The Herald chronicler did not like the balance of their tone, but praised their "excellent musicianship and stirring warmth of style."

Miss Leginska, according to this reviewer, "at her best as pianist and musician, proved herself an accomplished ensemble player as well." The Transcript writer thought that in her compositions there "was neither instant impact or sustained continuity of expression."

* * *

The National Polish Orchestra, conducted by Stanislaw Namyslowski, gave a concert in Symphony Hall Sunday evening of Polish music, most of which was unfamiliar. Stuart Mason (Christian Science Monitor) liked its "rhythmical vigor" and the "fine dash" with which some of the music was played.

In the Herald, the reviewer commented on the "rhythmic zest and sentiment" found in their performance, and lauded Mr. Namyslowski as "a conductor of authority and decision," although "given to crashing climaxes, and sentimental interludes." The Transcript writer considered it a "good, sonorous band, offering good rollicking dances and buoyant, melodic airs."

* * *

Carmela Ippolito, violinist, was the soloist at the third concert of the Apollo Club, Emil Mollenhauer conductor. Members of the club who were heard in incidental solos were W. Clifton Johnson, Henry C. Jackson, and Dr. William M. Parks, Jr. In the opinion of the Transcript reviewer, Miss Ippolito showed an advance over earlier performances in "heightened self-confidence, noticeably sharper rhythms, firmer attacks, richer, more sustained tones." She was also commended by the Herald and the Globe chroniclers.

Mr. Mollenhauer conducted, to quote the Transcript, "with imaginative and descriptive power" and the chorus sang with "careful gradations of tone and a fine feeling for rhythm" although their tonal balance was not always commendable. According to the Herald, they sang "with their usual efficiency," and the Globe reviewer commented that they proved themselves "capable of singing fine music well."

* * *

The novelties on the program of the Flute Players' Club program were Goossens' Five Impressions of a Holiday; Gaubert's Sonata for flute and piano; Edith Noyes' Legende d'Amour for violin, cello, and piano, and a Violin Sonata; and Margaret Starr McLain's Quintet for piano and strings. In the two last numbers, the composers were at the piano. Mrs. Marjorie Patten Weaver and Messrs. Sanroma, Thillois, Laurent, and Miquelle played.

According to the Transcript, the ensemble writing is "almost unbelievably perfect" in the Goossens work; Miss Noyes' Legende has melodies of "considerable" charm; her Sonata, in spite of a certain thematic repetition, was a more "pretentious" work; and Miss McLain's Quintet "showed her a composer of promise." The artists were praised for their performance.

Yolanda Mero in Second Recital

In a program of Bach, Dohnanyi, Debussy, Rachmaninoff, Liszt, Agghazy and Schubert, Yolanda Mero gave her second New York piano recital of the season in Aeolian Hall the afternoon of March 16. Mme. Mero's only other appearance here this season will be with orchestra. As the Sun expressed it, the pianist played "with a wealth of color and technical brilliance" as well as with a "crisp and sparkling" tone and unusual vitality.

Sherrill Choral Society Sings

Sherrill, New York.—Under the direction of Frank Parker the third annual concert of the Choral Society of Sherrill was given in the Plymouth Church Auditorium on the evening of February 16. Organ instrumental trio selections were included in the program.

"What Next in Music?"

(AN ANATOMY OF MODERNISM)

"AN UNQUALIFIED SUCCESS"

"Concerning Programme Music"

(DESCRIPTIVE MUSIC FROM A MODERN VIEWPOINT)

"REPEATS HER PREVIOUS TRIUMPH"

MARION ROUS

Re-engaged

"An authority and a sureness in her playing, together with a warmly emotional quality, made her performance one of rare delight. Her exposition of modernism was both happy and illuminating."
—N. B. Abbott, St. Paul News.

← ST. PAUL →

"It would be difficult to name anyone who has brought to the discussion of modernism in music a finer intelligence or more eclectic appreciation."
—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

"A pianist of temperament . . . Personality Plus . . . introduced a list of moderns which ordinarily would be considered as food only for the cognoscenti, but which this altogether lovely young woman, through the magic of voice and manner, made acceptable and enjoyable to layman and musician alike."
—Catherine Pannill Mead in Milwaukee Sentinel.

←MILWAUKEE→

"Altogether the sort of thing that belongs in the delightful category of 'Different'."
—C. P. Mead in Milwaukee Sentinel.

"Quite the most stimulating recital of the local season."
"Pianistic skill equal to every demand of the modern school."
—Mrs. George Richards, in Musical America.

←DULUTH→

"Won her audience—not only plays with rare skill but appeals to all types of listeners, with her original remarks on the music she interprets . . . and her sallies of wit . . ."
—Rizpah Mitchell in Duluth Herald.

"Ability as a pianist is all that can be desired."
"Unique and exceedingly clever lecture-recital."
—Scranton Republican.

←SCRANTON→

"Even more interesting and enjoyable than the program she gave last season, if that were possible."
—Scranton Republican.

"Unique in Atlanta's brilliant musical season."
—Louise Dooly in Atlanta Constitution.

←ATLANTA→

"This very clever young woman and able musician made her impression on Atlanta music-lovers last year—Yesterday her theme was 'Programme Music,' and her treatment of it strengthened her in the approval of an audience of good judgment."
—Louise Dooly in Atlanta Constitution.

CERTIFIED MUSICAL DIGEST

Steinway Piano

EVELYN HOPPER, Aeolian Hall, New York

Duo Art Records

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Paris Hears Goetterdaemmerung

Fiftieth Anniversary of Carmen; Strauss Alpine Symphony in Premiere.

Paris.

The recent revival of Wagner's Goetterdaemmerung at the Opera proved one of the most popular productions of the season with both press and public.

The outstanding feature of the performance was the Siegfried of Paul Franz. His stalwart appearance aided him in the interpretation of the part, and he was careful to present the proper air of the ingenuous character of Wagner's hero. His voice was best in its middle and lower ranges, although there were times when his acting and the expressiveness of his singing made up for any of his vocal deficiencies which might have been apparent.

The Bruennhilde of Marcella Demougeot was a portrayal of genuine feeling, and it grew in sympathy as the opera proceeded. She did not attain the heights she might have achieved in the scene of her farewell to Siegfried, but did well at most of the other important points in the story. Her voice was good in quality, but at times not sufficiently powerful. She looked her part to perfection.

Delmas as Hagen

Marc Delmas sang the role of Hagen, although he is better known in Paris as Wotan. The part seemed too low in range for him, and his acting did not present adequately the treachery of this character.

M. Carbelly displayed a voice of lyrical beauty, but his acting had little feeling. M. Duclos was a forceful Alberich. Jane Cros was the Gutrune, and Mlle. Lapeyrette made a stirring Waltraute. The Rhinemaidens were Mmes. Marilliet, Cecile Rex, and Y. Courso. Their voices were well matched, and blended unusually well. The Norns were drowned out most of the time by the orchestra, and when they could be heard they did not sound well.

Philippe Gaubert was the conductor of the performance. He did magnificent work in keeping his orchestral and vocal forces in line. The mise-en-scene was defective, especially in the last scene. Details in the stage management were criticized in the reviews, but for the most part the revival was welcome and successful.

Fiftieth Anniversary of Carmen

The fiftieth anniversary of the first performance of Bizet's Carmen was celebrated at the Opera-Comique with the 1,174th presentation of the work at that house.

When the opera was first produced it received a very cool reception. The authors of the libretto and score were accused of vulgarity, lack of originality, even immorality. The piece was withdrawn, and an attempt to revive it in the following autumn proved a failure. It was not heard again in Paris for eight years, although meantime it was gaining recognition abroad.

In way of commemoration Camille Bellaigue came before the audience at the memorial performance, and told the story of the premiere of Carmen on March 3, 1875. Among those present were M. Sherie, the first Don Jose; M. Bouhy, the first Escamillo; M. Duvermoy, who fifty years ago sang the part of Morales, and Mlle. Chevalier, the original Mercedes.

There were on view in the lobby a number of souvenirs of the composer and of Prosper Merimee, whose story was the basis of the Carmen plot. The display included many portraits and the manuscript score of the opera.

The title part at the gala performance was taken by Marthe Chenal. M. Friant sang Don Jose, and was forced by the audience to repeat the flower song. M. Andouin sang the music of Escamillo beautifully, and Mlle. Reville was a sympathetic Micaela. M. Ingelbrecht conducted.

New Opera Given at Benefit

At a gala performance at the Opera given to aid the Widows' and Orphans' Fund the program included the premiere of an opera by Mme. G. P. Simon, Fleur de Pecheur, composed to a libretto by Louis Payen. The story, which is a fantasy set in an Oriental scene, was well supported by the light and fluent music. Louise Barthe was the protagonist, the tenor Thill sang the part of the Emperor, Mlle. Soria that of Tsieon, and M. Bordon was Tschang-Oey. All the principals sang well, and Philippe Gaubert conducted efficiently. The opera was well received.

La Lepreuse, the opera by Lazzari and Bataille, was revived not long ago after the Opera-Comique had dropped it from its repertory for a season. The story, which is told in three acts, has many moments of dramatic intensity, and the composer, Sylvio Lazzari, has handled the situations well in his music.

The interpretation of La Lepreuse was of a high order. Marguerite Carre, the creator of the part of Aliette, sang it again, and Maria Delna was the Tili. A tenor new to Paris, M. Legrand, who has received favorable notice in the provinces, made a good impression in his debut in La Lepreuse. Lucy Perelli sang Mater Dolorosa, and MM. Vieulle and Azema completed the cast. Maurice Frigara conducted.

Premiere of Alpine Symphony

Strauss' Alpine Symphony had a rather belated premiere in Paris at the Salle Gaveau under the baton of a visiting conductor, Bernard Tittel, one of the leaders of the Vienna State Opera. The orchestra was the Colonne.

The symphonic poem did not impress the reviewers favorably. They granted it Strauss' customary orchestral ingenuity, but found it over-long, often flimsy in thematic material, and sometimes mawkish in its sentiment.

The orchestra played superbly at this concert, and the conductor showed an ability to infuse his players with his own enthusiasms, and to impart to them his conceptions regarding the music which they were playing.

The remainder of M. Tittel's program included Goldmark's Sakuntala Overture and Ravel's La Valse.

Prihoda in Two Concerts

Vasa Prihoda, violinist, gave two concerts of classic and modern music at the Salle des Agriculteurs last week.

The reviewers were unanimously of the opinion that he is one of the leading violinists of the day.

A joint recital at the Salle Gaveau divided attention between Frederique Gauthier, pianist, and Berthe Erza, soprano. Sonatas of Mozart and Liszt were well played by M. Gauthier, but he seemed most in his element in a group of compositions of Chopin.

Songs of Weber, Bach, Ravel, and Nabokoff displayed on the part of Mme. Erza a voice of small dimensions, although of considerable brilliance and warmth at times. Her attempt with the Love-Death of Isolde proved least effective because of the breadth of style required.

K. H. STOTTNER.

Dido and Aeneas Given in Operatic Form in Dessau

PURCELL'S Dido and Aeneas was given in operatic form in Dessau, Germany, during the week of March 9, reports a special cable to the New York Times. The English composer's work dates back to 1680, and has frequently been performed in all parts of the world in concert and oratorio form. Certain German critics have asserted that this operatic performance in Dessau was the first in the history of the piece.

One reviewer wrote that the performance was interesting despite the fact that he found it lacking in dramatic quality. He commented on the importance of Purcell in influencing the work of Handel.

No Turandot This Season

Milan.—Despite rumors to the contrary, Turandot, the last opera of the late Giacomo Puccini, will not be given its premiere this season at La Scala. Arturo Toscanini will probably complete the unfinished portions of the opera between the end of this season and the beginning of next. Rosa Raisa will be the protagonist. She will arrive in Milan in the spring to make her scheduled appearances at La Scala this season. F. C.

Essen Will Hear Scott Opera

Essen.—Cyril Scott's opera, The Alchemist, is to be produced here in the near future. A sequel to the opera, The Saint on the Mountain, is being written by Mr. Scott.

Walter Ferner Louis Persinger Elias Hecht
Louis Ford Nathan Firestone

CHAMBER MUSIC SOCIETY
OF SAN FRANCISCO
(FOUNDED 1916, BY ELIAS HECHT)
MUSICAL DIRECTION: LOUIS PERSINGER

Musical Courier, New York:
"The San Francisco organization must be ranked with the very finest organizations in the world."

Musical America, New York:
"The audience cheered them. They deserved to be cheered."

New York Evening Telegram:
"There are very few organizations in this country which play with so fine an ensemble, with such a full and beautiful tone, and with such authoritative musicianship."

New York American:
"Took a place easily, in the opinion of connoisseurs, as an organization of the first rank."

New York Evening Mail:
"The musicians from California have warmth and spirit, with a breadth and fullness of tone that is almost exuberant."

New York Telegraph:
"The Beethoven F major quartet. This jewel of Kammer musik has seldom, if ever, been better displayed in New York."

Philadelphia Evening Ledger:
"The playing was brilliant, exceptionally accurate as to intonation and ensemble, and sincere to the last degree."

Boston Telegram:
"The playing throughout was of the most exquisite variety. Never has anything more beautiful been heard. We hope to see them often in Boston."

Boston Transcript:
"At the end a cheering audience was on its feet, since clapping would not suffice it."

Chicago Musical Leader:
"Their playing revealed poetic interpretation, beauty of tone and precision, a wide scale of nuances and, at the same time, a youthful vigor and enthusiasm."

Los Angeles Express:
"They played with a warmth of human appeal and a wealth of artistic elegance seldom found. San Francisco may well be proud of their Chamber Music Society. In fact, America may be, for we have seldom heard such playing here."

San Francisco Examiner:
"Last night's concert was a delightful affair. There was a Beethoven Quartet, the one in G from Op. 18. I never heard that dainty Scherzo more beautifully played."

Honolulu Star-Bulletin:
"It would be difficult to find a group of artists who could surpass these men in precision of technique, subtlety of interpretation and blending of tone color."

FOR TERMS AND DATES APPLY TO
MANAGEMENT
CHAMBER MUSIC SOCIETY
708 Kohl Bldg., San Francisco, Cal. or
MAUD W. GIBBON
New York Representative
129 West 48th Street, New York

EUROPEAN NEWS AND VIEWS

The Rose String Quartet of Vienna visited London recently for two concerts. Left to right are Paul Fischer, Arnold Rose, Anton Rusitzka and Anton Walter.

Foreign Notes

Prague.—Two new works by Alois Haba, Die Sexualitat and Die Selbst Erhaltung, will be given their first hearing here soon at a moving picture theatre. The music is for a quarter-tone piano, string quintet, two harps (tuned a quarter tone higher) and two quarter-tone clarinets.

Rome.—Michael Balling, who has in past seasons directed at the Costanzi and at the Augusteum, directed a symphony concert at the latter place on February 22. His program included Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the Waldweben from Siegfried, and the overtures to the Flying Dutchman and to Freischuetz. He was warmly received and had to repeat Waldweben at the solicitation of the audience.

Monte Carlo.—The Monte Carlo Quartet, increased during some of the numbers on the program to a quintet, appeared recently at the Nouvelle Salle de Musique at the Casino of Monte Carlo. Most of the concert was devoted to works of Adela Maddison,, an English composer and a student of Gabriel Faure. Mrs. Maddison had an opera produced in Leipsic fifteen years ago.

Budapest.—After failing to receive a promised increase in salary, the orchestra of the Budapest Opera went on strike recently. A notice was issued by the ministry that every musician who did not return immediately was dismissed and not entitled to pension or other compensation. Performances were suspended, and, following a meeting of the musicians which broke up in excitement, telegrams were dispatched to all musicians' organizations in Europe asking that the Budapest Opera be boycotted.

London.—Ignace Jan Paderewski played a program of Chopin, Schubert, Beethoven, and Liszt over the radio last week from a London broadcasting station. The concert was relayed throughout the United Kingdom.

Leipsig.—The first Musical Science Congress of the German Music Society will be held here from June 4 to June 8.

Cologne.—Under the direction of Hermann Abendroth, the Lower Rhine Festival will be held here from June 11 to 14.

Berlin.—A Reger Festival, arranged by Felix Lederer, will be given at Saarbruck in the State Theatre. It will be followed by a Mozart week.

London.—E. J. Dent, English critic and musicograph, is in Munster, Germany, supervising the stage production of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas.

Venice.—A new opera by Ezio Camussi, Scampolo, had its premiere at the Fenice Theatre on February 22. Dario Niccodemi is the librettist.

The title role was sung by Anna Sassone-Soster, who displayed an intelligent understanding of the character as well as a sufficiently beautiful voice. She was much applauded during the acts as well as after each of them. The tenor Emilio Perea also won favor with his audience. Signora Pederzini sang the part of France, and the baritone Persichetti brought the proper dignity of bearing to his interpretation of the part of the engineer Bernini. His voice was at its best too. F. C.

Novelties Mark Moscow Season

Moussorgsky's Fair of Sorotchinski and Vassilenko Ballet Given; Celebrate Opera Anniversary.

Moscow.

Three important events took place in the life of the State Opera House this season. One of them was the premiere of the unfinished opera by Moussorgsky, The Fair of Sorotchinski; the second was the 100th anniversary of the theatre; and the third was the premiere of a new ballet by Serge Vassilenko, his Joseph's Legend.

Strictly speaking, the presentation of the Moussorgsky piece was not a premiere because about a decade ago this opera was given in much the same version in the so-called Free Theatre. There are in all three forms of this opera, one a version of Serge Sakhonovski, another by Cesar Cui and the third by Nicolas Tcherepnine. The first of these three versions is more in a vaudevillian vein than the others, which, on the other hand, partake most of the mood of light opera.

Moussorgsky's intention in the Fair was to write the first Russian comic opera. His untimely death prevented him from finishing his work. The sketches for the opera were left very incomplete and, in many cases, were not elaborated at all. The editors who have worked over the material therefore have had free rein in orchestration, in arrangement of the sequence of the scenes, and the like. It is to be imagined then that in the most careful of editions we should not have exactly the sort of thing that the composer was intending.

Use Sakhonovski Version

Such is the case with the Sakhonovski edition of the Fair, the one which the State Opera selected for its recent production. The editor has included in the opera some excerpts from the Gogol story which are spoken, not sung.

Whatever its defects this version of the piece has the great virtue of giving a talented and clever actor great opportunity to include in his interpretation effects of broad and gay comedy.

The performance of the Fair of Sorotchinski on this occasion was very good. In reporting it one must mention the excellent singing of Mme. Nejdanova, the Russian coloratura soprano, and the grotesque and amusing acting of Mme. Makarova-Shevchenko. The former had the part of the young girl, Parassia, and the latter was her malicious mother, Khivaria. All of the men's parts were well sung, and some of them were played with ingenious comedy.

In particular Tolachev, the basso who took the role of Tcherevik, father of Parassia, distinguished himself. The part of the girl's bridegroom was taken by the tenor Ozerov, Streltzov appeared as the priest's son, the lover of Khivria, and Luminarsky and Bugaisky completed the cast. The conductor of the opera was Nicolas Golovanov.

Two Days of Celebration

The centennial of the State Opera House was celebrated in a two-day festival. The building was beautifully decorated, and the officials in charge of the memorial events put up on the front the sign, "Art for the Workingman."

Before the commencement of the celebration inside the theatre a procession passed outside. In the ranks were many working men, students and soldiers. Those in the small parade carried red flags and banners at the head of their columns. Some of the slogans were, "Give us a revolutionary repertory," and "Closer to the masses," and so on.

Speeches were made before the crowds which assembled, and inside there was also an abundance of oratory and greetings. Following these ceremonies Nicolas Golovanov conducted a performance of his own Festival Cantata, which he had written especially for the occasion.

That evening some of the leading theatrical companies of Moscow gave performances of their pieces on the State Opera stage for the benefit of the artists and working men of the Opera. On the next evening there were performed excerpts from the operas Ruslan and Ludmilla, Sadko, and Les Sylphides, and from Stravinsky's Petrouchka. In each case the leading artists of the State Opera took part in the production.

New Vassilenko Ballet

The most recent novelty of the season was the performance of a new ballet by Vassilenko, his Joseph's Legend. The program included also a ballet to Schubert's Theolinde music. The most interesting detail in these novelties was the choreography of Kassian Goleizovsky, which particularly caught the attention of the audience. Good as it was, Vassilenko's music could hardly measure up in interest to the beautiful scenery which had been provided for his ballet.

VICTOR BELAIEV.

Monteux Mentioned for Monte Carlo

Monte Carlo.—Leon Jehin, musical director here for several years, has sent in a resignation which is effective the end of this season. It is reported that Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will succeed M. Jehin.

FORREST
LAMONT
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

Perosi Leads Choral Music at Costanzi

Rome.

The choral-symphonic work of Lorenzo Perosi, Moses, was presented at the Teatro Costanzi under the direction of the composer on February 28. It was heard at this theatre twenty-two years ago. This performance was a complete success, for the composer was called out to take his bow more than a score of times.

Signor Gasco, reviewer of La Tribuna, considered the score of Moses "rich in pages of inspired music." This chronicler pointed out two particularly beautiful passages, the chorale Sventura a Noi during the interlude of the plague, and the scene of the rite of the lamb.

"The last part of Moses," continued this writer, "is even more dramatic. The famine and the passage of the Red Sea are portrayed with suggestive thematic material and appropriate orchestral color. The song of the saved people is properly solemn, but the most moving melody is that which is sung by Moses in the dawn just before the sound of battle is heard."

This reviewer nevertheless found certain defects in the Perosi work. He objected to the interruption of the course of the story as told by the soloists and chorus by the interpolation of symphonic movements, no matter how beautiful they might be. Also he felt that at times the words of the text did not have sufficient and most fitting accent in the music. Signor Gasco remarked on the Wagnerian influence to which the composer seemed to have submitted himself at more than one point in his music.

The performance of Moses was good, according to these observers, although there were some singers of mediocre talents in the chorus. The soloists were the soprano Benedetti, the contralto Tesorieri, the baritone Inghilleri, the basso Belli, the baritone Viltani, and the tenor Fullin. The chorus and the orchestra gave a precise and expressive performance under the composer's leadership.

F. C.

Sibelius Will Visit London

London.—Jan Sibelius, Finnish composer, will conduct a new symphony of his at the Three Choirs Festival in September. Dame Ethel Smyth's Mass in D will also be heard, marking the first appearance of a woman composer on the program at the cathedral in this Festival.

Prague to Hear Janacek Novelty

Prague.—At the International Society's Festival here in May, Leos Janacek's new opera, The Cunning Little Fox, will be produced at the Czech National Opera.

May Complete Busoni Opera

Berlin.—Philip Jarnach will complete Busoni's unfinished opera, Doktor Faust, according to rumor here.

MME. CARA GINN

AMERICAN soprano and a former pupil of Jean de Reske, recently made a number of appearances with the Nice Opera Company, winning a noteworthy success in Mozart's Don Giovanni. Later Mme. Ginn appeared with the Cannes Opera Company under the direction of Renaldo Hahn. She is one of the young American singers of talent who are making their way in foreign countries and who are gradually attracting notice in the United States by their work abroad.

Bilotti Makes Paris Debut

Paris, March 11.—Anton Bilotti made his Paris debut last evening in the Salle Comoedia. His program included the Bach-Busoni Fantasy in A minor, the pianist's own Variations on an Old Theme, a Beethoven sonata, a group of Chopin pieces, and two compositions of Liszt.

One-Armed Pianist Plays

Vienna.—In a recent concert here, Paul Wittgenstein, who lost his right hand in the war, played a Concerto written for him by Erich Korngold. Another Concerto is being written for him by Richard Strauss.

London Opera Plans Progress

Roster of Artists Being Filled; English Capital Hears Repeat Recitals.

London.

Further announcements and rumors lend interest to the promised opera season at Covent Garden in May-June. Negotiations are said to be in progress for the appearance of Mmes. Jeritza and dal Monte, and one informed writer makes the engagement of the former singer—for Italian roles only—a certainty.

Four other artists who were among the best-liked during last year's German season are definitely to return: Mmes. Lotte Lehman and the lovely Salome, Gota Ljungberg; and Richard Mayr and Friederich Schorr, "that inimitable Ochs" and "that excellent Wotan," the Telegraph calls them respectively.

Neither new music nor new musicians enlivened the first week of March in London's concert halls, save with the debut appearance of the Philharmonic Trio, composed of Messrs. Leon Goossens, oboist, Albert Fransella, flutist, and G. O'Connor Morris, pianist. The first two are the leaders of their respective sections in the Royal Philharmonic, and Mr. Goossens at least is an artist of the very highest rank. Mr. Morris has hitherto confined himself chiefly to accompanying. The concert was commended in the press, although the novelties of composition presented did not escape unscathed.

At the latest Queen's Hall Orchestra concert, Guilhermina Suggia, the cellist, was to have been soloist, but owing to illness a substitute had to be found for her. Benno Moiseiwitsch consented to appear, and played the piano part in the Tschaikowsky B flat minor Concerto, and a group of solo pieces. His "complete and assured technical command" (Robbin Legge) were everywhere the subject of favorable comment, although the Observer writer regretted being "dragged down willynilly to the level of attention at which one consciously and terribly admires his marvellously ordered fingers."

The Rose Quartet made a second and last appearance at the Wigmore Hall on March 7, and this time unequivocally favorable comment followed their concert. The Telegraph writer concluded his review with a note on "the loftiness of interpretation, the magnificent body of tone, the clean and direct expression" which "made a deep impression."

P. L.

Coq d'Or Is Presented At Teatro Regio in Turin

Turin.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Coq d'Or, an opera little known in Italy, was presented at the Teatro Regio here on February 18. The work was well received by a large audience.

The reviewer of La Stampa considered the opera gracious and beautiful. He found it even in its operatic form very much in the nature of a ballet, and felt that at times one had the need of some variety in its mood.

The performance was prepared and directed by Gaetano Bavagnoli, who was much praised for his work. Under his baton the instrumental color of the Regio orchestra was at its richest. The co-ordination and balance of the voices and accompaniment were also of the best. Maestro Bavagnoli was called out many times together with the principals to acknowledge the applause.

The leading artists in the presentation were Signori Viglione-Borghese, Raissof, Castiglione, Villa, Dominici, and Tihonova, and Signore Ruggeri and Sari. Signor Viglione-Borghese, baritone, won the honors of the evening, but was seconded closely by Signor Raissof, tenor, who showed a clear enunciation and beautiful head tones. Signora Sari sang excellently, but her acting was not up to her high vocal standard.

Sing Music of Palestrina

Rome.—A concert of lay music of Palestrina was conducted by Domenico Alaleona at the Sala Accademica di Santa Cecilia on February 13. Maestro Alaleona preceded the music by a short talk on the life and music of the composer.

The centenary of the same composer was celebrated two days later at the Augusteum with a concert of his music sung by the Societa Romana Polifonica under the direction of Raffaele Casimiri. Also four compositions for organ by composers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were included in this program.

Taylor Suite for Leeds

London.—Deems Taylor's Suite, Through the Looking Glass, will be presented at the Leeds Festival next October.

BONCI
VOCAL STUDIO
For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900. New York City
Knabe Piano

MARJORIE MEYER
SOPRANO
Management: Standard Booking Office, 17 East 42d St., New York

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON 1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: CHARLES L. WAGNER D. F. McSWEENEY
511 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

THE students in the School of Music of Yale University gave a concert March 11 in Sprague Memorial Hall. The artists appearing were Angeline Kelley, soprano; Helen Virginia Cain, contralto; Theodore Carswell Hume, tenor, and Alfred Ashfield Finch, baritone, all of whom are pupils of Francis Rogers. Walter Frank Chatterton was at the piano.

The Gunn School in Chicago will move May 1 into its new quarters built for the school by the Fine Arts Building Corporation and designed by Rebori. There will be a recital hall with a seating capacity of 200, and the school will have the privilege of using the Fine Arts recital hall for larger concerts.

Marion Murtaugh, artist pupil of Mr. Gunn, was heard recently at Webster College and at the Visitation Convent in St. Louis.

The sixth in the series of faculty recitals at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia was given March 10 by Berthe Bert, pianist.

A song recital was given in Town Hall, New York, Wednesday evening, by Frederick Wolkow, tenor, and Charlotte Harvis, soprano. Mr. Harvis is a pupil of Emilio Roxas.

The Right Reverend Paul Ferretti, O. S. B., president of the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music at Rome, will lecture at the Pius X School of Liturgical Music at the College of the Sacred Heart, New York, this coming summer. The courses to be given at the summer school (which opens June 29 and extends over a period of six weeks) include study of the Gregorian Chant, Gregorian accompaniment, polyphonic music, and the Ward method. These courses will be conducted by the Abbott Dom Ferretti, Mrs. Justine B. Ward, Nicola Montani, and Mother G. Stevens.

Bernhard Knudsen, a violin student of Carl Tollefsen, won the Young Artists' Contest recently given at Wanamaker's under the auspices of the American Federation of Music Clubs. The three judges were the violinists, Arthur Hartman and Eddy Brown, and Felix Deyo, critic of the Brooklyn Standard Union.

The young violinist played the first movement of the Mendelssohn Concerto, and, with Augusta Tollefsen at the piano, gave the Sonata for Violin and Piano by Albert Stoessel.

The winner of this contest is entitled to appear in the District contest comprising four States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware. The winner of the District Contest will then compete in the finals to be held in Portland, Ore., early in June.

The Cleveland Institute Chorus of one hundred mixed voices will give its first public performance of the season Friday evening at the Hotel Statler ballroom. Haydn's The Seasons will be the oratorio given. The chorus is under the direction of John Peirce, baritone, head master of the voice department of the Institute. Soloists will be Pearl Hemler, soprano; Howard Justice, tenor, and Thomas W. Lane, bass.

The dates and courses for the summer session of the Cleveland Institute have just been announced. The summer school will open for a six weeks' session on June 22 and will close August 1. In addition to Ernest Bloch's Master Course, which will be given two hours daily for five weeks, there will be master classes in piano, violin and cello by Beryl Rubinstein, Andre de Ribaupierre and Victor de Gomez. These classes will be held twice a week and will offer interpretation, pedagogy, and concert repertory. There will be regular classes and private lessons in all branches of music.

On Friday, March 6, Margaret Carlisle, artist-pupil of Edna Richolson Sollitt, was the soloist at the Kimball Hall noonday concert, playing the Rachmaninoff Second Concerto and other numbers. Miss Carlisle also appeared in Chicago last month, in the Medtner concert.

Other artist-pupils of Mrs. Sollitt will appear in Kimball Hall this season, including Virginia Stocklin and Elizabeth Brooks Gray, who also played recently for the Glencoe Woman's Club. Ora Manning gave a program of French music at the Matinee Musicale of Elkhart, Ind.

A piano recital, devoted to compositions by Leopold Godowsky, was given by the progressive series pupils of the Braun School of Music, Pottsville, Pa., on March 2. Those appearing were Mary Marshall, Sylvia Eber, Ruth Eber, Goldie Moskovitz, Elwood Holstein, Marian Heisler, Grace Lengel, Isabelle Hoffman, Kathryn Holahan, Norman Lloyd, Frank McCurl, Jane Daddow, Catherine Dreshman, Leonard Geiger, Mary Dormer, Gertrude Eber, Mildred Parton, Anna Davis Barrow, Blanche Wade, Marian Deinman, Mary Grace, and Norma Schucker.

An offer from the Alabama college, Montevallo, to conduct a summer master class there has been accepted by Walter Spry, pianist and teacher of the Columbia School of Music.

Photo by Tyler.

FRANZ KNEISEL

New York Violinist and Teacher, Whose Colony at Blue Hill, Me., Will Again Attract Many Students and Professional Folk This Summer.

Teachers noted in the world of concerts and pedagogy will award free tuition to worthy students this season as in years past at the Bush Conservatory Summer School. Frederic Lamond, Scotch pianist, will select from the applicants one student to study as a scholarship winner under him for the summer term. Other pianists who will award free tuition to talented and deserving students are Jan Chiapusso, Edgar A. Nelson, Julie Rive-King, Ella Spravka, John Blackmore, Jeanne Boyd and Elsie Alexander.

The winners of scholarships among the violinists may study with Richard Czerwonky, Bruno Esbjorn, Rowland Leach, or Ebba Sundstrom. Among the voice teachers who have offered summer scholarships are Charles W. Clark, Boza Ourmiroff, Louis Kreidler, Nelli Gardini, Mae Graves Atkins, Emerson Abernethy, Justine Wagener and William Phillips. One scholarship in public school music will be awarded by Lyravine Vitaw, director of that deparament in the conservatory whose professional and personal qualifications, in addition to a good grounding in applied music, are best adapted to make a successful supervisor in music.

Examinations for these summer scholarships will be held on June 25 and 26.

Fellowships Announced By Juilliard Foundation

The Juilliard Musical Foundation is prepared to award one hundred fellowships in music to American music students. These fellowships will be for study in singing, piano, violin, violoncello and composition. Awards are made by competitive examination conducted by the Examining Board of the Foundation.

Students receiving fellowships will receive free instructions under teachers at the New York school maintained by the Foundation. Each fellowship represents a tuition value of about $1,000.

Competing students must be over sixteen and under thirty years of age, and citizens of the United States. They must present credits in general education that are the equivalent of a four-year High School course; and they should demonstrate exceptional capacity and training in one or more of the specific divisions of music study.

Appointments will be made for one school year with an opportunity of renewal at the discretion of the Foundation.

Students residing at a distance from New York and nominated for fellowships by affiliated schools or accredited teachers, may have traveling expenses paid by the Foundation to New York for examination. Students who are not nominated by affiliated schools or accredited teachers will be permitted to enter the examinations at their own expense. If such students secure a fellowship, traveling expenses may be paid by the Foundation.

Examinations for the 1925-1926 fellowships will be held in New York City at the Foundation on June 15 to 18 inclusive and on September 28 to October 3, inclusive. Application blanks for the June examinations should reach the New York office not later than June 5 and for the September examinations not later than September 18.

Mme. Margaret Melville Liszniewska's composition, a string quintet, was played in Cincinnati recently by Jean Have, Julian de Pulikowski, Peter Froelich, and Desire Dandzowski with the composer at the piano. A concert of new sonatas, including works by Vierne, Stoessel, and Melcer, was played by Dr. Karol Liszniewski, pianist, and Robert Perntz and Julian de Pulikowski, violinists.

Pietro Yon, organist and teacher, has been fulfilling many engagements recently in his tour of the Middle West.

Joseph Achron, Russian violinist and composer, has settled in New York, where he has opened a studio for violin teaching.

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
16—Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

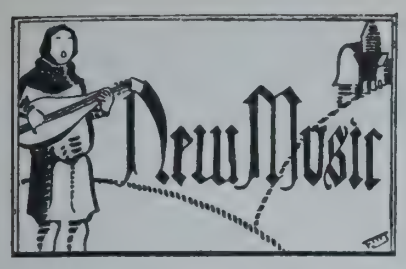
WILLIAM FICHANDLER
PIANO INSTRUCTION
Technic—Interpretation—Teaching Methods
604 West 115th St.
New York City
Telephone: Cathedral 6854

PIETRO CIMINI
CONDUCTOR
Chicago Civic Opera Company
5TH YEAR
PERSONAL ADDRESS: CONGRESS HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILL.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephone: Circle 10117

HILDA GRACE GELLING
VOCAL STUDIO
128 West 72nd St., N. Y. City
Telephone Endicott 1587
ASSOCIATE TEACHER WITH PERCY RECTOR STEPHENS



A NEW anthology of piano music, Ten Recital Pieces, which has just been issued by the Oliver Ditson Company, New York, will hold forth the utmost interest to teachers and advanced students of the piano. The works included in the group are the Bach-Burmeister Prelude in E flat minor; Brahms' A flat Waltz; a piano arrangement of Drdla's Souvenir; Grieg's Puck; Poldini's Cherubs; Saint-Saens' The Swan; the Schubert-Burmeister Andante from the Sonata in A; Schuett's Night Thought; Schumann's Impromptu in D and Scherzino in F; and Sinding's Serenade.

Various musicians have edited the separate pieces. The fingering is marked out thoroughly, and phrasing and pedaling are taken care of fully also. The edition is clearly printed, and has the added virtue of a very reasonable price.

A text of the very first grade for the study of the violin is published by the Willis Music Company, Cincinnati, O. The author of these First Steps of the Young Violinist is Otto C. A. Merz. The exercises are carefully graded from the very first steps on. The author has included helpful written texts from time to time, and he has provided his exercises with tasteful accompaniments for the teacher. Mr. Merz has been sensible enough also to realize the importance of some musical interest in the work, and the later pieces are accordingly catchily melodious.

From the same publishers come Rudolf Friml's The Foxy Kitten, a piece for the most elementary piano pupil. Of similar grade are a series of five duets by Mr. Friml, included under one cover with the title, Musical Adventures for Four Little Hands.

The Willis Music Company has devoted attention in two of its recent issues to the ambitious saxophone player. Edward C. Barroll's Ten Little Pieces are arranged for C melody saxophone and E flat alto saxophone. In each edition the pieces are provided with piano accompaniment.

Jascha Gurewich is the editor of Popular Favorites for the same instrument. He has arranged some well known compositions of Gluck, Albeniz, Cadman, Delibes, Friml and himself.

Very First Lessons on the Violin, by Jasper Graham, are published by the Boston Music Company, Boston, Mass. The volume includes a dozen short pieces for the most elementary pupils of violin-playing. The lessons are printed both with and without piano accompaniment.

The same house has published a Celtic Lullaby for violin and piano, by Gilbert Beard. It is a melodious composition of elementary grade.

First Freischuetz of Year at Metropolitan

The first Der Freischuetz of the season was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, the evening of March 16. In the opinion of Olin Downes of the Times, it was probably "the finest interpretation of an opera that the company has given this season.

In the cast were Mmes. Rethberg, Mario, Hunter, Ryan and Robertson, and Messrs. Bohnen, Meader, Schuetzendorf, Schlegel, Wolfe, Rothier and Gabor. Mr. Meader took the place of Curt Taucher, who is not yet well of his fall. Artur Bodanzky, whose recitatives, substituted for some of the original spoken parts of the opera, again received general commendation for his conducting. Samuel Thewman, stage director, and Joseph Urban, scenic director, also came in for special commendation.

Mme. Rethberg's "beautiful" singing was admired by Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Henderson wrote that she brought to the role of Agatha "her unfailing beauty of voice and her well planned delivery." Mr. Downes wrote: "Rarely has she displayed such a blend of beautiful singing with acting wholly in character." Pitts Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail and the Post reviewer wrote similarly.

Mr. Sanborn considered Mr. Bohnen "perfection itself . . . giving one of the most superbly picturesque and telling impersonations known to opera." Deems Taylor mentioned that he "repeated his powerful and immensely effective impersonation of the villainous Caspar," and that Mr. Meader "sang mellifluously" as Max. He lauded Miss Mario, who "succeeded by sheer force of personality and good singing in making a very charming person out of Aennechen."

Mr. Bohnen also received Olin Downes' praise, and Mr. Henderson commented that his delineation "is one of the most forceful in his varied repertory." In the Post he was commended for his work, and Queena Mario's "charming portrayal" and the "skill and beauty" of her singing were praised. This writer also admired Mr. Meader, as did Mr. Downes, who wrote that he substituted for Curt Taucher "with native intelligence and histrionic aptitude." Mr. Henderson thought Mr. Meader's art "admirable," although his voice was not well suited to the music.

Another to praise Miss Mario was Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Downes observed that "vocally there was freer, more flexible emission and a better tone quality, while the action was less soubrettish, more simple and in key."

Damrosch Reaches 40th Year as New York Symphony Conductor

THE fortieth anniversary of Walter Damrosch's leadership of the New York Symphony Orchestra falls on next Friday, March 27. Messages of congratulation have been reaching Mr. Damrosch from musicians and other persons of note in all parts of the world.

Among those who have sent their felicitations are Mrs. Calvin Coolidge, Charles E. Hughes, William H. Taft, Governor Alfred E. Smith, Ignace Paderewski, Frederick Stock, Leopold Stokowski, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Artur Bodanzky, Otto H. Kahn, the officers of the American Academy in Rome, Charles M. Widor, Joseph Hofmann, Henri Rabaud, Alfred Hertz, Alfred Verbrugghen, Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, Bruno Walter, Adolph S. Ochs, Sir Henry Wood, Walter Henry Rothwell, Rudolph Ganz, and others.

Mrs. Coolidge's message to Mr. Damrosch reads: "Because I am one of those who enjoy your music, I send you cordial greetings and congratulations on the completion of forty years as conductor. I add best wishes for long years to come."

Music of the Movies

The music program at the Rialto this week is headed by Ambrose Thomas' Mignon Overture. Theodore Webb, baritone, is singing Swing Along, by Will Marion Cook.

The principal musical attraction at the Rivoli this week is In a Garden of Roses with the Rivoli Ensemble. The Overture Populaire is played by the orchestra. The concluding number is Drdla's Souvenir, played by Michael Rosenker, Maurice Price and Ovady Julbert, arranged for three violins by Willy Stahl.

The Mark Strand presents Pauline Miller, who sings a duet with Everett Clark tenor, in Joseph Plunkett's prologue to Sally. The Mound City Blue Blowers, the Mark Strand male quartet, a dance by the ballet corps to tunes from a hurdy-gurdy, and songs from Jerome Kern's score for Sally are other features of the prologue.

Maria Yurieva and Veselaff Swoboda, dancers, of the Petrograd and Moscow Imperial Ballets, are appearing at the Capitol Theatre in the supplementary program to Victor Seastrom's Confession of a Queen. They are offering an interpretation of Chopin's Nocturne in E flat.

VOICE TRAINING, by W. S. Drew, published by the Oxford University Press, London, consists of a series of essays on subjects of fundamental interest and importance in the art of singing. The papers were written to take the place of the few preliminary lectures which Mr. Drew has been in the habit of giving his pupils on the relation of the theoretical and practical sides of his subject.

The author has not made the mistake of thinking that the art of singing can be taught in a book, no matter how large its dimensions. He simply discourses in his essays in more or less detail concerning various matters which the singer and student of singing find important every day of their careers. He is experienced, gifted with good sense and teaching ability, and apparently technically learned in his field.

The result is that the eighty pages of Voice Training are packed with material of stimulating interest to the student of singing. After some preliminary remarks, in which Mr. Drew considers the importance of detailed knowledge as well as original talent in singing, and in which he defines his art, he turns to what for the moment is his more important subject-matter.

He speaks of general mechanisms of the voice and of the problem of breathing, considers the physics of pitch and tone quality, and discusses in some detail pronunciation. From time to time Mr. Drew suggests exercises which he thinks will aid in bringing about helpful changes in the singer's technique, and he makes reference en passant and in a short appended bibliography to a small number of books which he considers valuable.

Mr. Drew's analysis of the enunciation of the vowel sounds and consonants of several languages is exceptionally stimulating, for it is fundamental and keenly analytical in its method, and if it does not cover the broad field entirely in itself, it opens up great vistas which the minds of the individual readers are instructed to an extent how to explore.

Chapters also are devoted to phrasing, interpretation and teaching, and the author seems consistently through these changes of subject to know thoroughly whereof he speaks.

Bachaus Gives His Second Concert

The second of his series of three piano recitals was given the evening of March 9 in Aeolian Hall, New York, by William Bachaus. Among other things, Mr. Bachaus played Scriabin's Poeme Satanique and his Fifth Sonata. According to Herbert F. Peysed (Telegram-Mail) he played "with that sweep and immense glamour so wholly characteristic."

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

EVERY READER OF "THE MUSICAL DIGEST"
SHOULD READ
"Music & Letters"
The British Musical Quarterly
"Those who give thought to the vital and intimate problems of music can always find a budget of good matter in Music & Letters."
—London Morning Post.
100 pages; 20s per annum post free.
LONDON: 22 ESSEX STREET, W. C. 2.

ALBERTO BIMBONI
VOCAL STUDIO
2025 Broadway, New York City
Telephone Endicott 6074

IRENE WILLIAMS
SOPRANO
Available Concert, Oratorio, Recitals, After January, 1925
Brunswick Records
Personal Address: 15 West 74th St., N. Y. C.

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

Taylor Suite Played; Hekking Makes Debut

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg conducting, featured Erna Rubinstein, violinist, as soloist in its concert of March 15 at the Metropolitan Opera House, and Gerard Hekking, Dutch cellist, in his American debut on its Carnegie Hall programs of last Thursday and Friday. On the latter occasions Deems Taylor's suite, Through the Looking Glass, was given for the first time on a Philharmonic subscription program. It had been played the night previously at the ninth concert of the students' series.

Olin Downes wrote that Mr. Hekking played "in a robust, straightforward manner, with a sonorous tone, but without very much individuality." The world writer said that Lalo's D minor Concerto "served to show the full musicianly qualities of Mr. Hekking and his obvious scholarly devotion to the dark flower of the cello music."

According to Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail), "he played with sure and facile technique, with a fine dynamic sense and with a vigorous, even brilliant, tone." The Sun writer considered he showed "good tone, excellent taste and dignity of style." In the Herald Tribune the chronicler hailed him as a cellist of "unusual quality, with a tone of richness and warmth, smooth and fluent except for a period or two of vigorous bowing and a slight cloudiness in some higher notes, while his technical skill was more than equal to the demands of the composition." The Post reported that his work was "thoroughly artistic."

Miss Rubinstein repeated her performance of the Beethoven violin Concerto which she gave at a previous part of Philharmonic concerts and received commendatory notices.

Lawrence Gilman (Herald Tribune) wrote of Mr. Taylor's work that "the score deserves its success on solidly musical grounds. This suite is an exceptionally fine piece of craftsmanship" as well as having "pictorial vividness," poetic charm and "distinction of idea." Mr. Sanborn commented that "hearing it under the expert leadership of Mr. Mengelberg, one rejoiced anew in its fancy, its humor, its skillful orchestration." The Post reported that "Mr. Mengelberg read the score most sympathetically and with full appreciation of its whimsy, its gay good humor and its genuine loveliness."

The reviewer in the Sun felt that "the brilliant and fanciful piece made evidently a strong appeal to Mr. Mengelberg, as his orchestra gave the score a superb performance." Olin Downes wrote that the Suite gains with repeated hearings. "The music is tinged with fancy and tenderness. The composer has a genuine melodic vein and a poetic spirit. He has also produced a very well made score, notable alike for its ingenuity and refinement . . . His manner is spontaneous and original."

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld

RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street

"Sackcloth & Scarlet"

WITH ALICE TERRY

RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA

RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street

"CONTRABAND"

With Lois Wilson, Noah Beery and Raymond Hatton

FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA

Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

OTTAVIO SCOTTO

HAS been named technical and administrative director of the coming opera season in the Colon Theatre, in Buenos Aires. The season will last from July to September, and will be under the supervision of the municipality.

Tullio Serafin of the Metropolitan Opera Company will conduct the opera season and Mr. Scotto already has secured the services of the following artists: Beniamino Gigli, Claudia Muzio, Frances Alda, Elena Serafin-Rakewska, Giuseppe de Luca, Cesare Formichi, Urizar, Pinza (from La Scala), Adamo Didur, and Adolph Bolm.

According to present plans the repertoire will include Falstaff, L'Amore dei Tre Re, Cena delle Beffe, Fedra, Traviata, Aida, Marta, Andrea Chenier, Gianni Schicchi, Manon Lescaut, Monna Vanna, Louise, Romeo et Juliette, La Femme Nue, Parsifal, Lohengrin, Le Coq d'Or, and Petrouchka.

Walkuere Music in Concert Form

Minneapolis, March 18.—The Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Henri Verbrugghen, presented Elsa Alsen, soprano, Arthur Middleton, bass, and Paul Althouse, tenor, as the soloists in excerpts from the first act of Die Walkuere. This, as well as the two other numbers, Goossens' Scherzo, Tam O'Shanter, and Eichheim's Oriental Impressions, was heard here for the first time.

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, was the assisting artist at the concert two weeks previously in Chopin's Concerto for piano and orchestra in F minor. Weber's Der Freischuetz Overture, Beethoven's Second Symphony, and Schelling's Fantasy for orchestra, A Victory Ball, were also on the program.

Serafin to Conduct Modern Music

Tullio Serafin will conduct a program of modern music by Malipiero and Hindemith at the concert of the League of Composers at the Forty-eighth Street Theatre, New York, Sunday evening. Malipiero's venture with a new operatic form, Sette Canzoni, will be introduced to America as a work for twenty-four instruments with four of the original seven songs. The soloists of the evening will be Lucilla de Vescovi, soprano; Richard Hale, baritone; Albert Rappaport, tenor, and Wilfred Pelletier, pianist.

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door

World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre

Edward Bowes, Managing Director

"Confessions of a Queen"

With Alice Terry and Lewis Stone

PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL

Capitol Grand Orchestra

Capitol Ballet Corps

Lines o' News AND Chatter

What Ho! Now comes Concert Management Arthur Judson with the first issue of a series of "house" bulletins. Information designed for local managers of concert courses—individuals, clubs, and other organizations—appears in this introductory bulletin, which is excellently printed. "All items appearing on the pages devoted to the announcements of Concert Management Arthur Judson will be strictly in accord with the facts as this organization knows them" is one statement.

* * *

A partial list of the soloists thus far engaged by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra for next season includes Josef Hofmann, Walter Gieseking, Albert Spalding, Myra Hess, Florence Easton, Clarence Whitehill, E. Robert Schmitz, Max Steindel, Michel Gusikoff, the orchestra's concertmaster, and Mr. Ganz.

* * *

John McCormack is back in town, feeling his best self again, and ready to renew his concert activities.

* * *

Joseph Schwarz is the newest artist to come under the management of Charles L. Wagner. Here is a distinguished baritone whose position in Europe is of the highest. Plans which are being made for him in this country should be a considerable factor in securing for him opportunities he merits receiving.

* * *

For just two days they paused in New York: Maestro Polacco and Edith Mason Polacco. They sailed last Saturday for Italy.

* * *

And Business Manager Herbert Johnson is also in town, looking after Chicago Civic Opera affairs. He will sail for Europe in about a fortnight.

* * *

So the Colon opera season is to take place this coming summer after all. It will be the first time that the Buenos Aires municipality undertakes an active hand in the management. Now comes Ottavio Scotto's chance to demonstrate his resources as an administrative director.

* * *

Eddie Johnson bought some violets the other day and sent them to Lucrezia Bori. And in Pelleas et Melisande Clarence Whitehill kills Eddie with a sword which looks to be twenty feet long.

* * *

Louise Homer and Frances Alda, Palm Beach residents pro tem, were not affected by the recent fire.

* * *

Now comes Gennaro Papi, preparing for his eighth successive season as first conductor at Ravinia Park. Louis Eckstein seems to have faith in Gennaro. Incidentally, Mario Chamlee is to be one of the principal tenors during the coming Eckstein opera festival.

* * *

A dinner will be given at Town Hall, New York, before the annual concert of the Music School Settlement tomorrow evening. Among those who will be present are Mme. Yolanda Mero, the Duchesse de Richelieu, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Schelling, Mr. and Mrs. George Barrere, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Louis Svecenski, Arthur Whiting and Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes.

* * *

Josef Hofmann, pianist, has revealed the name of his childhood patron who, by his generous gifts, made it possible for the young Hofmann to devote himself to studying music. The man was the late Alfred Corning Clark, a New York real estate man.

"While he lived he insisted that his name must not be known," said Mr. Hofmann, "but now that he is dead, I feel that it is right that his name should be known."

When the pianist's early concert career was checked by the intervention of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Mr. Clark stepped in and offered to send the boy and his family to Europe and to finance his musical education. Although Mr. Hofmann received a gift of $50,000 from his benefactor, he saw him only twice.

* * *

James McCormack has announced that, beginning yesterday, his office is located at 41 East Forty-second street, New York City.

* * *

Well, the Tenor Masque is unmasked. According to an announcement of Messrs. Beckhard and MacFarlane, his managers, the young singer who appeared so modestly not long ago was none other than Weyland Echols. That puts at rest the rumors that the singer was one of New York's newspaper reviewers—Pitts Sanborn or Bill Henderson or Lawrence Gilman—trying himself out on the public behind the skirts of anonymity.

* * *

Genuine interest in the announced performances of Alglala is reported of the National Federation of Music Clubs. Fortune Gallo, who is making the arrangements, returned to New York recently from an out of town trip.

* * *

Among the managers who are about New York these days are Mrs. Gertrude Fothergill, of Hartford; Mrs. Wilson-Greene of Washington; W. A. Albaugh of Baltimore, and P. Joe Congdon of Binghamton.

* * *

Pretty soon now we may expect to learn what artists are to sing in the first Los Angeles Grand Opera Association season.

* * *

Manager Daniel Mayer will buy himself, shortly, some linen suits to wear in Havana when he journeys to that city with Dusolina Giannini, who is soon to make her debut in that music-loving city.

* * *

Vlado Kolitsch, New York violinist, and Miss Muriel Richmond, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Richmond of England, were married in Wilkesbarre, Pa., March 14. Mr. and Mrs. Kolitsch will reside in New York.

* * *

The autographs of music folk have been conspicuous on the hotel registers at Palm Beach this season. . . . At a recent tea given by the Society of Arts at the Whitehall guests of honor included:

Mr. and Mrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Mr. and Mrs. John Philip Sousa, Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Olga Samaroff, Messrs. Cadek, Siskovsky, Schwab and Vaska of the New York String Quartet, Isaiah Seligman, the Duke and Duchess de Richelieu, Irene Bordoni, Ignacio Zuolaga, Bebe Daniels and Martha Messenger of the New York Theatre Guild.

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

APR 7 [illegible]
UNIVERSITY OF [illegible]

The Musical Digest

Blue Stands for Brahms
See Page 5

VOL. VII. NO. 24 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MARCH 31, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

Gennaro Papi after the close of the Metropolitan Opera season in New York will conduct with the company on its visits to Atlanta, Cleveland and Rochester. He will be one of the conductors of the spring opera season at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre in Paris beginning May 18, and will return to the United States after that for his eighth year as director of the season at Ravinia Park, Chicago, this summer.

Bulletins of News

Miss Sophie Braslau, contralto, has filed suit in the Supreme Court of New York pleading, on grounds set forth as constituting sufficient reason, the annulment of a contract with the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau covering her services with the Victor Talking Machine Company for the making of recordings of her singing. The point at issue is one touching upon Miss Braslau's desire to renew her contract with the Victor Company direct, independent of any action in the matter by the Wolfsohn corporation. Miss Braslau was formerly managed by Wolfsohn, and is now concertizing under the management of Concert Management Arthur Judson.

The Wolfsohn Musical Bureau has announced two subscription series for next season in New York following the success of the one series this winter, the Saturday Series, and the Sunday Series.

The artists who will appear in the Saturday Series are Toscha Seidel, violinist, October 17; John Powell, pianist, October 24; Louise Homer, contralto, October 31; Josef Hofmann, pianist, November 14; Mabel Garrison, soprano, November 21; Olga Samaroff, pianist, January 2; Maria Kurenko, soprano (New York debut), January 16; Cecilia Hansen, violinist, January 30; the London String Quartet, March 6; and Edward Johnson, tenor, March 27.

On Sundays the following will be heard: Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, October 25; Benno Moiseiwitsch, pianist, November 1; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, November 8; Cleveland Orchestra, Nikolai Sokoloff conductor, December 13; Hulda Lashanska, soprano, January 3; the "S" trio, a new chamber music organization consisting of Toscha Seidel, Harold Samuel, and Felix Salmond, January 31; Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, February 28; Charles Hackett, tenor, March 14; Mary Lewis, soprano, New York debut, March 28; and Albert Spalding, violinist, April 4.

Edward Siedle, for the past thirty years technical director of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, died yesterday morning at his country home in Portchester, N. Y. During the last two months he has been inactive because of the sickness, diabetes, which caused his death. Mr. Siedle was born in Woolwich, England, on May 30, 1858.

A drive to raise a trust fund of $2,500,000 for the uplift of British opera has been initiated by a group of well known men headed by the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the Earl of Clarendon, according to a dispatch from London in the New York Evening Post.

The chief beneficiary will be the British National Opera Company which, in the three years of its existence, has collected a deficit of $160,000. Those who are backing the drive desire to restore to London an operatic company of the first class, which it has not had since before the war.

Chicago, March 27—The members of the orchestra of the Chicago Civic Opera Company have received a wage increase of $8 which makes their minimum wage $119 a week. The agreement provides for $5 for each practice period, amounting to nearly $40 a week extra. The average salary is now about $155.

Feodor Chaliapin will not sing with the Chicago Opera Company next season, according to an announcement by S. Hurok, the singer's manager. No reason was given for the change in plans. It had been understood that Mr. Chaliapin would continue his engagement with the Chicago Company. Mr.

Philadelphia Orchestra Celebrates 25th Birthday

PHILADELPHIA, March 30.—The Philadelphia Orchestra with Leopold Stokowski conductor, celebrated its twenty-fifth birthday last Friday in a special concert whose program was almost the same as that of the first concert of the Orchestra under Fritz Scheel.

With the exception of Mozart's D major Concerto and a Fantasy by Josef Suk, played by the soloist, Carl Flesch, the programs were identical. The purely orchestral numbers were Weber's Euryanthe Overture; Schumann's Abendlied, for string orchestra; the Scherzo from Bizet's Roma Suite, and the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. At the concert given twenty-five years ago, Vladimir de Pachmann was soloist in Chopin's F minor Concerto.

Mr. Stokowski is the third conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, for Karl Pohlig succeeded Scheel in that post, conducting from 1907-1912.

Committee Formed to Fight for Concerts

Present Questionnaire to Mayor; Plan Mass Meeting.

The fight against the discontinuance of the Goldman Central Park Band Concerts in New York began in earnest last week with the organization of a Citizens' Committee on Music. To date Mayor Hylan has refused to meet the committee. Meantime Mr. Goldman is in search of a new site for his summer series of band programs.

"We are making plans for a mass meeting to protest over the loss to the public of Edwin Franko Goldman and his band," said Mrs. Bella Zilberman, chairman of the Committee, "but we hope that the matter can be arranged without holding the meeting. If the Goldman concerts are retained there will be no reason for the mass meeting.

"A telegram has been sent to the Mayor demanding that he make good the promise of his secretary and grant a hearing to those who believe the Guggenheim gift concerts should be restored. If he does not reply, the date and place of the meeting will be announced within a few days."

The list of questions which the Committee wants Mayor Hylan to answer are as follows:

1. As citizens we want to know why the Goldman Band will not be permitted to give five concerts a week in Central Park, as it has done for the past two years?
2. Why do you now limit the concerts to three a week, inasmuch as the Guggenheims have made the same offer as last year?
3. Why did you not accept or refuse the offer of the Guggenheims instead of dictating terms?
4. Don't you realize that you are depriving the citizens of this great outdoor pleasure?
5. Don't you realize that you are using the taxpayers' money in engaging other musicians when this saving to the people could be effected?
6. The musicians employed by Mr. Goldman are professional. Do you want to deprive them of working? Do you prefer amateurs to professionals? The people certainly do not.

Philharmonic Society Names Its Conductors For Season of 1925-26

Furtwaengler and Mengelberg to Be Regular Leaders; Toscanini Guest.

MENGELBERG TO START

Willem Mengelberg and Wilhelm Furtwaengler will be the conductors of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra next season and Arturo Toscanini is probably to appear as guest conductor, according to an announcement by Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society.

"Mr. Mengelberg will open the season on Thursday evening, October 15," said Mr. Mackay, "and will conduct the concerts until and including January 10. The concerts from the latter part of January until the end of the season will be led by Mr. Furtwaengler, whose engagement logically follows his signal success of the past season.

"The society considers itself fortunate in being able to announce that Arturo Toscanini has consented to conduct certain of its concerts in January. This engagement, as well as the engagements of Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Furtwaengler, is an indication of the policy of the society to present to its subscribers the greatest conductors. Negotiations are now proceeding with Mr. Toscanini, and it is hoped that the definite dates of his appearances may be announced shortly."

During the past season the orchestra has played under the batons of Mr. van Hoogstraten and Mr. Mengelberg. Henry Hadley, Igor Stravinsky and Wilhelm Furtwaengler each conducted a number of concerts also. Mr. van Hoogstraten, whose contract expires with the close of this season, will conduct the Philharmonic Orchestra this summer at the Stadium. He was for two years joint leader of the Philharmonic with Willem Mengelberg. He is at present in Europe.

The announcement of Mr. Mackay does not mention Henry Hadley, who during the past season has been associate conductor of the Philharmonic.

For its eighty-fourth season the Society has renewed its lease of Carnegie Hall for approximately its usual number of concerts. There will be some changes in its series next season, however, for it is announced that the Wednesday evening series of ten students' concerts will be given in place of the Saturday evening subscription series.

In the five seasons during which Mr. Mengelberg has divided his time between the Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic, he has been with the latter always in the second half of the season, beginning about February 1. The change to the first half next year is probably arranged for the convenience of Mr. Furtwaengler, who will continue in his posts with the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsig Gewandhaus orchestras.

Hub Greets Singers and Pianists

Mme. Schumann-Heink Heard Again; Wellington Smith Pleases; Carol Robinson and Bruce Simonds Appear

Boston, March 23.—The song recitals of last week were given by Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Eva Gauthier, Bertha Putney Dudley, and Wellington Smith. Among the pianists were Sergei Rachmaninoff, Carol Robinson, and Bruce Simonds. Carlos Salzedo and his harp ensemble provided the one other concert attraction.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, in this, her second recital, was again applauded heartily by a large audience. Indicative of critical opinion was the statement in the Christian Science Monitor that "again the singer delighted by her expertness, her effortless and accurate expression, her poise, the purity of her high notes, her smooth transitions, her avoidance of formalized operatic gestures. Perfect pitch was always hers, precision of attack and rhythmic continuity." She was assisted by Florence Hardeman, violinist, and Katherine Hoffmann, pianist, both of whom received commendatory notices.

* * *

In her recital here Wednesday, Mme. Gauthier was assisted by Messrs. Laurent, flute; Sunderson and Werner, violins; Fiedler, viola; Langendolen, cello (of the Boston Symphony Orchestra), and Gordon Hampson, pianist. The program consisted of old French, Italian, English, and Spanish airs arranged by Deems Taylor, Saint-Saens, Samuel Endicott, Joaquin Nin, and Kurt Schindler; Chabrier, Debussy, Ravel, and de Falla; Shakespearean songs by Schubert, Sullivan, Castelnuova-Tedesco, Gurney, and Ayres; a group of works for chamber music and voice by Dowland, Roussel, Joseph Marx, and Arthur Bliss; and others by Franck, Dukas, Stravinsky, Ravel, Carpenter, John Beach and Campbell-Tipton.

Mme. Gauthier, as usual, received general commendation for the diversity and originality of her program, although the reviewers were inclined to find ner voice unsuited to some of the songs. She was applauded by Philip Hale (Herald) for skillful diction, but he also mentioned that her voice seemed hard.

* * *

Bertha Putney Dudley, contralto, was heard at the Women's Republican Club the same day. She was accompanied by Harris Shaw. The Monitor chronicler wrote that she graces every phrase and gesture with poise and professional finish; that she uses her voice "thoughtfully and with intelligence"; that her diction is "precise and intelligible"; and that her style is "intellectual rather than emotional" although she brings humor into play and contrasts light and shade.

According to the Transcript, her voice "is rich, of velvet texture, traverses a considerable range and shows more than the usual amount of flexibility" and she "penetrates deep into the heart of her songs."

* * *

In the opinion of Stuart Mason of the Monitor, Wellington Smith has "an agreeable voice which he uses for the most part skillfully" and he pleases by his straightforward, unaffected singing." Mr. Mason added, however, that although the baritone sings "musically and intelligently" he gives pleasure in rather a negative way. The Herald reported that he "sang with excellent voice, brilliant in its upper medium registers, where also its mezza voce is extremely resonant" and was, as always, musically intelligent. The Transcript reviewer wrote in the same vein.

* * *

Sergei Rachmaninoff's second concert was as well received as was his first. The reviewers found him in good form, although they did not think his program particularly attractive. The Monitor remarked that "his characteristic qualities appear to especial advantage, of course, in his own compositions."

* * *

According to the Globe, Carol Robinson "has considerable technical facility and an individual style of interpretation." The writer in the Transcript found that "she has gained in breadth of style, in rhythmic vitality, in the spirit and fire with which she plays," although she has not as yet tones "as richly sonorous as they might easily be made" or as smooth a legato. In the Herald the commentator mentioned that "her brilliant technique has gained in soundness. Her singing tone is fuller and sweeter."

* * *

Bruce Simonds in his recital Saturday displayed "rhythm unusually keen, a singularly pure tone which he is both able and willing to color when he feels the music calls for color, delicate sensitiveness to melodic line and, above all else, sentiment." In the Couperin pieces to further quote the Herald chronicler, he showed "an exquisite grace and an enchanting tone."

The Monitor found him a pianist "who reproduces exquisite miniatures of sound so beautifully and distinctively as to be in a class quite by himself in that accomplishment" and asserted that the delicacy and soft nuances of his playing "make his style light and lovely." As the Transcript put it, "he bears himself modestly and straightforwardly; he gives himself wholly and unaffectedly to the task in hand."

* * *

In Mr. Salzedo's harp ensemble were Marie Miller, Elsie Sorelle, Marietta Bitter, Mildred Godfrey, Edith Connor and Grace Weymer. Della Baker, soprano, was soloist. In the Transcript both Mr. Salzedo and his assisting artists were praised for their performance.

METROPOLITAN OPERA BILL

WEDNESDAY

Aida (matinee)—with Mmes. Rethberg, Telva, and Wells; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Danise, and Mardones; Mr. Serafin conducting.

Faust (evening)—with Mmes. Sundelius, Dalossy, and Howard; and Messrs. Johnson, de Luca, Bohnen, and Ananian; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

THURSDAY

Juive—with Mmes. Larsen-Todsen, Ryan and Galli; and Messrs. Martinelli, Rothier, and Errolle; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

FRIDAY

Tristan und Isolde—with Mmes. Morena and Branzell; and Messrs. Taucher, Whitehill, Bohnen, and Meader; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

SATURDAY

Oracolo and Coq d'Or (matinee)—the former with Mmes. Bori and Wakefield, and Messrs. Errolle, Scotti, and Rothier, with Mr. Papi conducting; the latter with Mmes. Galli, Rudolph, Sabanieva, Telva, and Ryan, and Messrs. Kosloff, Bartik, Bonfiglio, Diaz, and Didur, with Mr. Bamboschek conducting.

Carmen (evening)—with Mmes. Gordon, Alcock, Dalossy, and Tiffany; and Messrs. Tokatyan and de Luca; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

MONDAY

Traviata—with Mme. Bori and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and de Luca, Mr. Serafin conducting.

Choose Dayton for Convention

The city of Dayton, Ohio, has been selected by the executive committee of the Music Teachers' National Association as the Convention City for 1925. Dayton goes on record as guaranteeing 100 members to the association, which is the same agreement entered into by the musicians of St. Louis, where the convention was held last December. The convention will be held December 29-31.

Spartanburg Festival Artists

Spartanburg, S. C.—Rosa Ponselle, Marina Campinari, Augusta Lenska, Lillian Gustafson, Frances Paperte, Mario Chamlee, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Fraser Gange, Douglas Stanbury, and Rhys Morgan are announced as the artists engaged for the Spartanburg Music Festival to take place on May 6, 7, and 8. The Philadelphia Festival Orchestra, under Dr. Thaddeus Rich, and the Spartanburg Festival Chorus of 400 voices will also take part.

Edwin Hughes Heard Again

Edwin Hughes gave his second New York piano recital of the season in Aeolian Hall March 22 in a program of Grieg, Schumann, and Chopin. According to the Telegram-Mail, "vigor, expression and technical skill marked the well attended performance."

Gitta Gradova Lauded In Franck Variations

Cincinnati Hears Orchestral Suite by Sowerby Under Fritz Reiner's Baton.

Cincinnati, March 23.—Reviewers were agreed that Mr. Reiner's program for the symphony concerts of last week was one of the most interesting of the season. Leo Sowerby's Suite From the Northland, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations, with Gitta Gradova as soloist, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony were played.

"Pleasant music" and "thoughtful music" were the terms in which Mrs. Smith of the Times-Star summed up her impressions of the Sowerby Suite. She liked the third movement, Burnt Rock Pool, the most. In regard to the soloist she said, "Miss Gradova created a sensation . . . she promises to become a player of great music in the grand manner."

Mr. Wilson in the Commercial-Tribune asserted that this was "one of the most satisfactory concerts of the season," and he declared also that the Sowerby Suite was "one of the most meritorious works for orchestra that has come out of America." The Franck Variations impressed this writer with the great technical and temperamental equipment of Gitta Gradova. He thought that more physical strength might have been employed to advantage, but "the qualities which the pianist did bring compensated for any lack in that domain."

Mr. Goldenburg, music reviewer of the Enquirer, declared, "America is just beginning to find itself musically." He found a "delicate charm" in the first movement of the Sowerby Suite; Cascades (the second movement) "sparkling, even joyful;" Burnt Rock Pool "a gem of skillful orchestral scoring." He had good words to say for the playing of the cello solo in the third movement by Paul Kirksmith.

Mrs. Plogstedt wrote in the Post that the Sowerby Suite is "decidedly impressionistic . . . scored with splendid understanding of the orchestra." Miss Gradova's "lovely warm tone" and "fine technique" were praised by Miss Plogstedt. She thought, too, that the Variations require greater strength than Miss Gradova brought to bear, but nevertheless she called the pianist "gifted."

B. G.

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

JOSEF ADLER
Teacher of Piano
ACCOMPANIST
137 West 86th St. New York
Phone Schuyler 3580

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

A New Note in Song-Recital Giving Charming Programs of Melodious Beethoven Songs—With Talks.
Management:
DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York City
FREEMANTEL

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

ELSA ALSEN
Famous Wagnerian Dramatic Soprano
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG 1425 Broadway, New York City

Cellist Is Soloist In Caplet Novelty

Bedetti Assists Boston Orchestra; Farbman Featured by People's Symphony.

Boston, March 24.—Four novelties were offered by Sèrge Koussevitzky at last week's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony was the only familiar number on a program which included Roland-Manuel's Sinfonia from Isabelle et Pantalon, Ravel's arrangement of a dance for orchestra by Debussy, Borchard's L'Elan and Caplet's Epiphanie, a Fresco for violoncello and orchestra.

Jean Bedetti was soloist in the Caplet composition, which was given its first American hearing. To quote Philip Hale of the Herald, he played "in a masterly manner." According to Stuart Mason (Christian Science Monitor), "in spite of the essentially uninteresting character of the music itself, he succeeded in drawing from it a measure of beauty which it seemed at times it could hardly contain."

Other reviewers praised him, but on the whole they did not like but parts of the composition. Mr. Hale, however, wrote that it is interesting "not only by reason of its harmonic scheme and the instrumentation; it contains passages of exquisite beauty."

Another first performance in America was that of the Sinfonia, which Mr. Smith wrote is "fresh, assurant and well made, and it expresses individuality with no straining after effect." H. T. Parker of the Transcript commented that M. Roland-Manuel "writes with a cool head, a deft hand, in the highest of spirits." Other writers spoke of its cleverness.

Stuart Mason did not find the Borchard work "ingratiating," but he did consider it "full of meaning, full of imaginative power, expressed with the skill of a master craftsman." The Debussy dance was made harder and "more shallow" in the Ravel arrangement, according to the Globe.

* * *

Harry Farbman was the soloist with the People's Symphony Orchestra, Emil Mollenhauer conductor, Sunday afternoon at the St. James Theatre in Paganini's Concerto for orchestra and violin. Other numbers were Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture, Saint-Saens' Le Rouet d'Omphale and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald wrote that Mr. Farbman played "with an amazing virtuosity, a suppleness and fineness of tone, a maturity of sentiment of which few musicians are possessed." The Transcript reviewer commented on his "sparkling virtuosity" and said that he combines "dazzling technical accomplishments" with "deep emotional feeling . . . producing tones of richness, depth and sonority."

The Globe writer remarked on his sensitive playing—"his nimble fingers and bow were adequate for every demand. When he had an opportunity he played so his violin sang an air with a charm beyond its worth." The Monitor chronicler called him a "brilliant young virtuoso" and added that he played "with all the exuberance of youth" and, in spite of occasional "roughness" of technique, "he exhibited richness of tone and a mastery of his instrument."

DORSEY WHITTINGTON
Whose Place Among the First Rank of the Native Pianists Is Becoming More Firmly Established From Season to Season. He Appeared in New York in Concert With Hilda Kramer, Soprano, Thursday Evening.

* * *

The Handel and Haydn Society, conducted by Mr. Mollenhauer, gave the first of its series of two young people's concerts. Mary Dyer, soprano, was the soloist and Frank Luker the organist. In the words of Miss Gerstein, Miss Dyer sang "with a thin, cool voice and clear enunciation."

Opera Guarantors Hear Statement

St. Louis, March 21.—A meeting of the guarantors of the Chicago Civic Opera Company's recent engagement here was held last week in the private dining rooms of the Chamber of Commerce. H. Worthington Eddy was chairman of the meeting, and Elizabeth Cuney, local manager, read the statement of the expenses and receipts.

Financial support was pledged by those present for next year's engagement of the Company. It is expected that the twenty-eight guarantors for this season's engagement will be doubled for next year.

Cellist Soloist at Metropolitan

Heinrich Warnke, cellist of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, was instrumental soloist at the Sunday night concert at the opera March 22. The singers were Mmes. Guilford, Telva, and Sabanieeva and Messrs. Tokatyan, Danise, and Tibbett. Mr. Bamboschek conducted.

Salmond Appears in Detroit

Gabrilowitsch on Return Offers Mahler Symphony; Kolar Conducts His Own Work.

Detroit, March 24.—The features of last week's symphony concerts, conducted by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, were the playing of Lalo's Cello Concerto by Felix Salmond, and the first performance of Mahler's Fourth Symphony. Completing the program were Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody and Humperdinck's dream music from Haensel and Gretel. At the concert the week previous Mr. Kolar conducted in the absence of Mr. Gabrilowitsch.

According to Charlotte M. Tarsney of the Free Press, Mr. Salmond proved himself "an artist through and through and the interpretation he gave this number was magnificent in its breadth and verve. His tone is most sonorous, for he never forces his instrument, and the depth and richness which he secures indicates how perfect a master he is."

R. J. McLauchlin (News) observed that the cellist proved himself a "first-rate" performer; although his tone does not have great volume, "it is rich and round and full of sweetness. His fingering is very deft and his bowing clean and emphatic. His technical attainments are far above the ordinary." In the opinion of Ralph Holmes of the Times, Mr. Salmond "has a tone of great beauty and a machine-like precision in performance."

In general, the reviewers were comparatively unimpressed with the Mahler composition. Mr. Holmes said "it seems more like music for children than about them, a vast difference," and Mr. McLauchlin accused it of being "cute."

Helen Hedges, soprano, sang the voice part in the fourth movement of the work "so nicely that probably everyone present wished she might soon return for a recital," wrote Mr. Holmes. According to Mr. McLauchlin, "her voice is pleasing, if not voluminous, and her manner quite captivating." Miss Tarsney said she handled the solo "with great finish" and commended her "sweet, fresh, youthful voice."

Victor Kolar, associate conductor, led the Symphony Orchestra the week before through his own First Symphony; Beethoven's Music to a Knightly Ballet, which has not been heard here before; Forest Murmurs from Wagner's Siegfried; and Ravel's La Valse.

Mr. Kolar's Symphony has been heard here before some years ago, but, as Charlotte M. Tarsney expressed it in the Free Press, "the rich orchestration on repeated hearing is the more emphasized and the fine sonority and power of the work makes a deep impression." Ralph Holmes of the Times asserted that it was "a sound and substantial and sincere work," with "decidedly individual orchestral treatment." Writing in the News, Cyril Arthur Player remarked that Mr. Kolar's "musicianship is sound" and that he possesses "a genius for restrained but ample melody which belongs to most composers whose works endure."

According to Charlotte M. Tarsney, the Beethoven ballet had "a delightful simplicity and charm" and Mr. Player spoke of the "strong rhythmic sense" with which it is marked. Miss Tarsney also wrote that "the performance of the Siegfried excerpt was excellent."

* * *

The second and last chamber music recital offered in the Alma Gluck Concert Direction was given by the Detroit Quartet at the Women's City Club last night, with Francis A. Mayhew, pianist, as assisting artist.

To quote Miss Tarsney, Mr. Mayhew played "with marked finish. He drew a richly sonorous tone from the instrument" and interpreted the Brahms with distinction, and Ravel's work with a keen grasp of the composer's style. The writer in the News said he played "most artistically and understandingly."

The Quartet, composed of Joseph Gorner and Victor Polant, violins; Florian Wittman, viola, and Jascha Schwarzmann, cello, "accomplished a nice ensemble and played exquisitely in their brief solo snatches," in the words of the News chronicler. Miss Tarsney wrote that they played with "admirable spirit and enthusiasm" and that the Schumann Quintet was played "with real sympathy, the sensibility, balance and understanding disclosed gaining the unmistakable approval of the audience."

Rosa Ponselle
Exclusive Management
National Concerts, Inc.
1451 Broadway
New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: CHARLES L. WAGNER
D. F. McSWEENEY
51 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

Elena GERHARDT
Management: GEORGE ENGLES—Aeolian Hall, New York City
STEINWAY PIANO

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

FLORENCE MACBETH
Leading Coloratura Soprano
Chicago Civic Opera Company

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, MARCH 31, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 24

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.: Canada, $6.00: Foreign Countries, $7.00
Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

Chicago's Opera

The Chicago Civic Opera Association concluded, a few days ago, its current season with a tour reported to have been successful. Its management stated officially that, while in several of the cities visited it became necessary to call on the guarantors for an assessment, the said assessments were relatively small.

In no instance, declared the management, was there any feeling that the price was one either difficult or irksome to meet. Satisfaction was unanimously expressed with the performances given, and where contracts for a return engagement were not actually signed a willingness to negotiate such contracts was recorded.

Plans for the 1925-26 Chicago Opera season are already under way. Its music director has already sailed for Europe, and its business manager is busy with affairs touching upon matters vital to the future of this organization. Optimism is apparent, and by no means a made-to-order thing.

Opera lovers will rejoice if during the approaching season the Western organization establishes more firmly its position. They will feel encouraged if certain gains are made in specific directions where experts believe it is needed . . . for the welfare of a potentially fine institution.

The Musical Digest would like to see those gains come to pass. If and when they do the cause of opera in this country will be benefited in a degree beyond the capacity of the average person to estimate.

The Helping Hand

One never knows just how much it may contribute to a deserving heart the helping hand. Occasionally it serves unexpectedly to aid in the development of a conspicuous talent. There was the case of Josef Hofmann, who related, recently, how the financial support provided by the late Alfred Corning Clark enabled him to study music under the most propitious circumstances. It is highly probable that Hofmann would have gone on to splendid goals even if he had had it all to do himself. Still, what might have been were things different is, after all, pure guesswork.

In an age wherein materialism stalks about, and love of ease and a good time keeps it company, there is an increase in the extent of helping hands. Men and women of large means are opening their purses a little oftener, and with a little better understanding of how it may best be done.

They are examining more acutely the worthiness of the individual or the institution eligible to receive a helping hand, and proffering it, thereafter, with an intelligence which diminishes in nowise the self respect and self reliance of the one helped.

In a world which never was more interdependent than it is today there is a steady growth in the readiness of those able to do so to aid what deserves being aided. It is eloquently significant, for unless the world were getting better no such state of affairs could exist.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

DEEMS TAYLOR'S Suite, Through the Looking Glass, shared a recent Philharmonic program with Stravinsky's Firebird Suite and the Scheherazade. It is not exaggeration to say that Mr. Taylor's music held its own with both these masterpieces. It was in no way flimsy or uninteresting in comparison with them.

The orchestration of the Suite is sturdy and colorful and has much in it that is original. Equally skillful is the treatment of the themes, which are developed in such a way that the progress of the music is never hesitant or labored.

Nevertheless there is one respect in which the composition raises a question. Each time that the composer is serious—rather than fanciful, lightly melodious and pictorial—his music becomes sentimental. This is particularly noticeable in the final movement of Through the Looking Glass.

It is obvious that in this particular case the sentimentality is perfectly in keeping with Mr. Taylor's program—that is, the story of Alice. I wonder whether, if he chooses, Mr. Taylor in his writing can be grave without running to sentimentality.

Where fancy is required Mr. Taylor is pleasantly ingenious in his melodic invention and his orchestration. The clarinet solo in the Jabberwocky movement is fascinatingly clever and amusing, and the bassoon and contrabassoon passage which describes the death of the monster is equally happy. I was reminded by it of Strauss' treatment of the ascent to Heaven of Till's soul (it is so different) in which the clarinet and trilled flute give a soprano picture of transfiguration.

Impressive also was the manner in which Mr. Taylor with a catchy and unobvious rhythm avoided banality in his mock march in the Jabberwocky movement.

A GERMAN musician, Professor A. H. Thorold, arrived in New York last week with a few theories and prophecies which caught the fancy of the ship news reporters. He commented that the growing size and subtlety of modern instrumentation were contributing to eliminate the use of the voice in modern music, partly because a singer has difficulty in being heard over a full orchestra and partly because composers are becoming so skillful and apt in the use of instruments that words become less necessary to describe their meaning.

Herr Thorold can hardly mean that. In the first place, there is more music being written for the voice now than there has been at any time since instrumental music became dominant in the art some 300 years ago.

One of the fundamental ways in which music is effective on the listener is in his empathetic reaction to it. Hearing an orchestra one is stimulated to mark the rhythm which it beats and to sing the songs which it sings. It is a restraint of sophistication and training that keeps an audience still when music is being played.

As effective, however, as any instrument may be in the most skillful hands, it is comparatively powerless in comparison with a good voice. The listener's body vibrates physically in most intimate sympathy with that of the powerful, warm singer. He is thrilled to the core, and that is what he calls music.

I remember some weeks ago hearing in an excellent symphonic performance Wotan's Farewell a couple of evenings after I had heard the Walkuere itself at the Metropolitan. The former version could not be compared for effectiveness with the original music of this scene together with the voice. The instruments, as flexible in color as they were, sounded mechanical when the mind recalled freshly the expressiveness of a good baritone voice.

It seems to me that good singing will remain the most popular form of music despite any development that instruments are likely to undergo.

SOME years ago, it is said, it was not unusual for the sports departments of American newspapers to undertake the task of reporting musical events. How are these affairs covered now? The Musical Times (London) quotes the following from the review of a concert in Chatham, England:

"Mr. Blank mounted the rostrum, tapped the music stand with his white baton and waved his left hand languorously in the air as the first chords floated from the platform. The effect was joyous to behold, and in the warm silence stood this youthful interpreter on tip-toe, waiting to pounce upon the straying notes and flick a discordant flat with his wand. Poised like a sprite of Apollo's making, he sprang and crouched and swayed to the recalcitrant rhapsody, and all the while one was conscious of sweet, sad air that somehow melted and whispered itself away in the gilded rafters."

AS Henry T. Finck once pointed out, the development of program music has been a great convenience for critics. It gives them one easy approach to their subject. It is hard to talk about music itself without being either dully (to the novice) analytical or superficially general. To say whether a passage of music sounds like a storm, after the composer has given assurance that such resemblance is intended, is much simpler.

In a consideration of the music of Edgar Varese in a recent issue of The Arts Massimo Zanotti-Bianco asks the question, "Might it be possible to consider a musical composition as a succession of geometric sound-figures, as a resultant of volumes and planes whose successive projections would give birth to architectures of sound whose logic would be given by the equilibrium of their sound vibrations and their forms?"

Mr. Zanotti-Bianco not only considers this possible, but proceeds to find the music of Varese illustrative of what he calls "sound-geometry." To the partial observer it might appear that the critic has applied this "program" of mathematics to a music which he wants to admire, but doesn't know how to like or to talk about.

It seems to me that Mr. Varese's music is as completely non-intellectual as is possible. It is a development of the simple noise-making impulse that every human being has. (Who would not be a trap-drummer?) Whatever appeal it has is physical—that of the stimulation and excitement of the tingling ears and body. Give a child a stick to play with, and he will bang it. Varese does the same sort of thing, in a developed and comparatively subtle way, with the materials of an orchestra. The result may be music—or it may be a nuisance.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

Blue Stands for Brahms

Ruth Breton Suits the Colors of Her Gowns to Her Concertos; Finds City Activity Conducive to Work.

by KAY KENNEDY

RUTH BRETON was cleaning. "You'll excuse me if I finish this, won't you?" she asked, emphasizing each word with energetic jabs at the fragile yellow chiffon in her hands. "I'm awfully fond of this evening dress, and I want to get this spot off so that I can wear it tonight. Oh, dear! I do hope it doesn't leave a ring and spoil it."

She paused, dismayed at the thought.

"I've always found that if you begin right at the spot and rub out in a widening circle it hardly ever leaves a mark," I suggested helpfully. "See, like this"—. For several minutes the large, sunny room, heavy with the odor of gasoline, was quiet as interviewer and interviewee labored industriously over the chiffon dress. The job accomplished, Miss Breton made herself comfortable in a corner of the deep divan.

"Yes, this is a pretty dress." She fingered the rose yellow flounces of the skirt. "I've wished I could wear it at one of my concerts—but imagine wearing a pink and yellow dress to play Tschaikowsky or Lalo! This might suit Saint-Saens, but I haven't played any of his works at my concerts so far, and I'm afraid that by the time I do the dress will be out of style."

The young violinist (she is just twenty-one) explained that she always tries to fit her gown to the concerto she is playing.

"Of course for Tschaikowsky or Glazounow one should wear red, for Mendelssohn, green—sort of an apple green, orange for Bruch, rose velvet for Lalo, and for Brahms—what on earth would you wear with Brahms? Cloth of gold perhaps, or blue—that must be it.

"I guess that this isn't quite the correct way to start an interview, is it?" She smiled engagingly and continued in a voice that has only a suggestion of the slurring drawl of the South, "but I've only been interviewed twice before, and I'm not just sure what is correct to do. Talk about myself? Why, there isn't much to say, and anyway, I got out of the habit when I was young. Mother taught me that it was very rude. As to my music—why, I've just always played the violin. My father was a musician, and I was brought up right from the cradle on music. I come from Louisville, Ky.; this is my first season, and I've never studied anywhere but in America . . . and I think that's about all. You see, there's really nothing interesting about me, I'm a perfectly normal person and don't have any fads—unless that's what you'd call my suiting my dresses to the concertos."

And it is just that that makes Miss Breton such a charming young person to meet. Unaffected, intensely sincere and entirely wholesome, she has none of the mannerisms or affectations so dear to many young artists. And, too, it is this very quality which has been noted by the reviewers in the various cities where Miss Breton has played this season.

She admitted that she very seldom was nervous before an audience or worried over such bugbears as "stage presence." She just feels, and acts, "perfectly natural." If an artist knows each note perfectly, Miss Breton sees no reason for nervousness. Playing with orchestra is her particular delight, as the marvelous orchestral background gives her sublime confidence and makes her feel "as if I were in heaven!" She remembers just one time when she was self-conscious on the concert platform.

Photo by Muray

MISS RUTH BRETON

"That was when I had an accompanist who always, just as we were ready to go on the stage, would whisper to me, 'I just know I'm going to trip!' It used to give me a perfectly ghastly feeling until I found myself safely in front of my audience. And then there is one thing that can really upset me during a concert—to catch the eye of someone who quite obviously is out of sympathy with me. Only the first three or four rows matter to me when I'm playing. I play to one person—or to a certain group of persons—and in that way seem to gain confidence."

Playing idly with the tiny gold buttons on her blue dress, Miss Breton paused a moment, then added impulsively:

"This may sound very stupid, but do you know that I just hate to go to violin recitals?" Her large, dark eyes, deep set and fringed with heavy lashes, seemed to search my face for signs of disapproval. "It's true. Any other sort of recital I enjoy just for the music, but when someone is playing the violin I am so nervous that I sit on the edge of my seat the entire time, and when he or she comes to a difficult passage I begin fingering it myself and become so tense I nearly die! Perhaps you can see why I don't enjoy hearing violinists—except perhaps a Heifetz or some friend in whose work I am particularly interested."

Miss Breton is planning to live in or near New York next year.

"It is beautifully quiet at home in Louisville, but I can't work there. I can't quite explain it, but I can work much harder and much more intensely right in this room.

"In the city everyone is working hard, and striving, and hurrying to get things accomplished. It acts like a tonic on me and spurs me on to all sorts of effort. I hear music, talk with music people and am really steeped in music. At home there are too many diversions, and too many conflicting interests, and, of course, I have to practice consistently and for long periods at a time. I have quite small hands, and unless I practice lots I lose the strength in my left hand." In illustration she held out her left hand and stretched her short, tapering fingers to their full length—which isn't very long.

At another time Miss Breton confessed to one "silly superstition." It seems that she has never had a really successful concert that, on the way to the hall, her car hasn't been hit by a taxicab. The night of her debut in New York her cab was crashed into by that in which her manager was going to the recital.

"That would have been a catastrophe," she laughed, "to be killed by your own manager on your way to your debut recital! Now it has gotten so that if I don't have an accident on my way to the recital I know it won't be a success."

The violinist went on to tell some of the experiences and observations of her first year in concert work. Her debut was postponed a year because she does not believe in "stepping from the classroom on to the concert stage." The artist, in her opinion, must be given time to forget all the rules he has learned before he plays in concert.

"It sometimes seems rather futile to study and study to learn all these rules only to have to forget them all again! But, of course, technical perfection is necessary before one can attempt self-expression in music. Once you have gained technical command, then it is time to forget the rules and learn to play. Here, as in any phase of art, it is dangerous to generalize, however.

"I feel that one does not realize the importance of interpretation until one has tried to create something. No matter how crude your effort, it teaches you to approach your interpretation much more reverently and sincerely. I appreciate painting fifty per cent more since I have tried to paint myself—it has more real meaning for me. Do you know, I've even tried to model! I admit I was pretty bad, but I did enjoy it, and it did my music good."

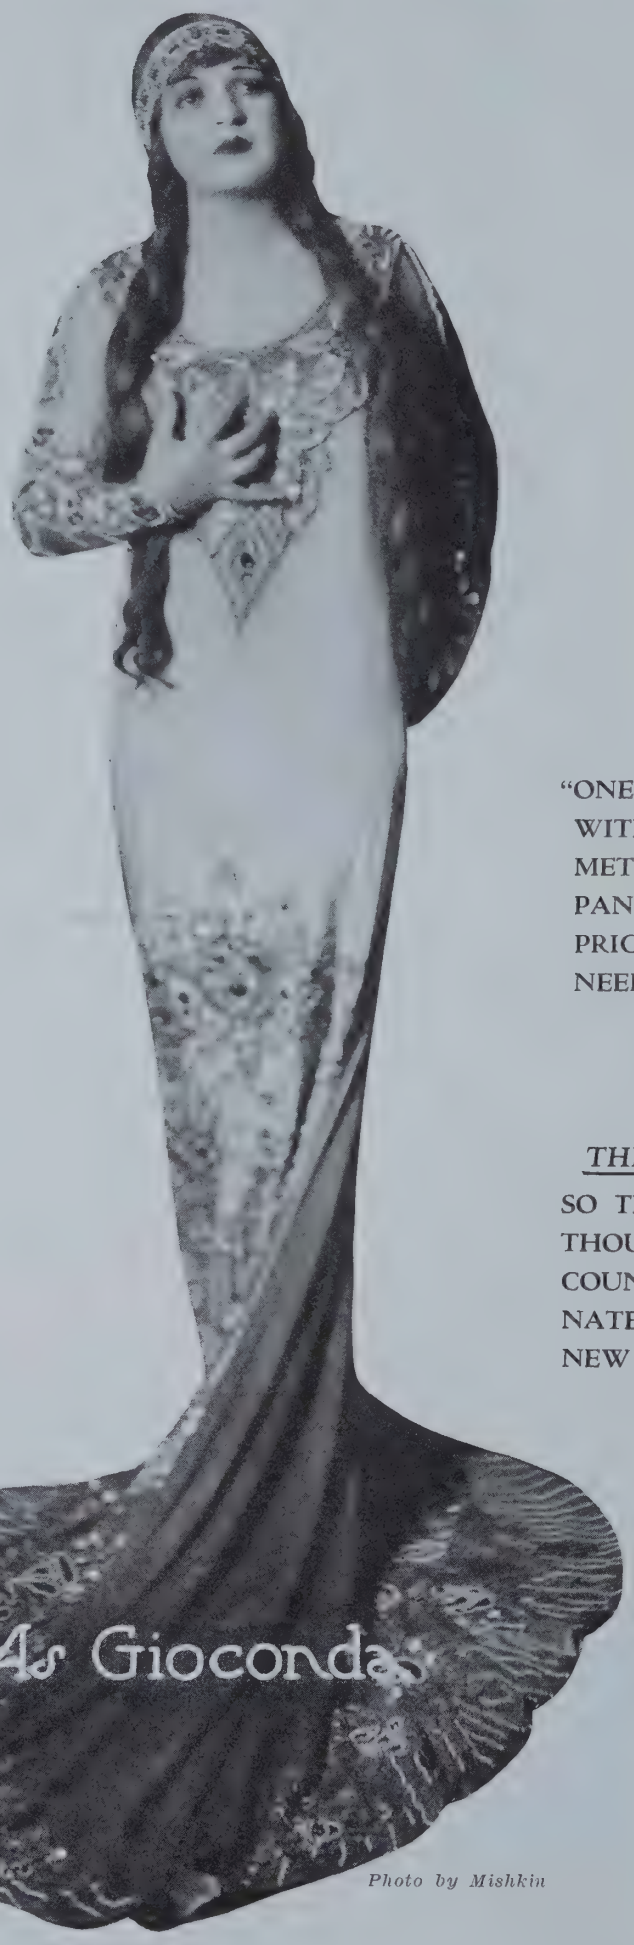
Elisabeth RothBerg
SOPRANO
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
FISK BLDG. NEW YORK
PACKARD BLDG PHILA., PA.
BRUNSWICK RECORDS
HARDMAN PIANO

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones
Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

ROSA PONSELLE

PRIMA DONNA DRAMATIC SOPRANO — METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY



As Gioconda

Photo by Mishkin

"A VOICE SUPERB,
A CHARM CONTAGIOUS,
A BEAUTY FASCINATING,
A PERSONALITY CAPTIVATING,
A DRAMATIC ABILITY
INSPIRING—
ALL THESE HAS ROSA PONSELLE.

PONSELLE HAS THE SOUL OF GREATNESS, THE VOICE AND PERSONALITY OF GENIUS."

---K. T. F. in The Ohio State Journal, Columbus, O., Feb. 7, 1925.

"IT IS TO BE DOUBTED IF EVEN IN NORDICA AMERICA HAS MADE SO GREAT A CONTRIBUTION TO THE CONCERT STAGE AS THIS YOUNG SINGER."

---Springfield Daily Republican. Springfield, Mass., January 28, 1925

"ONE MUST REGRET HER STAY WITH THE ORGANIZATION [THE METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY] WAS SO BRIEF. WHAT PRICE CONCERTS WHEN OPERA NEEDS HER?"

---Frank Warren, New York Evening World, February 23, 1925.

THE ANSWER:—

SO THAT SHE MAY THRILL THE THOUSANDS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY WHO ARE NOT FORTUNATE ENOUGH TO HEAR HER IN NEW YORK.

VICTOR RECORDS
KNABE PIANO

EXCLUSIVE MANAGEMENT:
NATIONAL CONCERTS, Inc.
Samuel Geneen, President
1451 BROADWAY NEW YORK CITY

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

POTENTIALITY, in either individual or organization, is always intriguing. It sets the imagination working; and one's speculative resources also, since it is natural to hazard a guess.

After listening to Miss Elisabeth Rethberg last Monday week, in her first New York recital, I was prompted (as, doubtless, others were also) to wonder what place this gifted soprano will take in the concert world.

Thus far Miss Rethberg has stuck hard by her operatic duties. During her two seasons at the Metropolitan she has devoted her endeavors to establishing a position. Now that it has been made secure she is justified in casting about for another field—a more difficult field—in which to display her talents and to give pleasure through means other than are permitted in the theatre, which calls for large and bold outlines . . . often at the expense of finesse and finish of detail.

I RECALL Miss Rethberg's debut at the Metropolitan a year ago last November. She was Aida, and a nervous one. But what a voice she disclosed! And what promise! Within a few weeks the entire town had awakened to the beauty of the Rethberg voice, and its admirable technical employment. What a relief, after so much shouting one usually has to hear in opera, where great voices are as common as good technique is not.

Then came Miss Rethberg's recital of songs and a triumph. She chose to make her appearance in Aeolian Hall, thereby disclosing a courage equal to her intelligence. Most Metropolitan divas—and divos, as well—incline towards the larger auditorium of Carnegie, which sheds a certain lustre but adds nothing to the intimacy demanded of the interpretative art in song.

In the compact precincts of Aeolian Miss Rethberg could employ the finer shades of expressiveness which would not have traveled to the farthest auditor had the place been twice its size. So the listeners had all the benefits.

THAT Monday afternoon was one well spent. It may have been profitable also to the discerning members of the singing fraternity who were present (and their number was by no means small).

Miss Rethberg started slowly. Not till the program was one-third advanced did that liquid-like soprano attain its fullest fluidity, wherein it could be moulded as its possessor willed. Thereafter it was singing as fresh as the dew on the foliage of a spring morning.

In voice, technique, musicianship, and taste Miss Rethberg has been rarely blessed. Excellent as her achievement is, she can unquestionably improve upon it. For that first New York recital was an ordeal. Since so few great recital singers exist it is to be hoped that Miss Rethberg will devote herself seriously to this branch of the art. If she will (and in so doing develop an enunciation worthy of her other resources, for it was difficult to catch many of the words she sang), then may we look forward to an unique mistress of song.

FOR JUST a few minutes was I permitted, last week, to chat with Maestro Giorgio Polacco and Business Manager Herbert Johnson of the Chicago Civic Opera Company. The former was intent upon the sailing which lay directly ahead, and the latter had matters to discuss which were no affair of mine.

But optimism was a noticeable factor in the demeanor of those two gentlemen, who carry much of the responsibility attached to the organization in which they hold important posts.

Polacco was enthusiastic over the artistic prospects for the season to come, and Johnson seemed no less confident over the financial outcome. Both anticipate a satisfactory accomplishment, and it was apparent that there prevails a state of harmony which will be helpful in carrying out plans upon which they are engaged.

I am one of those who have all along felt that the Chicago company could do more than it yet has done. Its place is one of paramount importance and, on that account, its obligation to its public is large. It should, and it can, carry on to splendid heights, enlisting a support which will establish it upon a foundation of unshakable strength.

When that moment arrives its progress cannot be stayed; and it is a moment not to be too long deferred. President Samuel Insull will doubtless smile when he reads those words, and possibly drop some remark about "minding one's own business." But all which is said concerning the Chicago Civic Opera Company is constructively meant. Nothing could make the writer happier than to see this organization take the bit in its teeth and run clean away to a noteworthy victory.

MR. JOHNSON had a few words to say about the American baritone Robert Steel, who is to make his debut in his native land with the Chicagoans next November. If all he stated is true, young Steel will put another spike in the American music flagpole. According to Johnson his is an exceptional voice, with the true operatic timbre.

Manager Charles Wagner claims to have discovered him, and many people know that William Brady guided him along the pathway wherein a sound vocal technique may be acquired. At present Italy is hearing and seeing this young man, who is a native of Philadelphia, and elected, after graduating from Cornell, to enter upon a singing career in preference to engaging in business with his father.

With Americans climbing fast in all branches of the music art it will be helpful to be able to add to the list another who is accomplishing real things. Wherefore there should be a deal of "pulling" for Robert Steel when he steps for the first time on the Chicago Auditorium stage and exhibits what operatic mettle there is in him.

ALL THE WORLD loves a fighter, and if ever there was one it is Jacob Altschuler. That promoter of symphonic music, who has struggled to keep the State Symphony Orchestra afloat, has made arrangements whereby Ernst von Dohnanyi and Eugene Goossens are to share between them the conductorial posts of the State Symphony during the coming season.

Dohnanyi will take the first half, and Goossens the last. Their engagement injects into the affairs of this organization a new life, and may be a contributing factor in keeping it alive. New York is comparatively unacquainted with the conducting abilities of both these musicians. Dohnanyi was heard this season in a State Symphony concert of which the program consisted entirely of his own compositions, and in most of them he himself conducted. Mr. Goossens also has wielded the baton in New York this season—in one of the modernist concerts of the International Composers' Guild.

One could judge little of their talents from this small number of appearances. In neither case was the conductor long enough in contact with his musicians to mold them to his distinctive way of thinking in regard to the interpretation of the music in hand. Both programs, besides, were quite unfamiliar, so that there was added difficulty in gaining a sharp impression of the musical personalities of Messrs. Dohnanyi and Goossens.

These two men do not come here entirely unknown, nevertheless. Dohnanyi has already achieved high respect in the United States and in Europe as a composer and pianist, and he is the conductor of the Philharmonic Society of Budapest. In England, where Eugene Goossens is active as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and the British National Opera Company, and as a composer, too, he is considered one of the most important and significant members of the younger generation of musicians. His work as leader for half the season of the Rochester Philharmonic Society has been regarded with great favor by discerning followers of this young orchestra.

Not only the intrinsic abilities and experience of Dohnanyi and Goossens will help to strengthen the position of the State Symphony Society next season, but the prestige of their names will do much to give this orchestra new respect in the eyes of the New York music public.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, is walking along musically with a steadiness that has carried it to an unique place. The sudden spurt in the opera field has attracted attention beyond the boundaries of this country; foreign nations have heard about it, and their people discuss not infrequently that subject.

Cleveland was always operatically inclined; but not until a year ago did the city, and the territory it draws upon, quite realize just what might be done where able leadership and organization are effectively joined, and efficient sales promotion starts in motion the wheel of achievement.

The matter becomes pertinent because of the approaching engagement there of New York's Metropolitan Opera Company, and the preparations which are being made to support the ten performances scheduled. It will require about a quarter million of dollars to pay for that little opera party. And yet—I do not anticipate a deficit, and therein lies the milk within this particular cocoanut.

LIKE THE APPLE which the small boy declared would yield no core, there will be no deficit for the good and sufficient reason that the patrons of those planned representations will themselves furnish the money to meet the huge expense. A year ago, when the one week's visit of the Metropolitan to Cleveland stirred people up even as Atlantans never were stirred, it cost the guarantors a few dollars. This year there are no guarantors. None are needed. In their places are "sponsors," who include virtually all the prominent Clevelanders.

Why is there no underwriting? And why does the Metropolitan vary in this instance from its custom of insisting upon a guaranty? Because of the extraordinary ability of a man who in the past twelvemonth has furnished more surprises and prompted more talk than any other musical individual of whom I know.

He is not large physically, but he makes up for that in other respects. His name is Philip Miner, and he is an enthusiastic go-getter.

THE DYNAMIC, optimistic, insistent Mr. Miner—whose plans happen to have the approval of no less a distinguished Cleveland citizen than Francis E. Drury—has accomplished, and is accomplishing, a huge task. He did it a year ago. He astounded some of his most ardent supporters when he took The Miracle to the Lake Erie city last winter and played it to almost unbelievable patronage. Now he seems in a fair way to establish a new opera attendance record . . . for unless all indications are at fault the coming May season there of the Metropolitan company is likely to make some history.

Cleveland is virtually a solid unit back of Messrs. Drury and Miner. Still, it is to the initiative and the resourcefulness of the latter that the real credit for the popular support will belong.

I doubt however that Mr. Miner will claim any such credit. He will have no need to do so, even if he holds any such desire (which I am reliably informed he does not). The astute man generally lets others do that kind of talking for him, for the reason that it sounds better and carries far more weight.

BACK from her British triumphs came Frieda Hempel not so many weeks ago; and straightway he proceeded to do some more triumphing such as only an eminent artist can. I heard Mme. Hempel at her last Carnegie Hall recital, and while I should have preferred to have listened to her in a more compact auditorium it is nevertheless true that she conveyed to me (in the seat I occupied, not far removed from the stage) some memorably pleasant moments.

Here is a genuine mistress of the art of song. She has been that, by the way, for a long, long time. Doubtless that is one reason for her continued preeminence; for her hold upon discriminating admirers through the display of a vocal legato, and of those attendant elements which are a part of the equipment of a superior singer.

In the use of her voice, its employment to put varying tints upon her tonal palette, and in diction and musicianship Mme. Hempel can give most vocalists a lesson. Perhaps these are the chief reasons for her capacity to hold a respect which was first gained many years ago.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

Miss Frieda Hempel

Frieda Hempel was heard at Carnegie Hall, New York, Wednesday evening in "a carefully chosen and charmingly sung program" (Post). According to the Times, "the clearness of her diction, the purity of her vocal line in a group of German Lieder created well deserved enthusiasm." This writer also observed that the singer was "in her element" in the "florid runs, the bird-like trills, the arpeggio and other floriture" of the aria from Bellini's La Sonnambula.

Her folk songs, to quote further the Post reviewer, "were splendid bits of interpretation and tone coloring," but her operatic numbers were less successful. In the words of the Sun commentator, Miss Hempel "was in good voice, but her upper register did not reveal the freshness of tone which marked her earlier recital. Perhaps also there was a hint of lassitude in her style, but in other respects she sang with all the familiar characteristics of her admirable voice." Archie Coates of the Telegram-Mail commented that she was less satisfying in the operatic numbers than elsewhere. The World did not carry an analytical review of the concert. Miss Hempel was assisted by Coenraad V. Bos, pianist, and Louis P. Fritze, flutist.

Miss Olga Steeb

A piano recital was given at Town Hall last Tuesday afternoon by Olga Steeb. As the writer in the Sun expressed it, she showed "intelligence, taste and sentiment in her general work. She can still, however, achieve more distinctness of musical design in some of her work by a better use of the pedals. Her tone is very agreeable when it is not somewhat muffled."

Miss Steeb displayed "considerable technical skill," wrote the Herald Tribune observer, and played with "notably smooth fluency, though comparatively little color . . . a certain absence of finish and rather ineffective pedaling." This writer, like the Sun chronicler, found her most adept in the works by Griffes. The World remarked that the effect of the concert was "somewhat drowsy, but altogether sympathetic and warmly applauded by a cordial audience."

Winifred MacBride in Third Recital

Her third New York recital of the season was given in Aeolian Hall Thursday afternoon by Winifred MacBride. In a program of Liszt, Bach, Franck, Debussy, Ravel and Granados, Miss MacBride, according to the Herald Tribune, "showed the technical skill, vigor and musicianship which marked her earlier recitals."

Lisbon Opera Ends Season

Lisbon.—The season of the San Carlos Opera has just closed. It was given by a French troupe under the direction of Gabriel Grovlez, a conductor of the Paris Opera. The repertory included Faust, Manon, Carmen, Thais, Werther and Pelleas et Melisande.

Miss Vera Jachles

Vera Jachles, Russian pianist, gave her first New York recital in Town Hall last Tuesday. Her program included the Brahms Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Handel, Schubert's C minor Impromptu, and Chopin's B minor Sonata, as well as works by Sgambati, Medtner, Glazounow, Albeniz, Debussy, and Liszt.

The chronicler in the Herald Tribune was impressed with the "vigor, well developed technique and marked competence" displayed in the first part of the concert, and with the "ample clearness and singing quality of touch" of the Schubert. In the Brahms and Chopin she displayed more "of force and dexterity of finger than of expressive coloring." The Times writer thought that she played "with facility, with strength and with ease" but that she was "careless of detail and lacking in the personal touch." According to the Sun, Miss Jachles did her best work in the Schubert, displaying "skill in carrying melodies and also commendable finger work." In the Brahms, her style and technique seemed "unfinished."

La Juive

Nanny Larsen-Todsen sang the role of Rachel in La Juive for the first time with the Metropolitan Opera Company Wednesday evening, and Giovanni Martinelli returned to the last role he had sung before his illness. The rest of the cast was familiar, and Louis Hasselmans conducted.

The writer in the Times commented on Mme. Larsen-Todsen's "richly dramatic singing," and Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail observed that she "took infinite pains with her singing and her acting, sometimes achieving a measure of success." The Herald Tribune writer said she played the part "more than commendably, strong in voice and striking in appearance and action." W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun that she was "completely out of her element," and the World considered her "gently and melodiously plaintive." This writer added that Mr. Martinelli's interpretation "has taken on new force and dignity." The Times commented on the "freedom and beauty" of his singing.

Danise Added to Chenier Cast

Andrea Chenier was given its final performance of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, March 20. Giuseppe Danise replaced Mr. de Luca, who was indisposed, as Gerard. According to Alison Smith of the World, he gave "a robust and spirited interpretation" of the role. The rest of the cast was familiar, and Mr. Serafin conducted.

New York Symphony

The soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter conducting, in Aeolian Hall March 22 was Alexander Brailowsky, who made his farewell New York appearance of the season.

In Saint-Saens C minor Concerto, according to Olin Downes of the Times, Mr. Brailowsky displayed "a dazzling virtuosity and command of tone color. He can summon a quality of finger stroke which gives the piano tone a specially brilliant quality with the orchestra." Mr. Downes also commented that he felt "the authority and will of the soloist, a musician of feeling and imagination, with something to say and his own way of saying it."

The writer in the Sun asserted that he "imparted striking life and personal individuality to every note and phrase of it. The gamut of technical finger difficulties he ran with astonishing ease, while mastery of accent, rhythm, dynamics and tonal variety afforded a style not without sentiment and sparkling with brilliant eloquence. The performance as a whole was a splendid piece of pianistic workmanship." The World spoke of the brilliance and technical interest of the Concerto under his fingers, and the chronicler in the Post thought he played sympathetically.

Mr. Walter also conducted Mozart's Divertimento in B flat, the Siegfried Idyl and Weber's Freischutz Overture. Olin Downes wrote that in the Mozart Mr. Walter "gave a plasticity and meaning to every phrase without once taking the composition out of its frame."

Three Artists Join for Benefit

Winifred Byrd, pianist; Dorothy Gordon, soprano, and Richard Hale, baritone, gave a concert for the Birth Control International Conference in Aeolian Hall, New York, on the evening of March 24.

According to the writer in the Herald Tribune, Mr. Hale sang with expression, and Miss Gordon displayed a voice "of generally pleasing quality, if not always consistent clearness." The reviewer of the Sun mentioned that Miss Byrd gave a display of bravura style in her compositions. This writer also commented that the program was one of "much interest."

Mme. Kramer—Whittington

A joint recital was given in Aeolian Hall, New York, Thursday night by Mme. Hilda Kramer, soprano, who has sung at the Volksoper in Vienna, and Dorsey Whittington, New York pianist.

To quote the Herald Tribune reviewer, in the Schubert songs Mme. Kramer displayed "a voice of no inconsiderable size, but with a certain metallic timbre in its top notes, softer ones having, on the whole, a clearer, easier tone, while her interpretation suggested a certain unfamiliarity with the medium. She fared much better, however, in the Croatian songs, given with considerable effectiveness." The Sun writer shared this opinion and added that in the folk songs "she was quite interesting, singing them with sentiment and lively manner."

Mr. Whittington was referred to as "the talented young pianist" in the Times, who "not only played with facility and speed, but infused his stormiest flights with youthful exuberance and verve." According to the Sun, "his style was rather turbulent at times, but, nevertheless, musical and brilliant." The Herald Tribune writer mentioned that he "played very well after losing a certain erratic streak, notable in his first two or three pieces, displaying spirit and dexterity and adding encores after copious applause."

Prince Serge Gives Concert

Prince Serge Romanovsky gave a concert in the ballroom of the Hotel Plaza, New York, Tuesday afternoon with the assistance of Mrs. Francis Rogers and a Russian chorus under the direction of Mr. Malzeff. Several of Prince Romanovsky's compositions were heard, including a work for harp played by Carlo Abba, which, to quote the Times, "proved simple and tuneful."

He also accompanied Mrs. Rogers on the piano in some recitations, which, the Times reviewer thought, were given "with beautiful diction." The chorus, according to this same writer, gathered confidence and "sounded better and better" as they proceeded. In the opinion of the chronicler in the Sun, the chorus was "well trained and possessed of balance and good tone."

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. New York City
Telephone Circle 8815

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

GRADOVA
"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist
Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer Flutist
Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records
Mason & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

RATA PRESENT
Pianiste of Re-Engagements
Management of Rata Present: Hotel Ansonia, New York City
AMPICO RECORDS

RUTH ST. DENIS with TED SHAWN and the Denishawn Dancers
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Now Touring the Pacific Coast
Exclusive Management DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York
STEINWAY PIANO

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

Miss Anita Atwater

Anita Atwater, soprano, was heard in recital March 23, in Aeolian Hall, New York. Celius Dougherty was her accompanist. To quote the Herald Tribune, Miss Atwater's voice had "considerable volume and a tone which combined commendable smoothness with a slightly hard quality, but her interpretation seemed hampered by a tendency to clip her phrases unduly short."

The Sun reviewer observed that she sang "with much composure of manner, but her delivery was not that of the fully experienced singer. Her technical equipment is by no means perfected and her ideas of style often are somewhat unformed. Her voice in the middle register was of good natural quality and within this range frequently well produced."

According to the Times, Miss Atwater's voice "is not extensive nor very big, but she had the wisdom to choose beautiful songs by Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms." These songs, added this reporter, were given "pleasantly and musically, with a certain tranquility natural to her temperament." Other reviewers did not report the concert in detail.

Samson et Dalila

Samson et Dalila was sung at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on March 19 with Karin Branzell and Giovanni Martinelli in the title roles. According to the World, Mme. Branzell's singing was marked "by its wonted beauty of tone and fine vocalism." Although the Sun reviewer did not think the role altogether congenial to her talents, he asserted that she "sang her music with all her fine somber richness of tone, her opulent if restricted coloring and a style at once tender and impassioned." She was commended in the Post for a "delightful performance."

This chronicler remarked that Mr. Martinelli sang with "his wonted skill" and the World writer said that he was "in excellent voice and gave a fine, sincere performance." The Sun reviewer thought that he was in good voice and that he "sang with fervor and conviction." Mr. Hasselmans conducted, and others in the cast were unchanged.

Rachmaninoff Plays Own Music

A capacity audience filled Carnegie Hall March 21 to hear Sergei Rachmaninoff's second New York recital of the season. He was given an ovation, and forced to add numerous encores to his program. He played five of his own compositions. The usual enthusiastic reviews followed the concert, and the writer in the Sun commented that "throughout he played with his wonted excellent command of rhythm and phrasing, but there was too much hard tone."

Friends of Music

The second annual Lenten performance of Bach's Passion According to St. John was given by the Friends of Music on March 22, in Town Hall, New York. Artur Bodanzky conducted, and the soloists were Elisabeth Rethberg, Mme. Charles Cahier, George Meader, Gustav Schuetzendorf, and William Gustafson. Paul Eisler played the cembalo and Lynwood Farnham the organ.

The Herald Tribune writer commented that Mme. Rethberg's tones "had their usual unclouded, soaring quality"; that Mme. Cahier sang with "expressive devotion"; that, in spite of a cold, Mr. Meader sang "with marked effectiveness and expression"; and that Mr. Schuetzendorf interpreted his part "with sincerity and feeling." Olin Downes of the Times commended Mme. Rethberg's beautiful voice and Mme. Cahier's singing "with the understanding and musicianship which are hers." He also lauded Mr. Gustafson, who sang with "knowledge and sincerity," and Mr. Schuetzendorf. Mr. Meader, in his opinion, gave the most emotional, and most interesting performance. The Sun writer agreed in commending the soloists, and mentioned that Mr. Meader gave "a thoroughly moving and interesting interpretation."

Mr. Bodanzky "displayed again his earnestness and his rhythmic precision," according to Mr. Downes. The whole performance, to further quote this writer, "was a painstaking and reverent interpretation." In the Sun it was reported that it "reflected all the merits of last season's presentation and the orchestra's work under Mr. Bodanzky's able baton was exceptionally good." Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) commented on the "surpassingly lovely music that cries to be heard" in the work, and the reviewer in the Herald Tribune asserted that the chorus, after a rough start, "preserved a notably high standard after that, with a smooth, full tone, and marked accuracy and unity." The Sun reported that the chorus sang with "fine unity and much beauty of tone."

Romeo et Juliette Repeated

Lucrezia Bori and Edward Johnson sang Romeo et Juliette in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on March 23. In the words of the Sun commentator, "both were in good voice, both sang well, and it was a joy to see a Juliette beautiful and melting, a Romeo manly, ardent, and romantic." The writer in the Herald Tribune agreed that they were in good voice, and added that "their performance of the final scene merited the numerous joint curtain calls at the close." The rest of the cast was familiar and Louis Hasselmans conducted.

George Copeland

George Copeland, who has been absent from the New York concert stage for several seasons, returned in a recital at Town Hall, March 23. Debussy appeared on his program, as did Chopin, Ravel, Schumann, Muffat, Bach and Satie.

To quote Olin Downes of the Times, "Mr. Copeland has long been known for certain unique qualities as an interpreter, which transform the instrument of hammers and wires into a vehicle of the most poetic beauty—for a command of tone-tints given to few; for a special sympathy with the twilight fantasies, the sleep-chasings of Debussy, as also for a classic coolness of line which he can summon on occasion with music of the eighteenth century and; at the other end of the gamut, an innate responsiveness to the color and swing of exotic modern music."

Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) found him "still without his better" as an exponent of modern French and Spanish composers, "for whom his sympathies are so strong, his instincts so amazingly just and his facilities so marvellously adapted." According to the World, he played these works with "transcendent beauty" and the Post reported that "the technical elements of his playing as well as the studious attention to the tone value of his pictures contributed largely to the excellence of the program."

The Sun chronicler wrote that Mr. Copeland "understands Debussy as few pianists do. He knows how to obtain the coherent mood, the subtle, iridescent colors, the remote and mystical harmonic effects the composer desires" and uses the pedal with "superb skill" with an effect "wholly delightful." The Herald Tribune commentator also lauded his playing of Satie, Debussy, and Ravel.

St. Louis Welcomes Chamlee

St. Louis, March 18.—Mario Chamlee was soloist at the fourteenth pair of symphony concerts under Rudolf Ganz. The program included Brahms' Second Symphony, Honegger's Pacific 231, d'Albert's Improvisator Overture and Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun.

Miss Amy Evans

Amy Evans, Welsh soprano, made her New York concert debut in Aeolian Hall Wednesday evening, assisted by Richard Hageman at the piano. To quote the Times, "she proved a singer of musical intelligence, often of a direct emotional and vocal power suggesting the native singers of her country's festivals, though individually the voice had less of commanding quality than of a well ordered control as to timbre, phrase and enunciation that combined to give pleasure."

The Herald Tribune reviewer stated that Miss Evans "has a good vocal equipment, ample power, range and, in general, smoothness of tone, with full soaring high notes" and considered her more at home in oratorio than in Lieder.

According to the writer in the Sun, Miss Evans "sang her program with convincing ease of manner and voice of range and power" but occasional "harsh tone quality" and "some loss of pitch" resulted when she forced her voice. In some of her songs "clarity of phrase, sympathy and intelligence" were noted by this chronicler. Other papers did not carry analytical reviews of the concert.

Ada Leibow in Recital

Ada Leibow, pianist, played an ambitious program at Aeolian Hall the evening of March 21. Bach, Mozart, Chopin, and the Mendelssohn G minor Concerto in which she was accompanied by David Zalish. According to the Herald Tribune, Miss Leibow "showed a not completely developed technical skill and fluency, but with a rather tentative manner."

Organists Gather at Town Hall

The Washington Heights Musical Club held its annual organists' open meeting in Town Hall March 19 with Lillian Carpenter and Ruth Barrett as the organists. Appearing both as composer and pianist, Charles Haubiel played his Requiescat, in which Marjorie Meyer, Winifred Mason, Regina Kahl, and Astrid Fjelde sang, and in two numbers from a Suite for trio, with Michael Anselmo, violinist, and Carl Stern, cellist.

The David Mannes Music School

David and Clara Mannes, Directors

157 East 74th Street

Telephone: Butterfield 0010

JOYCE BANNERMAN

Soprano

The accompanying letter from a well known conductor was received by Annie Friedberg, manager of Joyce Bannerman. It is the usual tribute following Miss Bannerman's successful appearances:

"West Hoboken, N. J.—Dear Miss Friedberg: Thought I would let you know that Miss Joyce Bannerman had a wonderful success at my concert. She is a great singer of whom you may be proud. The people thought she was superb. I will engage her again the first opportunity I have.—WM. LAUFENBERG."

Miss Bannerman's bookings for April are: Conneaut, Ohio, April 2nd; Brooklyn, N. Y., April 16th; Indianapolis, Ind., April 20th

For Dates, Terms and All Particulars Address: Exclusive Management ANNIE FRIEDBERG Metropolitan Opera House Bldg., N. Y. C.

Kindler Plays Boyle Concerto in Chicago

Cellist Heard With Orchestra; Schipa, Morgan, and Gwennie Evans Assist Choruses.

Chicago, March 23.—Hans Kindler, cellist, gave George Frederick Boyle's Concerto in A minor its first performance here at last week's concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conducting.

Maurice Rosenfeld wrote in the News that Mr. Kindler proved himself "an artist of high attainments. His tone is smooth in texture and refined in quality . . . and he has a sure and comprehensive technique." According to Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald Examiner, the soloist played brilliantly—"he is a great technical master of his instrument. He has a fine and expressive tone. He plays with authority, taste and flawless accuracy."

Agreed was Karleton Hackett (Post) that he displayed "a firm grasp of the meaning of the music, poetic feeling, a tone of warmth and sure technique." In the opinion of Edward Moore of the Tribune, although his tone is only of medium volume, "it has good quality and is employed with great facility."

Mr. Moore thought the Concerto "a compound of many pleasantnesses." It showed the composer, to quote Mr. Rosenfeld, as "an adroit musician, who has original thematic ideas." As Mr. Gunn expressed it, "it is good modern music, pleasantly melodious, harmonically colorful, filled with stimulating rhythms, cleverly orchestrated, making fine display of the solo instrument, and deficient in only contrapuntal interest." Mr. Hackett found the music pleasant and melodic.

Mr. Stock also led the orchestra through Tschaikowsky's Manfred Symphony, Glazounow's Le Printemps, and Herbert's Irish Rhapsody.

* * *

The soloist with the Swift & Company's male chorus, D. A. Clippinger conductor, on Thursday was Tito Schipa. According to Maurice Rosenfeld he was "in fine trim. His voice had the suavity, the purely lyrical qualities, the smoothness and the beauty which made each solo a pleasure to hear, and his perfect diction, even in an English song, was a marvel of clarity."

WILHELM RODE

Baritone of the Munich Opera Who Was Recently Heard in London With Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Hackett said Mr. Schipa was "in his happiest mood and sang delightfully." He was also lauded by Mr. Moore, who thought the chorus a competent and well trained group.

* * *

Rhys Morgan and Gwennie Williams Evans were the assisting artists on the program of Welsh music given by the Haydn Choral Society last Monday. Sixty members of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, directed by Haydn Owens, also helped in the presentation of several novelties by Welsh composers.

According to Mr. Rosenfeld, Miss Evans disclosed a voice of power and good quality, as well as effective style and clear enunciation. Mr. Hackett wrote that her tone was "warm in quality and she sang with appreciation for the music." In Mr. Gunn's opinion her "pure lyric voice has lovely timbre."

Both Miss Evans and Mr. Morgan were commended by Edward Moore, and Mr. Rosenfeld commented that the tenor sang "with clear tone production, with firm vocal texture and with musical understanding the several groups of songs." Mr. Hackett asserted that he sang "with spirit and good tone" and Mr. Gunn joined in commending him. The reviewers praised the chorus.

MUZIO

CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY

Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

FORREST LAMONT

TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY

Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

ARTHUR SHATTUCK

PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST

STEINWAY PIANO

Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

CECILE de HORVATH

PIANIST

Management: Clarence E. Cramer, 1102 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.

Season 1925-1926 Now Booking

Baldwin Piano De Luxe Welte-Mignon Records

Musical Chicago En Courant

Opera Issues First Prospectus Naming Singers and Novelties for Next Season; Stock Gets Degree.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, March 24.

THE Chicago Civic Opera Company has unleashed its first prospectus for next season. The list of singers is necessarily incomplete and deals mainly with re-engagements. This includes all of the best sellers of last year, with no additional new names. Rosa Raisa, Mary Garden, Edith Mason, Claudia Muzio, and a coloratura trio made up of Toti dal Monte, Florence Macbeth, and Graziella Pareto, would seem to pretty well cover the soprano requirements of the repertoire. Louise Homer, Augusta Lenska, and Cyrena Van Gordon are listed as mezzo sopranos, thereby omitting two good voices of last year's list. First tenors return en masse, with Schipa and Hackett for lyric duty, and Ansseau, Cortis, Lamont and Marshall, ranging from there to dramatic. Baklanoff, Formichi and Schwarz are announced as baritones, and Chaliapin leads the list of bassos, which also includes the names of Cotreuil, Kipnis and Virgilio Lazzari.

Giorgio Polacco will again head the conductors, and will be assisted in that department by Roberto Moranzoni and Henry G. Weber, the latter having been raised from the status of assistant to full conductor.

BESIDES the standard operas of last season, the repertoire announcement includes Verdi's Falstaff, the same composer's Masked Ball, Donizetti's L'Elisir d'Amore, and Puccini's Manon Lescaut, as Italian revivals, with Leroux's Le Chemineau, and Thomas' Mignon to be done in French. Massenet's Cendrillon will be sung in English, and so will another of the season's novelties, The Witch of Salem, from the pen of Charles Wakefield Cadman. Andrea Chenier and Die Walkuere also seem likely prospects for next season.

Unofficial additions to this list are Gluck's Orpheus and Eurydice, and Ravel's L'Heure Espagnole. Another possibility is the production of an American opera by Franke Harling, chiefly known hereabouts as composer of the music for the Ritz Revue, a Passing Show, etc. His opera is called A Light From St. Agnes and is taken from Mrs. Fiske's play by the author and her husband, Harrison Gray Fiske. Puccini originally had the rights to it, his death permitting Harling its use. It is said to have some of the elements of jazz in its makeup, and Rosa Raisa is spoken of as its probable chief exponent.

FOR the third time Frederick Stock has donned the cap and gown to receive the degree of Doctor of Music from a great university. The University of Michigan was the first so to honor him, with Northwestern a close second, while the Chicago University conferred the degree last week, accompanied by the following eulogy: "Conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, profound student of the theory and practice of music, composer of many original works which have enriched the world of music, skillful in all details pertaining to orchestra administration and organization, who by the subtlety and beauty of his interpretations of the works of the great masters has made the Chicago Symphony Orchestra the joy and pride of the city, and established its fame among the orchestras of the world."

OF CONCERTS during the week there have been many and good. Famous names have sprinkled the announcements, and several not so well known hereabouts have achieved fine successes. Of the latter, first came the pianist, Alexander Brailowsky, who played standard music to an unstandard audience, who remained to cheer until the house lights were turned out.

Another big success was that of Renee Thornton, soprano, who appeared on the last artist recital of the Musicians' Club of Women.

In spite of a lengthy delay, due to an accidental cut on the right hand, Jascha Heifetz appeared imperturbably himself in his only recital of the season, at the Auditorium on Sunday. The audience found Jascha, his golden toned fiddle and his able accompanist, Isidor Achron, well worth waiting for, and seemed not to mind missed trains and dinners.

Julia Claussen returned to sing for her many Chicago admirers a recital that included many known and unknown songs for mezzo voice.

E. Robert Schmitz ranged the modern field of Debussy, Medtner, Milhaud, Bartok, and a new set of etudes by Karol Szymanowski, in his piano recital at the Playhouse.

THE Swift and Company Male Chorus continued its policy of engaging the best available artist as soloist for its annual concert. Tito Schipa was this year's guest, and as to Tito's tenor attainments there is no iota of a doubt here. He appeared in two groups solo, and with the chorus in the prize composition, The Singers, with the composer, Louis Victor Saar, at the piano. He also sang in Harling's cantata Before the Dawn, which included a cello solo played by Alfred Wallenstein, of the symphony orchestra.

The Chicago Business Men's Orchestra, Clarence Evans, conductor, proved that they were an amateur organization who could play, in a program free to the public at Medinah Temple on Sunday. They are amateurs in the best sense of the word, numbering no professional musicians among them, and playing because it is play to do so. Evidences of work were in full evidence, however. Conductor Evans is usually seen in the violin section of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

THE New York Police Band, Captain Paul Henneberg at the helm, sailed into Orchestra Hall Monday evening and negotiated the high C's with entire assurance. Elsa Kressman substituted as soloist in place of the announced Miss Perle Barti. The program was unique in the logs of bands, omitting entirely the name of John Philip Sousa.

The Young American Artist's series presented two interesting talents in their weekly recital at Fine Arts Hall. Frederick Newell Wood, tenor, did full credit to his good taste in a carefully selected program. Twelve-year-old Rosalind Kaplan, who has already appeared at a children's concert with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, replaced Zinaida Joelsohn, who was ill, at the eleventh hour.

Recitals Undiminished in Chicago

Heifetz, Brailowsky, Schmitz and Liebling Heard; Mmes. Claussen and Clemens Sing; Leginska Aids Trio.

Chicago, March 24.—The Chicago music season may be on the wane, but the list of recitals last week was as imposing as any at the height of the season. Jascha Heifetz, Joseph Coleman, Alexander Brailowsky, E. Robert Schmitz, George Liebling, Julia Claussen, Clara Clemens, Josef Rosenblatt, Mable Markle, the New York String Quartet assisted by Ethel Leginska, Frederick Newell, and Roseland Kaplan were those heard in concert.

To quote Edward Moore of the Tribune, Mr. Heifetz "displayed a tone more glorious and speed a little more stupendous than ever before" in his recital here Sunday. In the Saint-Saens Sonata, according to Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, "he put forth those violinistic excellences which have made him famous." Mr. Heifetz was assisted by Isidor Achron, pianist. Karleton Hackett wrote in the Post there was evidenced again "the same spirit of detachment that has been one of the greatest charms of his playing."

* * *

Another violinist to appear was Mr. Coleman, who was hailed by Glenn Dillard Gunn as "a second Elman." It was the "sensuous contralto tone" of the young artist that caused the comparison. Karleton Hackett wrote that "there was interpretative force in his playing, a tone of warmth and sure technique" as well as "sincerity and appreciation for the music."

Mr. Rosenfeld commented that Mr. Coleman's tone has "resonance and power," that he also has a command of the technique, and that "he is adept." The "clarity and exactness" with which he brought out his music received this writer's approval. Mr. Moore asserted that he played "intelligently and eagerly" although there was too much effort apparent in his playing.

"Another distinctive personality" in the pianistic world, was Mr. Hackett's characterization of Alexander Brailowsky who played here again Tuesday. He considered the pianist possessed of "astonishing powers, temperament, artistic sensibility and the mysterious something that appeals to the public . . . He is a personality." He plays notes with rapidity, clarity, and certainty, according to Mr. Moore. His "facile finger technique" and delicacy as well as power of touch were lauded by Mr. Rosenfeld, and Mr. Gunn admired both these qualities but added the belief that Mr. Brailowsky did not understand the possibilities for resonance in his instrument.

E. Robert Schmitz disclosed himself as "a pianist of imagination and of brilliant technical powers," wrote Mr. Rosenfeld of his recital here Sunday. Mr. Moore commented on the "imperturbable, steely facility" of his playing. Karleton Hackett found him a delightful player of Debussy, having "an understanding of the music which he can express most persuasively." In his playing this writer discovered "breadth of conception and freedom in the manner of playing, yet with everything so gracefully molded that there were no awkward transitions."

At his third recital here this season Mr. Liebling played Liszt's Ballade in B minor, and Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 28. He again received laudatory notices, and Mr. Rosenfeld commented that to the former work, he brought "poetic fancy and a brilliant technical display" and to the latter refinement of style, as well as lightness and grace.

Julia Claussen's song recital Sunday was warmly received. Mr. Moore commented that "much of the fine voice and all the fine art that used to be hers is still at her command." She was congratulated by Mr. Hackett for going back to her natural voice—a contralto. He thought her in excellent voice with a tone "rich in quality, well sustained and the labored sense had all disappeared."

She sang, to quote Mr. Gunn "with a tone of superlative warmth and beauty, with enunciation that projected each word of the text with just the right degree of emphasis, with a feeling for the great sweep of the melody. No finer singing has been heard this season, nor is likely to be." Especially notable, according to Mr. Rosenfeld, were "her big, richly colored and sympathetic voice and a perfect German diction."

The first of a series of seven historical programs was given Tuesday by Clara Clemens. The reviewers joined in commending her wide knowledge of song literature, as well as her versatility. They did not, however, find her diction clear. Mr. Gunn wrote that "she has a contralto voice of great natural beauty," although on the whole the chroniclers found that her voice lacked color and range.

* * *

At the "twin organ" concert given by Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Crawford at the Chicago Theatre, Josef Rosenblatt, cantor tenor, sang two groups of songs. The Hebrew songs, to quote Mr. Moore, he sang "with warmth of expression, with a voice of fine lyric quality and with reverent feeling," and in The Last Rose of Summer, he produced some falsetto tones "which were unusually fine and delicate."

Assisted by Kathleen Morris, pianist, and Emil Eck, flutist, Mable Markle, coloratura soprano, gave a recital Sunday. According to Mr. Rosenfeld, "she exhibited a flexible voice of high range and lyric quality." Mr. Hackett noted the "pleasing quality" and good control of her voice as well as the appreciation for the music which she displayed. In Mr. Gunn's opinion, Miss Markle "has a voice of much natural beauty, fresh, youthful, flexible" but her diction and breath control were not of the best.

* * *

Miss Leginska appeared as pianist and composer with the New York String Quartet here last week. She played in the Cesar Franck Quintet, and her Four Poems after Tagore were also played.

According to Mr. Hackett, in the Quintet "there was fine sense of balance and sympathetic appreciation for the music . . . Miss Leginska proved herself an excellent ensemble player." The other players, to further quote

(Continued on page 19)

JOSEPH SCHWARZ
BARITONE
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA CO.
Management:
Edna Richolson Sollitt
501 Oakdale Ave., Chicago
KIMBALL PIANO

BUSH CONSERVATORY CHICAGO

KENNETH M. BRADLEY, President
EDGAR A. NELSON, Vice-President

SUMMER SCHOOL
June 29 to August 1

SIX WEEKS
June 29 to Aug. 8

TEN WEEKS
May 25 to Aug. 1

BRILLIANT FACULTY OF 125 TEACHERS including

LAMOND
World Famous Pianist
who beside his private teaching will give Master Repertoire Classes

OTHER FEATURES INCLUDE—
NORMAL CLASSES
(ALL DEPARTMENTS)
PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC
DRAMATIC ART
EXPRESSION
STAGE CRAFT

Of special interest to School Music Directors, Supervisors and Teachers is the
CLASS PIANO METHODS COURSE
Direction of Helen Curtis

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS
Piano Voice Violin School Music
A number of Free Scholarships will be given by the artist members of the faculty, including Lamond and others. Examinations held week of June 22. Send for blanks at once. Only limited number accepted.

INTERPRETATION CLASSES ARTIST RECITALS
STUDENT DORMITORIES
Only Conservatory in Chicago maintaining extensive dormitory accommodations for the non-resident student. Big demand for Summer Term. Make your reservation early.
For Summer or Winter catalog (Fall term opens Sept. 14) address, stating your course of study.

M. D. SCHWENKER, Secretary
839 North Dearborn Street Chicago, Ill.

Announcing

CHARLES HACKETT

"An audience carried completely off its feet by the perfection of his artistry."
—Sydney Sunday Times (Australia) April 27, 1924.

RE-ENGAGED 1925-1926, 1926-1927
Chicago Civic Opera Company

APPEARING IN OPERA THIS SEASON

in

Monte Carlo

Berlin

Munich

Vienna

Paris

Concerts in London

DATES NOW BOOKING

Management:

WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU, Inc.

250 West 57th Street
New York City

Available October 1925, Spring 1926

A Bostonian in Babylon

William Gustafson Speaks Native English Amid the Myriad Metropolitan Accents and Enjoys Himself.

by ALICE MASON

THAT art will take care of its worshippers whatever country they were born in is the opinion of one American singer at the Metropolitan Opera House. Of course William Gustafson speaks Swedish — he was brought up with it—but also he was born and brought up in this country, and has just a broad enough "a" to betray the Boston influence.

"I can get along in Italian," said Mr. Gustafson as we were launched in conversation about life at the big opera house. "One is almost obliged to understand Italian. There is often someone giving directions who has not been here long enough to learn English. There are the other languages, too; a knowledge of German helps, but Italian is the most necessary. Of course Mr. Bodanzky speaks English perfectly, as do some others who you would think never could have had the time to devote to learning it well.

"It used to be the fashion among some people to decry the lack of an American 'standard' or perhaps they would have liked—and still do, strange to say—a Yankee pattern into which all comers might be made to fit. A nationalized opera is a fine thing, and something toward which this country is working through the various civic opera companies, the opera schools that are springing up, and last, and most vital, the efforts of our own composers. It is my opinion that American musical genius has gotten ahead by leaps and bounds, over untold difficulties, in a very short time, and if its present enthusiasm continues, bids fair to outstrip its old-world parentage.

"But that is not to say that we should expend too much energy on coaxing out of ourselves ideas that might better have mellowed before being given to the public. Introspection and ignorance of the rest of the world would throw us back very quickly, out of the running. It must be remembered that each of these foreign schools of music, distinct enough each from the other to be separately recognized, has the advantage, and makes use of the contact with the others, and a much more intimate contact than Americans enjoyed with them until the last few years. Our isolation, while a seemingly unimportant and surmountable physical matter, has been an annoying barrier.

"As for the international and unprejudiced policy that has made the Metropolitan the leading opera house of the world, to have it interfered with would seem to me nothing short of a calamity. The presentation of German, Italian and French opera in their native tongues by artists schooled in the traditions current in the several countries, not to mention the great numbers of choralists and orchestral players who add to the international flavor, all working together under the same directing genius, getting their uncosmopolitan corners rubbed off incidentally, gets as near the ideal in presentation as is humanly possible.

"It is all interesting to me," continued Mr. Gustafson, who has not been an opera singer very long, "even the practising, or, I should say, especially the intensive work on new things, or refurbishing of old. We cannot have the orchestra to rehearse our roles naturally, but we do go over even the familiar numbers carefully before performance. The problems after the curtain goes up are so different from the preparative stabs at it when one is concerned chiefly with the voice or memorizing that it is like another activity altogether.

"My work is not between stated hours like that of the ordinary business or professional man. He usually arranges to commence the day at nine and leave at four-thirty or five, and with the desk-top shut his responsibility is over until the next morning. I never know when a rehearsal will be called or a change made in the current or coming week.

"There is much going on this season, and more than once there have been performances in Brooklyn and Philadelphia at the same time, or one of those cities and New York, the same day. And an occasional benefit! Then, notwithstanding they are a pretty healthy, rugged group, someone is ill now and then, and we must be ready to substitute in any one of several roles at short notice. . . . No, my social engagements are not definite any time ahead. . . ." Whereupon the interview made way before a company of visitors, who had shown the judgment to arrive when all the busy family was at home.

Settle Wage Question

Under the terms of the new agreement between the Symphony Society of New York and the Associated Musicians of New York, local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians, according to which the members of the orchestra are to get an increase of $10 per week in their pay, the wage rate beginning September 1 will be $75 per week for five rehearsals and four concerts. The agreement is to last until September 1, 1927.

On the road the musicians will receive $7.50 per day for board. During the season they are guaranteed twenty-four weeks of work. Six weeks before the close of the season, according to the provisions of the agreement, the musicians are to be notified regarding their re-engagement.

WILLIAM GUSTAFSON

Discuss Symphony Plans

Syracuse, March 21.—A meeting was held last Sunday in the Hotel Syracuse by representatives of musical organizations, business institutions, and the professions to determine next year's plans for the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra.

Calls are being made preliminary to forming an organization with a board of directors representing the large musical, financial and social interests of the city with the intention of providing a budget for next season. Those present at the meeting were: Melville Clark, president of the present society; Vladimir Shavitch, conductor; George F. Wilson of the musical union; Mrs. Frederick S. Honsinger, president of the Morning Musicales; Mrs. Dean Dudley, Salon Club; Dean Harold Butler, College of Fine Arts; Clarence E. Hancock, president of the Music Festival Board, and Martin H. Knapp, Chamber of Commerce.

Stearns Wins Medal

Theodore Stearns, composer and music reviewer of the New York Morning Telegraph, was awarded last Wednesday the David Bispham Memorial Medal from the American Opera Society of Chicago for his work in composing the English grand opera, the Snowbird.

Georges Enesco Plays Beethoven on Coast

Los Angeles, March 20. — Beethoven's Violin Concerto was played by Georges Enesco as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, Walter Henry Rothwell conductor, last week. The Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was performed in memory of the late Senator William Andrews Clark, and Ravel's Rhapsodie Espagnole and the Entrance of the Gods from Das Rheingold completed the program.

In the opinion of Carl Bronson of the Herald, this "soulful master" (as he referred to Mr. Enesco) displayed an astonishing freedom in his performance of the complicated score "and his tone and technique proved equal to the super-musicianly task. Far enough above the mechanical requirements of the form to imbue it with its true spirit, Enesco proved to be an almost totally subjective interpreter."

Francis Kendig of the Times wrote that the work was "accorded a rendition of masterful order. Enesco's talent is mountain-like; he plays with impressive positiveness. . . . Enesco is profound rather than brilliant, although he can be that too." According to Jose Rodriguez (Record), it was a thoroughly satisfactory performance in spite of some misunderstandings as to intonation, and in spots it was "exquisite" and marked by "great verve and warmth." The writer in the Illustrated Daily News referred to the soloist as "a master technician," who plays "with a smoothness and poise which bespeak years of study and work." Ralph Greene (Examiner) thought the interpretation was "in the true classic spirit, restrained, dignified and free from showiness" and that his tone was of velvety smoothness.

* * *

Over ten thousand persons, many of them school children, applauded the program offered by Mr. Rothwell at the second of the "dime" concerts in the Coliseum. To quote the Examiner, "again Henry Rothwell gave evidence of his genius as a program maker for such an occasion and proved that other instruments than the brass are effective out of doors." The program consisted of Bizet's Carmen Suite, Massenet's La Danse, the Tannhaeuser march, Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture and the Blue Danube waltz.

Rumanian Pianist

CLARA HASKIL

Will return from Paris for a six weeks' tour
October—November, 1925
Now Booking

New York Times—
"Not only imaginative but brilliant."

Montreal La Presse—
"Played with consummate art."

BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MANAGEMENT
130 West 42nd Street, New York

On Nov. 5, 1924, the Minneapolis Journal wrote as follows about

Giannini

"She heads the list of American singers today and is bound to lay the world at her feet."

On March 15, 1925, she created a strikingly similar impression with the critics of Boston

"For the third time in Boston, yesterday, Miss Giannini proved to the world that she is the thrice blessed possessor of as beautiful a voice as it is vouchsafed the present-day American public to listen to. From the depths of her long scale to its top, she produces tones of astonishing loveliness, be they of the finest pianissimo or of full-throated strength."—Boston Herald.

"Dusolina Giannini's first recital in Boston yesterday again proved to those who heard her that she is already a great singer and has it in her power to become the greatest soprano of her generation. Hers is a marvelous voice, unsurpassed in beauty, with wide range and ample volume."—Boston Globe.

"Endowed with a voice such as no new singer has disclosed in recent years, Miss Giannini, on this, her third appearance here, conclusively proved herself a thorough musician, an expert technician, and an intelligent and discerning interpreter of many styles and schools; in brief, an artist in the completest sense of that over-worked word."—Boston Post.

"Within memory, no rising singer has disclosed such diversity, and sustained such evenness of ability as Miss Dusolina. To Mme. Sembrich's schooling—and there is none more sensitive and expert—she clearly adds a mind and a temperament for song; while behind both are the perception and the intuition of a musician upon whatever branch of art she may exercise musicianship."—Boston Transcript.

This unanimity of critical opinion accounts for the fact that Giannini is already more than fifty per cent booked for season 1925-1926

Exclusive Management

DANIEL MAYER

Aeolian Hall

New York

CERTIFIED THE MUSICAL DIGEST

STEINWAY PIANO

VICTOR RECORDS

Harpsichordist Assists Hertz

Lewis Richards Is Orchestra Soloist in San Francisco; Dadmun and Kreisler Give Recitals.

San Francisco, March 19.—The tenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra brought forth as novelties the Haydn Concerto in D major for harpsichord and orchestra, and the Firebird Suite of Stravinsky. Lewis Richards was soloist, and Alfred Hertz conducted. The remainder of the program consisted of Respighi's Antique Dances for the lute, and the Chaconne of Bach.

Mr. Brown found that the Respighi Suite had an "inescapable charm" and that the Chaconne of Bach, orchestrated by Steinberg, was not entirely successful in its new form, although it was interesting. Of the Harpsichord Concerto and Mr. Richards he wrote, "Lewis Richards proved to be one of the most proficient of the three harpsichord players that opportunity has brought my way, and the music was airy, almost as evanescent as a flower-perfumed zephyr." Of the Stravinsky Suite this same writer said, "The dissonances are mild, and the rhythm rises only once to an obsessive beat—in the Dance of King Katschei."

In the Call-Post, Mr. Woodman wrote that "Lewis Richards is a master of the harpsichord. He played exquisitely." This writer felt that "one of the finest representations of present day music was the Firebird of Stravinsky. I confess that it has my admiration, though I like the old masters better."

The Herald writer, Mr. Elliot, thought that "to hear a Haydn harpsichord concerto on the same program with Stravinsky's Firebird music is an experience that cannot, in the nature of things, come very often, and should not be missed. No contrast could make more clear what music has been doing for the last 200 years, nor exactly what Stravinsky has been doing for the last eighteen. Mr. Hertz' handling of the orchestra part of the Haydn concerto was delicacy itself."

According to Mr. Mason in the Examiner "It was a notable concert and if the doubters would go to the second concert, I think they would end by being converted. Those lute tones orchestrated by Respighi were exquisite in their old-time beauty, then the Bach Chaconne, one of the beatitudes of the musicale gospel, and then the Haydn concerto for the harpsichord. Many of the audience voted it funny, which is an indirect way of saying that they did not like it. To wind up, Hertz gave us the Firebird Suite and I enjoyed it hugely."

* * *

Alice Seckels closed her Matinee Musicales at the Fairmont with a recital by Royal Dadmun. There seemed to be some difference of opinion among the reviewers, some thinking that he had smoothed and improved his voice and others feeling that this so-called "improvement" had robbed him of some of his rugged personality in song. Mr. Brown, the Chronicle writer, said, "Royal Dadmun's recital yesterday had two main points of interest, the improvement that the baritone has made since his last visit and the unhackneyed character of the program."

On the other hand, Mr. Mason wrote "Royal Dadmun has learned the art to please with his singing, but he does so with the prettiness of song rather than with the lasting impression on the mind of the hearer."

This writer felt the need of a greater intensity of emotion in Mr. Dadmun's singing.

* * *

One of the treats of the musical season was the recital given by Fritz Kreisler at the Civic Auditorium Sunday afternoon. He drew a capacity house. The critics all gave him the warmest praise. In the Examiner Redfern Mason wrote, "Once more the violinist proved his power over the multitude and over the conoscenti as well." Mr. Woodman in the Call went on to say "His Bach and Handel had all the soulfulness of those great composers," and in the words of the Chronicle writer, Ray C. B. Brown, "Kreisler's absolute artistry invests with significance whatever theme he chooses to draw from the strings."

The Herald writer spoke in the same vein: "The musicianship of Kreisler is a rare sort, with its blend of delicacy and power," and Mollie Merrick in the Bulletin believed "The Kreisler tone is as potent as of yore, the great violinist repeated past successes of his career in San Francisco yesterday afternoon and even went beyond them, for I thought I had never heard him play in such unsurpassable form."

M. J. C.

Hanson Guest in Kansas City

Kansas City, March 23.—Howard Hanson was guest conductor in the performance of his own Nordic Symphony at last Thursday's concert of the augmented Kansas City Little Symphony Orchestra. The remainder of the program was conducted by N. de Rubertis, and it included Tschaikowsky's B flat minor Concerto with E. Robert Schmitz as soloist, Dvorak's Carneval Overture, and Svendson's Fete Polonaise.

MISS AMY EVANS

Soprano Who Won the Enthusiastic Applause of a Large Audience at Her New York Recital Last Wednesday Evening.

Philadelphia Festival June 3

Philadelphia, March 25.—Plans have been completed by the members of the Philadelphia Music League for their fourth annual music festival to be held on Franklin Field June 3. The festival, the first to be given as an open air performance, will have an Egyptian theme.

Practically all the music organizations in the city will take part and over 5,000 people, including fifty choruses, will participate. The second act of Aida will be sung under the direction of Alexander Smallens and Walter Rowe, and a band of 1,000 will be conducted by John Philip Sousa and Albert Hoxie.

New Orleans May Have Orchestra

New Orleans, March 24.—A New Orleans Symphony Association has been organized with the intention of creating a permanent orchestra here. The organization is being fostered by the American Federation of Musicians.

E. E. Schuyten has been chosen to conduct the new orchestra. It is planned to arrange shortly a season of five concerts, with one possibly to include the appearance of a famous soloist.

Mme. Rethberg Draws Overflow Audience

An audience which filled every available inch of space in Aeolian Hall, heard Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, give her first New York recital on Monday afternoon, March 23. It took the management an hour to make arrangements to accommodate the crowd.

W. J. Henderson (Sun) commented that "her singing was always tasteful and intelligent and in some instances touched with delightful grace and delicacy . . . She sang well within the volume of her voice and thereby attained some charming tonal effects." He found again in evidence her "beautiful voice—fresh, well equalized, unworn and generally delivered with skill."

According to Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail, "beautiful vocalism the recital offered in abundance. Mme. Rethberg, never in better form, gave lavishly of the enchanting silken tone, the flawless legato, and the delicious, floating half-voice which are so effortlessly at her command, besides singing irreproachably in tune." He found her "one more of the infrequent operatic luminaries at ease on the concert platform." The flaw to his mind was a certain lack of poetic content. The Post reviewer commented on her voice "of rarest beauty" and asserted that a "really great artist" had "scored a triumph."

The reviewer in the Herald Tribune found all the familiar attributes "in the volume, purity and fluency of her tone and the expressive skill of the interpretations." Like Mr. Henderson, he commended her "skillful economy of vocal form." In the opinion of Olin Downes of the Times, "it is not often that a singer gives such pleasure by her voice, her vocal art, and her fine sincerity."

He lauded also "the freshness and opulence of the voice, the art with which it was controlled, the intelligence and conscience of the singer." Deems Taylor (World) asserted that "as a singer Mme. Rethberg has surely few living peers." Her diction he found hazy at times, but on the whole he considered her "a brilliant and interesting recitalist."

Fleta

METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

FRANZ

KNEISEL

will accept a limited number of students for

Virtuoso Violin Playing and Chamber Music

at Blue Hill, Maine

From July 1st to August 29th, 1925

For terms of tuition and particulars for living accommodations, etc., apply to the Secretary of Franz Kneisel, 329 West 84th Street, New York, until June 1st (thereafter Blue Hill, Me.)

Sensational in Opera Triumphant in Concert

Jeritza

Now Booking Season 1925-1926

Sole management Metropolitan Musical Bureau

Aeolian Hall New York City

Knabe Piano Victor Records

"It was another feather in the cap of that great singer and actor, Edward Johnson"

The New York Evening Post March 23, 1925.

"Mr. Johnson's Pelleas is a memorable performance. In no other of his roles has he made more telling use of his rare intelligence, his insight, his art as a singer and actor. He struck the right balance between the gravity, the simplicity, the aloofness, and reserve that are essential to the character, and the sense of passion under difficult restraint. This passion shows itself in the curious tension and sudden vehemence which Debussy conveys in his marvelously subtle declamation. It was a delight to hear the beautiful voice part, with its infinite varieties of nuance, so heedfully and so eloquently delivered as they were by Mr. Johnson."—Lawrence Gilman in the New York Herald Tribune March 23, 1925.

"Mr. Johnson, a graceful and boyish figure wonderfully satisfying to the eye, brought to Pelleas the romantic glamour, lucent imagination and fine intelligence that characterizes his work at all times."—Deems Taylor in the World March 23, 1925.

"Mr. Johnson's Pelleas was, perhaps, the finest in its proportions and its harmoniousness with the stage picture of any figure on the stage. . . . His performance was one which reflected the highest credit on the artist as an actor, as a poetic figure of the drama and as a singer who gave delightful variety of tone color and nuance to the song-speech of Debussy."—Olin Downes in the New York Times March 23, 1925.

"Edward Johnson went to France and studied Pelleas with the originator of the role. His impersonation is perfect in style and in delicate suggestion. It is the essence of Debussy and its graceful physical investiture adds to its poetic charm. These two protagonists have well mastered the elusive idiom of Debussy's modernized medieval chant in which Jean Christophe found that he painted love and death inarticulate. Miss Bori and Mr. Johnson project across the footlights the meaning of the futile search of the two lovers for words."—W. J. Henderson in the Sun March 23, 1925.

"Never before has the tale of the loves of Pelleas and Melisande been more appealingly told than by Lucrezia Bori and Edward Johnson. It was another feather in the cap of that great singer and actor Edward Johnson, the American Jean De Reszke."—New York Evening Post March 23, 1925.

Available for Concert Fall 1925 — Spring 1926

Management:

WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU, Inc.

250 West 57th Street, New York

CERTIFIED THE MUSICAL DIGEST

VICTOR RECORDS

BALDWIN PIANO

Philadelphia Hears Butterfly in English

Helen Stanley and Althouse Sing; Metropolitan Offers Giovanni Gallurese.

Philadelphia, March 27.—The Civic Opera Company presented Madama Butterfly in English here on Thursday with Helen Stanley and Paul Althouse. Alexander Smallens conducted "in his usual masterly style," in the words of the Record reviewer, and the other reports were similar.

Mme. Stanley, according to this writer, gave a performance which "both vocally and histrionically was one of the best that has been seen in this city for a long time." The Inquirer thought her in "especially good voice" and in the solos and duets she brought forth "the full beauty of the tones at her command."

The Record stated that she revealed "new qualities both as a singer and an actress. Her work was captivating. . . . Especially fervid was her voice as she sang the closing number of the first act." Mr. Martin considered her better vocally than dramatically.

This chronicler thought Mr. Althouse "not only sang with ringing beauty of tone, but acted eloquently." The Record found him "a dominant Pinkerton, satisfactory in voice and demeanor." He was praised in the Inquirer and by Mr. Laciar. The latter considered Fred Patton's enunciation "uncannily perfect." Mr. Patton's performance also received favorable comment in other reviews, as did the work of the others in the cast, including Edouard Lippe, Marie Stone Langston (who was particularly praised for her work as Suzuki), Eleanor Leslie, Valentine Figaniak, Theodore Bayer, and Thomas F. Shay.

One of the operatic novelties of the season, Giovanni Gallurese by Italo Montemezzi, was presented here Tuesday night by the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, with Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, Maria Mueller, and Giuseppe Danise in the leading roles. Tullio Serafin conducted.

In the opinion of Stanly Muschamp of the Inquirer, Miss Mueller sang "with good tone and expression the rather thankless music allotted to the role of Marie." Linton Martin of the North American said she "sang beautifully and acted with spirit, definitely deepening the excellent impression she has already made here." Sidney Laciar wrote in the Public Ledger that Miss Mueller "is a splendid actress as well as singer" and carried off the role "triumphantly." According to the Record, she gave "beautiful expression" to some of the passages in her songs.

GIACOMO LAURI-VOLPI

Is in the Midst of His Activities With the Metropolitan. He Sang the Leading Tenor Role in Giovanni Gallurese Recently in Philadelphia.

Mr. Lauri-Volpi's voice "is fine and strong and he sang musically," wrote this reviewer. Mr. Martin stated that he sang "with opulent and often excellent tones," although he "lacks subtlety and shading in both acting and singing." According to Mr. Laciar, he was uneven vocally and his histrionic abilities were unequal to the often absurd and difficult situations.

Others in the cast received general commendation in the press. They were Mme. Bonetti, and Messrs. Danise, d'Angelo, Bada, Picco, Didur, Reschiglian, and Malatesta. According to Mr. Martin, Mr. Serafin "put more energy and artistry into conducting the score than the composer did in writing it." The other reviews praised the conductor.

Verbrugghen Visits Indiana City

Bloomington, Ind.—The Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen conductor, gave the fourth concert of the University of Indiana concert course to an audience of 3,600 people. A Mozart Overture, Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony, and the Tannhaeuser Overture made up the program.

Plan Memorial Concert for Bossi

A concert in memory of the late Marco Enrico Bossi, the Italian organist and composer, who died at sea on February 21 while on his way home from the United States, is planned for April 25 at Wanamaker's Auditorium, New York. That will be the organist's sixty-fourth birthday.

J. HENRI BOVE

flutist

Has Toured With Mmes. Tetrazzini, Ivogun, Dal Monte and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

"Gave individual performance that won repeated encores."—San Francisco Call and Post.

"A player of very smooth technique and crystalline sweet tone."—Toronto Globe.

"Showed a most musical tone and gave evident delight with his playing."—Washington Times.

"Henri Bove, the noted flutist, played with rare delicacy and finish."—Baltimore Sun.

AVAILABLE FOR JOINT RECITALS AND MUSICALES

Address: 191 Claremont Ave., New York City

Three Orchestras in Philadelphia

Dushkin and Tertis Heard With Bruno Walter and New York Symphony; Stokowski Leads Two Organizations.

Philadelphia, March 24.—Three orchestral concerts were heard here during the last week. Bruno Walter conducted the New York Symphony in its last visit on Thursday, with Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis as assisting artists; a French program with Alfred Cortot as soloist was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra; and Leopold Stokowski was the guest conductor, and Leonora Cortez the soloist, with the Philharmonic Society in its last concert of the season Sunday.

On the whole the reviewers were disappointed in Mr. Bruno Walter's program, which consisted of Weber's Oberon Overture, Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique, and Mozart's Concerto for violin and viola. The Record chronicler asserted that "Walter is a great conductor. It was a genuine treat to hear him again." Sidney L. Laciar (Public Ledger) wrote that he "is undoubtedly one of the finest talents of the present time on the conductor's podium." Other reviewers wrote in like vein.

Stanly Muschamp of the Inquirer thought that Messrs. Dushkin and Tertis "had beautiful tones and sufficient technical equipment to play with great fluency," but the "blending of the two instruments did not completely satisfy." The Concerto "was beautifully played, for the most part, barring some uncertainties of tone at the beginning," according to the North American, and in the Record these "exceptionally fine" artists were lauded for the art and finesse at their command. Mr. Laciar was disappointed in the solo number, although the difficult cadenzas were "finely performed."

* * *

Mr. Stokowski's program consisted of Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, Chausson's B flat Symphony, and the orchestral version of Albeniz's Fete-Dieu a Seville from Iberia. Mr. Cortot played the Schumann A minor Concerto and a novelty in the form of a Concerto by Germaine Tailleferre, who was present and shared the applause with the soloist.

The Schumann Concerto was made to "fairly glow with warmth and color" by Mr. Cortot, according to Linton Martin of the North American. "He places tone above technique . . . the qualities that count in Mr. Cortot's performance are his felicity of feeling and captivating color. He gave fine vitality to this music." He did "some remarkably fine work," wrote the Record chronicler, and other writers lauded his playing.

The Tailleferre Concerto "is modern in musical thought, but it is quite orthodox in harmony and melody. Its weakness appears to be a monotony of rhythm." It was called "simple and unpretentious" by Mr. Martin, and the Record thought it had the quality of "being brief and very spirited in rather a nervous, restless way, without any particular musical appeal."

* * *

Leonora Cortez made her debut as soloist with the Philharmonic Society in Saint-Saens' Fourth Concerto. In Mr. Laciar's opinion she scored a "brilliant" success with a "splendid" performance; "Miss Cortez has all the technique which will be necessary for any piano soloist; she has a remarkable beauty of tone, a perfect sense of rhythm." Stanly Muschamp (Inquirer) noted that "she possesses a highly developed and exceedingly fluent technical equipment; that her sense of rhythm is strong, and there is a nice appreciation of the musical phrase being played."

The Record reported that she exhibited "decided ability, having brilliant technique, good tonal command of the piano and a briskness and decision of style unusual in a young musician." She was commended in the North American for her technical ability.

The program conducted by Mr. Stokowski included Purcell's Trumpet Prelude, excerpts from Gluck's operas, Bach's Passacaglia, arranged by Stokowski, and Albeniz's Fete Dieu de Seville.

Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, manager of the organization, announces that at least eight concerts will be given by the orchestra next season and that among the guest conductors with whom negotiations are pending are Messrs. Gabrilowitsch, Koussevitzky, Mengelberg, Reiner, and Stokowski.

* * *

Lea Luboshutz, Russian violinist, made her Philadelphia debut Thursday evening. In the Record the commentator asserted that "so well equipped technically, musically and temperamentally is she that her playing ranks with that of the best violinists and is a continuous delight. . . . Her playing is marked by unusual breadth a deliberation that demonstrates mental poise and a variety of tone color that makes her art vivid and brilliant occasionally at the expense of refinement of style."

Her careful phrasing and "fine, big" tone were admired by the Inquirer, although she at times over-stressed the tone. The North American mentioned her "full and vigorous tone, firm and vigorous bowing, well developed technical skill and virtuosity" and found her "a musician of considerable depth and power." Mr. Laciar likewise lauded her tone and technique and added that she "plays always for the music rather than for the effect which pyrotechnics will produce."

* * *

The eighth of the recitals by members of the Faculty of the Curtis Institute of Music was given by Carl Flesch, violinist, last Wednesday. He played works by Bach, Debrowen, Fiorillo, Chopin, Saint-Saens, Paganini, Faure, and Schumann. To quote Mr. Laciar, "in each and all of these Mr. Flesch was supremely great. He is, perhaps, the greatest technician of the violin world of today, but his is used as a means of interpretation and not as an end in itself."

Another violinist of the week was Miron Poliakin, whose audience liked him so well that they refused to let him go until he played two extra numbers. In the words of the Ledger writer, Mr. Poliakin "plays like a man to whom the music is the thing, not display." The Franck Sonata was "with the idealism and emotional depth of the composition."

* * *

The members of the Philomusian Club heard a concert of chamber music Thursday by the Jacobinoff-Felgman-Wissow Trio. Frank Bridge, Beethoven, and Tschaikowsky were the composers represented on their program, and, according to the Ledger, "all three pieces were excellently played, especially the Tschaikowsky, which received prolonged applause for its beautiful interpretation. A spirited rendition was given the Beethoven Trio."

On The Music Highway

THE Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Reiner, conductor, recently made a two day trip to Lexington, Ky., and to Knoxville, Tenn. Afternoon and evening concerts were given in both cities.

Pietro Yon will give an organ recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 4.

Georges Enesco, Roumanian violinist, who is now making his first visit to the Pacific Coast and Northwest, will return immediately after his Tacoma engagement on April 4 for an appearance at Wells College on the 9th.

Mr. Enesco will sail for Europe later in the month, where other engagements await him, and will spend the summer in Roumania, working on the score of his opera Oedipus, of which only the Dance of the Theban Women and Warriors has been heard here.

Albertina Rasch with a company of twenty-five artists, including Jacques Cartier, Agnes Roy, Mary Parsons, Natalie Harasti, Molly Peck, will appear at Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening of April 7.

Marie Sundelius gave a recital in Brooklyn on March 29, the proceeds of which will be devoted to seamen's charities. Miss Sundelius fulfilled the engagement in connection with her appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra on March 28 in Mahler's Second Symphony.

Finishing their Midwestern itinerary in New Orleans, the Flonzaley Quartet are due in Los Angeles April 3, where they will open their Pacific and Northwestern tour, playing in Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Berkeley, Stockton, Portland, Bellingham, Seattle, Aberdeen, Spokane, Butte, and Salt Lake City.

The quartet will then journey East in order to fill their May dates, beginning with Fitchburg, Mass., May 5, and ending with Poughkeepsie, May 13.

Prior to sailing for appearances in Havana on March 29 and 31, William Bachaus gave a recital in New Orleans on March 21.

Fernand Francell, French tenor at the Opera Comique of Paris, who has been making a first American tour in the United States and Canada, sailed for Paris on the S.S. De Grasse March 16.

Royal Dadmun, baritone, will reappear in a New York song recital after several years' absence upon his return from his present Pacific Coast tour. The recital will take place in Aeolian Hall on April 28.

Marjorie Meyer, soprano, has been engaged as soloist at the orchestral concert given by the trustees of the Leake and Watts Orphan House at the Yonkers armory on Thursday, May 7.

Her third New York recital of the season will be given in Town Hall on April 4 by Florence Stern, young American violinist.

Jane Lynd, who danced with the ballet during the Zoo Grand Opera season in Cincinnati last summer, appeared there recently as a solo dancer with the Chicago Civic Opera Company in La Gioconda.

The Reading Choral Society, N. Lindsay Norden, conductor, gave its second concert of the season in the Strand Theatre on March 19. The society was assisted by the Russian String Quartet, made up of Joel Belov, Josef Chudnowsky, Sam Rosen and Benjamin Gusikoff; Laura M. Snyder, soprano; and Carroll W. Hartline, accompanist. The program included works by Palestrina, Purcell, Schubert, Chausson, Sahknovsky, Arkhangelsky, and Tyler, and some adaptations by Mr. Norden.

Iris Brussels, pianist, has been engaged by the Chaminade Club of Hackensack, N. J., for a recital on April 13.

For her New York recital in Carnegie Hall on April 20, Ethyl Hayden has included on her program two new songs by Edward Harris, which the composer has dedicated to her, and which will have their first performance on this occasion.

The Washington Heights Musical Club, Miss J. R. Cathcart, president, is giving a concert in Aeolian Hall, New York, on Tuesday evening, April 14, for the benefit of the Edward MacDowell Association endowment fund. This association, founded in 1907 at Petersborough, N. H., where the famous American composer found the quiet and inspiration to do his work, aims to perpetuate the colony established there for creative workers in the seven arts.

The club has enlisted each season its entire force in aid of this cause through a special MacDowell concert, the proceeds of which are devoted to the support of the colony. The program, consisting partly of MacDowell compositions, will be rendered by three American artists, Marjorie Meyer, soprano; Robert Lowrey, pianist, and Elliot Griffis, composer-pianist.

Lambert Murphy, American tenor whose name is familiar in oratorio work, has been engaged by the University of Iowa for a recital on April 19. Mr. Murphy has sung nine times with the Boston Handel and Haydn Society, six times with the New York Oratorio, five times in the Worcester Festival, five times in the Springfield (Mass.) Festival, four times in the Ann Arbor Festival, four times in the Syracuse Festival and three times with the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir.

John Corigliano has been engaged by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences for a violin recital at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Monday evening, April 13.

An organ recital was given by Carolyn M. Cramp, organist of Ninth Church of Christ Scientist, in Town Hall, New York, on March 13 under the auspices of the League for Political Education.

The Hilger Trio will appear in Brooklyn as soloists with the Arion Society on April 16, under the direction of Heinz Froshlich.

Mme. Helen Stanley has been engaged by Alfred Hertz, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, for a number of appearances in the San Francisco Festival, which takes place in the Civic Auditorium between April 15 and 25. These festival appearances will be the occasion of Mme. Stanley's third visit to the Pacific Coast within the past few years.

The works in which Mme. Stanley will be heard are Verdi's Requiem, Mahler's Second Symphony and Schumann's Pilgrimage of the Rose. Mme. Stanley will appear also in a miscellaneous program, in which she will sing operatic numbers.

Cecil Arden of the Metropolitan Opera Company will give recitals on April 28 at the University, Princeton, N. J., in Marion, O., on May 6 and in Allentown, Pa., May 8. Miss Arden has been engaged to sing in Tampa, Fla., on April 13.

Contracts have just been closed for Theo Karle to appear at the May Festival at Columbia University, New York City, and also at the North Shore Festival in Chicago. The Columbia engagement is the second appearance this year under the direction of Walter Henry Hall, and his engagement with the North Shore Festival is his third engagement in four years with this event.

In a concert under the auspices of the Musical Assembly and New York State Federation of Music, in the Chamber of Music at Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 7, the following young artists will be heard: Mabel Zoeckler, lyric soprano; Martin Burton, pianist; Nell Esslinger, contralto; Daniel Saidenberg, cellist, and Viola Blanchay, coloratura soprano.

The Pavley-Oukrainsky Ballet has returned to Chicago after an extended tour of Mexico, and has already commenced rehearsal on next season's repertoire which will include a new ballet called The Mountain of Venus, to be danced to the Venusberg music from Tannhaeuser.

The program of the Palestrina celebration to be held in Town Hall, New York, on April 19 under the direction of Nicola A. Montani, will illustrate the development of liturgical music from the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries, giving examples of the best works of Palestrina and modern examples of the influence of Palestrina on polyphonic music. The University of Pennsylvania will also hold a celebration in New York shortly of the fourth centennial of Palestrina's birth.

Mme. Ninon Romaine arrived in New York on the Antonia a week ago yesterday, and left immediately for Monroe, Michigan, where she gave a piano recital the following evening.

Handel's Judas Maccabeus will be sung by the South Hampton, L. I., Choral Club April 23. The soloists will be Olive Marshall, Amy Ellerman, Calvin Coxe and Edwin Swain.

Gounod's Faust was sung in concert form at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evening of March 15. The cast included Mmes. Sabanieva, Ruth and Wakefield, and Messrs. Tokatyan, Mardones, Ballester and d'Angelo. Mr. Bamboschek conducted.

Anna Case will sail for Europe on April 16. Maria Jeritza, who may take part in the spring opera season at Covent Garden in London, will probably leave the United States on April 18.

Mme. Charles Cahier has been invited by Ossip Gabrilowitsch to sing Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde in Detroit next December. Mme. Cahier's four New York recitals next season will take place in Aeolian Hall on November 21, December 19, January 16 and February 6.

DAYTON WESTMINSTER CHOIR

Principal Points of Spring Tour

Indianapolis—
Monday, April 13th

Chicago (Orchestra Hall)—
Tuesday, April 14th

Detroit (Orchestra Hall)—
Saturday, April 18th

Cleveland (Masonic Temple)—
Monday, April 20th

Eastern Tour—October, 1925
Now Booking

For all details address:
M. H. HANSON
437 Fifth Avenue New York City

VIRGINIA CARRINGTON THOMAS MUS. BAC. A. A. G. O.
AMERICAN ORGANIST AND COMPOSER
RECITALS ADDRESS: 516 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

The Cleveland Institute of Music
ERNEST BLOCH, Director
ENROLL NOW FOR NEW TERM FEBRUARY 9
Complete courses in all branches of music. Supplemented by eurythmics, choral and orchestral training, concert and lectures by visiting artists.
For information write MRS. FRANKLYN B. SANDERS, Assistant Director,
2827 EUCLID AVENUE CLEVELAND, OHIO

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Paris.

PARENTS of the precocious child may well heed the warning that all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. . . . but should Jack sit up at the piano and play Chopin scherzi at the age of seven—as Alexander Borovsky did—it is much wiser to revise the proverb.

"No, I was not a child prodigy," smiled Mr. Borovsky, who recently returned here from the United States; "fortunately I escaped that fate, but it was quite natural that I should commence playing the piano as I outgrew infancy, for my mother was an accomplished pianiste—a pupil of Safonoff, in fact. When I did display some talent for music as a youngster she became the more determined that I should receive a good general education, for mother believed that all play and no work makes Jack a dull musician. Even when I decided to follow music professionally and entered the Petrograd Conservatory at the age of eighteen to study with Eppisova I was also entered at the Petrograd University as a law student.

"I do not mean that parental encouragement of my musical ambitions was lacking," continued Mr. Borovsky; "at that, my early music education was obtained with quite some difficulty. For several years my father was an itinerant judge in Siberia, and we were often stationed in towns where a piano was an unknown luxury. I can recall spending one entire winter in a small northern seaport where no piano could be found until we discovered an antique instrument aboard one of the ships frozen in the harbor. Upon learning that I was a piano student the sailors brought the piano to our home."

The recollection brought Mr. Borovsky a shiver. "Until one has spent a winter in northern Siberia he has yet to become acquainted with severe cold. The samovar is the Siberian's one salvation. One does not go two hours without drinking several glasses of hot tea—as hot as only Russians can drink it."

Mr. Borovsky did not follow his legal profession. He said: "I have devoted all of my time since leaving the University to music. I graduated from the Conservatoire in 1915, and within three years was conducting master classes at the Moscow Conservatoire. In one sense of the word my entire legal education is of no value today, for there has been a complete revision of the legal code and procedure in Russia. However, the hours I spent poring over my law books have not been wasted. Aside from the mental discipline and general value of such a course of study, you know education is often a pride and hobby with Russian musicians.

"In Russia you are not asked with whom you studied music, but which university you attended and what degrees you captured. The degree of Doctor of Medicine is the most coveted. Borodin was a professor of medicine and surgery at the Petrograd Institute, Glazounow attended the Polytechnic Institute, Rimsky-Korsakoff studied at the Naval Institute, Scriabin had a military education, Stravinsky originally studied to become a lawyer, likewise Seniloff. Myaskovsky is a military engineer, Sabaneyeff was a student of literature at the University, and Gunst is a law student of the same school. Moussorgsky, you will recall, was an army officer. Tschaikowsky also studied law, and Cesar Cui was Professor of Fortification at the Petrograd Engineering Academy. Pushkin, the novelist, was a physician and many other Russians prominent in the arts have been educated for the more 'practical' callings."

Mr. Borovsky is scheduled to give six recitals here, and will then make a brief tour of Germany and the Balkans. He will return to the United States in January, 1926.

S. K.

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY

Sing Rossini's Stabat Mater

Newburgh, N. Y., March 21.—Rossini's Stabat Mater was given in Trinity Methodist Church by the vested choir of one hundred voices under the direction of John W. Nichols with Mrs. Clarence K. Chatterton at the organ. The soloists were Grace Kerns, lyric soprano, Avis Adams, contralto, Rudolf Aust, tenor, and Earl Tuckerman, bass-baritone.

Ethel Leginska Assists N. Y. Quartet in Chicago

(Continued from page 11)

this reviewer, showed "a notable vigor" of tone in forte passages, although under control of the artistic sense. Mr. Gunn observed that they played "admirably, with vigorous rhythm, discriminating contrasts, accurate ensembles, and Miss Leginska proved herself a capable associate." Mr. Rosenfeld also commended the ensemble playing.

Frederick Newell Wood, tenor, and Rosalind Kaplan, pianist (substituting at short notice for Zinaida Joelsohn, who was ill), were heard at the concert of the Young American Artists Series. Mr. Moore wrote that his voice is "of unusually fine texture, and not since John McCormack's last appearance have I heard English so exquisitely sung." Mr. Gunn said he sang in "excellent style. His voice was pleasing in quality and his singing showed the results of fine schooling. The tone was well poised and under good control . . . Mr. Wood has the right stuff in him and is on the road." In Mr. Rosenfeld's words, he "disclosed a lyric tenor voice of refined quality and of pleasing timbre. His projection of the texts of the songs was distinct and his style elegant and artistic."

This writer added that Miss Kaplan "displayed a fluent, even technique, a sense for musical values, and considerable power in the Ballade, besides interpretative gifts." According to Mr. Gunn she came through the text excellently—"she played with appreciation for the music and showed well trained fingers." Mr. Moore asserted that "she has great talent for her years.'

ANNOUNCEMENT

OF

FREE FELLOWSHIPS IN MUSIC

TO BE AWARDED BY

The Juilliard Musical Foundation

FACULTY 1924-5

Mme. Marcella Sembrich
Francis Rogers
Ernest Hutcheson
Cesar Thomson
Felix Salmond
Leon Rothier
Mme. Olga Samaroff
Josef Lhevinne
Paul Kochanski
Georges Enesco
Rubin Goldmark

One hundred free Fellowships in music: singing, piano, violin, violoncello, and composition, to be awarded by competitive examination. Tuition value of each Fellowship $1,000.00.

Appointments for full school year. Instruction under renowned teachers at the Juilliard School of Music, New York City.

Conditions: Competing students should be over sixteen and under thirty; should be Americans; should have the equivalent of High School education; and should be advanced in music study.

Circular and application blank, with detailed information, on request

Dates for 1925 examinations June 15th to 18th inclusive and September 28th to October 3rd inclusive

JUILLIARD MUSICAL FOUNDATION
49 East 52nd Street, New York City

ALBERTO
SCIARRETTI
Pianist

HAS WON SUCCESS IN THE THREE MUSICAL CENTERS OF AMERICA

and

"His next recital will be awaited with interest." —New York Times

"We are sure his welcome hereafter will be hearty and spontaneous." —Chicago Evening American

Photo by Amemiya

New York, Feb. 5, 1925

"Alberto Sciarretti last night won a well-deserved success. During the andante of the 'Appassionata' the voice of Beethoven made itself heard and Mr. Sciarretti, flying on the wings of inspiration, roused his audience to unwonted enthusiasm."—Times.

"Mr. Sciarretti played most of his program well. . . . His style was good, his legato smooth and polished and his work revealed keen intelligence and considerable skill in tone color and shading."—The Sun.

"He displayed technique of notable brilliance. The three pieces by Scarlatti received a firm, fluent, rapid performance. . . . The sonata he played with vigor . . . and with marked technical skill and finish."—Herald Tribune.

Boston, Feb. 25, 1925

"Mr. Sciarretti played the delightful group of three Scarlatti pieces engagingly, with a cool, crisp tone that had a distinct individuality of its own. He made the slow melody of the scherzo sing and finished the funeral march impressively. Mr. Sciarretti is, manifestly, a player of fine talent."—Herald.

"Mr. Sciarretti played with a high degree of technical polish, with tone limpid and light. Technic, of more than usual polish and refinement, Mr. Sciarretti has in abundance. Tone with him is very lovely. . . . Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody brought the program to a brilliant close."—Transcript.

"Mr. Sciarretti has marked talent. His performance last night proved that."—Globe.

Chicago, March 8, 1925

"Such qualities as these shown in the young man's playing incessantly: a freely running stream of fine tone, a graceful, melodious curve and sharpness of emphasis rode upon the surface of music which had in it a great deal of mechanical skill, poetry, modesty and persuasiveness." — Evening Journal.

"He had erudition and solid technical training of piano-peers, fingers that are fleet as well as discreet, fine tone and considerable authority."—Evening American.

"His piano was a source of tone of great smoothness, the medium for display of facility that had grace and charm."—Examiner.

"Three pieces by Scarlatti were welcome numbers and were played with fluent technical style, with a pearly clarity and with musical daintiness."—Daily News.

Exclusive Management:

DANIEL MAYER

Aeolian Hall New York

MEHLIN PIANO

Metropolitan Produces Pelleas

Lucrezia Bori, Johnson, and Whitehill Commended; Hasselmans, Wymetal, and Urban Share Praise.

Debussy's Pelleas et Melisande was produced for the first time by the Metropolitan Opera Company on March 21 with Lucrezia Bori and Edward Johnson in the title roles. Clarence Whitehill, Kathleen Howard, Louise Hunter, Leon Rothier, and Paolo Ananian completed the cast, and Louis Hasselmans conducted. A capacity audience attended.

It was, to quote W. J. Henderson of the Sun, "one of the greatest artistic triumphs of Mr. Gatti-Casazza's administration," with "sympathetically conceived and exquisitely executed" scenery by Josef Urban. Wilhelm von Wymetal was congratulated by this reviewer, and, "as a whole," Mr. Hasselmans' reading was admirable.

Miss Bori, continued Mr. Henderson, added another portrait of "rare, aesthetic quality" to her gallery, "of appealing tenderness, of underlying emotion and of exterior beauty ravishing to the eye and searching to the heart." He considered Mr. Johnson's Pelleas "perfect in style and delicate suggestion;" Mr. Whitehill's Golaud "destined to be remembered as one of the great tragic figures of the contemporaneous opera stage;" Mr. Rothier "simple and dignified" as Arkel; and Mmes. Howard and Hunter commendable as Genevieve and Yniold.

Lawrence Gilman wrote in the Herald Tribune that "the Metropolitan's production is worthy of the great work" and that the settings were the finest he had ever seen. Mr. von Wymetal's "skillful direction of the stage" was praised, and "to Mr. Hasselmans' adroit and sympathetic conducting was due a large part of the vitality and flow of the performance."

He thought that Miss Bori brought Melisande to life, and that Mr. Johnson's was "a memorable performance" in which he made "telling use of his rare intelligence, his insight, his art as a singer and actor." Mr. Whitehill's Golaud was "shrewdly composed and developed;" Miss Howard "set forth an embodiment deftly poised and reticent, and scrupulously in the picture;" Yniold was "a bit too conscious and sophisticated;" and Mr. Ananian's Physician "all that was needful."

In the opinion of Deems Taylor of the World, the production, "all in all, was superb, probably one of the finest ever made anywhere . . . scenically it was, I am sure, incomparably the best ever made." Mr. von Wymetal's staging "is an absorbing and eloquent succession beautiful groupings, attitudes and gestures." A "subtle and beautiful reading of the score" was given by the conductor, and the orchestra played with "clarity and vitality."

Miss Bori, according to this chronicler, "a picture of wraith-like beauty, played Melisande with touching innocence, sincerity, and simplicity" although she seemed at times a little "overpositive." He found Mr. Johnson "a graceful and boyish figure wonderfully satisfying to the eye" who brought to the role "the romantic glamour, lucent imagination and fine intelligence that characterizes his work at all times." Mr. Whitehill, "in superb voice," has found the role "perfectly adapted to his gifts."

According to Mr. Taylor, Miss Hunter "gave an appealing and amazingly skillful" performance; Mr. Rothier was "mellow and nobly dignified;" and Miss Howard and Mr. Ananian "made more" of their small parts "than one would have supposed possible."

The performance, in the words of Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail), "was elaborate, unfailingly conscientious, admirably painstaking. . . . Mr. Hasselmans conducted with a deep and worshipful devotion" although he made the score sound very loud. "The most striking and memorable individual performance was the Golaud of Clarence Whitehill—an impersonation extraordinary in its sustained power, emotional conviction, dramatic pitch and consummate treatment of textual and musical declamation." Mr. Sanborn thought Mr. Johnson's Pelleas "had visual illusion and his performance in most of its phases was intelligent, genuinely acceptable, and pitched, moreover, in a more restrained key than those of his associates." Miss Bori he considered less exemplary although her Melisande was an "eager, aspiring and often extremely creditable effort of one not invested with the temperament, plastique or spiritual intuitions for the part."

Olin Downes wrote in the Times that the opera "was given with less subtlety, with more breadth, motion and exterior effect than before, and this was intended. In the main the result was successful and eloquent of the composer's purpose." Staging and settings again were commended, and the conductor's reading was expressive, although "more sharply delineative and oblivious of detail" than usual.

The Golaud was "a notable impersonation," he wrote, and Mr. Whitehill's French diction was "a joy to the ear and the understanding." Mr. Downes considered Mr. Johnson's work "the finest in its proportions and its harmoniousness with the stage picture of any figure on the stage." His acting, singing, and understanding were also lauded. Miss Bori's "was a very earnest and intelligent effort" withal "the most theatrical." The Arket of Mr. Rothier was "truly impressive, and the music nobly sung."

According to the reviewer in the Post, the audience "rejoiced in the glorious music, wonderfully sung, and the plaintive story, beautifully acted. . . . Never before has it been more beautifully staged, sung, or acted."

This commentator commented that "much praise must go to Miss Bori for the exquisite charm of her impersonation" and that she was "in fine voice and nothing better could be desired than the liquid beauty of her tones as she sang the ravishing glory of Debussy's masterpiece."

"It was another feather in the cap of that great singer and actor, Edward Johnson, the American Jean de Reszke," continued this writer. "Johnson sang as he rarely has before, with a wealth of beauty in the lower tones demanded by most of the score, now and again rising to a ringing high tone of surpassing beauty." Messrs. Rothier and Whitehill were also favorably mentioned.

Garden of Mystery Is Given for First Time

The second part of the program of the all-American evening in the series of benefits for the Music School Settlement given in Carnegie Hall on March 20 was devoted to the first performance of The Garden of Mystery, an opera by Charles Wakefield Cadman, with libretto by Nellie Richmond Eberhart.

Before the opera was a concert in which Max Polikoff, violinist, and Princess Tsianina, soprano, appeared. MacDowell's Woodland Suite was played by Howard Barlow and the National-American Orchestra, who also played the opera score.

According to Deems Taylor (World) the score, "while it contains fluent passages, is handicapped by difficult and inexpert vocal writing and a failure on the part of the music to penetrate very far below the surface of the characters of the story. The libretto is similarly inexpert." Pitts Sanborn wrote in the Telegram-Mail that the music "lacks dramatic pith and point" and F. D. Perkins (Herald Tribune) considered it "undistinguished music." In the opinion of the Sun, "Mr. Cadman wrote some passages of melodic smoothness and pleasing quality, but without probing the psychology of the story ruthlessly." Other writers were of the same opinion, and they agreed that the acting and singing were, on the whole, most amateurish.

Mr. Sanborn found "a conspicuous exception" to the poorness of the cast in Yvonne de Treville. Mr. Taylor agreed that she was "professional" and in other reviews she was noted as the exception to the mediocrity of the work. The diction of the English of most of the cast was also thought very poor. Mr. Barlow and the orchestra received commendation.

GRAVEURE
IN LEADING MUSIC
CENTERS

"A voice of warmth and flexibility and an unfailing command of phrasing and expression. He is able to enter into the spirit of each number, grave or gay, solemn or whimsical." (Krehbiel, New York Tribune.)

Management:
Metropolitan
Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City

EASTMAN
SCHOOL OF MUSIC
of
THE UNIVERSITY OF ROCHESTER

Summer Session
JUNE 22 — JULY 25, 1925
All Regular Departments in Session With Complete Faculties

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC
Faculty of Nationally Known Experts Offer Courses in
METHODS, INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC
(Woodwinds, Brasses, Strings)
PIANO CLASS TEACHING, APPRECIATION, VOCAL CLASS TEACHING, HARMONY

NORMAL AND REPERTORY CLASSES FOR PIANO TEACHERS
Organ Accompaniment of Motion Pictures
Academic Work in University in Conjunction with Music Study

For Information Address Director of Summer Session
EASTMAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC
ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

Photo © Amemiya

"He Is Commanding
He Is Authoritative
He Is Profound
He Is Movingly Human"

Says the

San Francisco Examiner

about

ZLATKO

BALOKOVIĆ

The Violinist
with a "tone of liquid amber and molten gold"

—St. Louis Times

Other critics concur as follows:

"Zlatko Balokovic scored a decided success. His tone is strong and full of the most tenuous softness, but always of the truest intonation. The audience waxed enthusiastic." —New York Times.

"This young man plays with great beauty of tone, faultless intonation and genuine musical feeling."—New York Post.

"If you would know something of his style, comparing him to the others, I believe I would refer him back to the youthful Fritz Kreisler."—Cleveland News.

"After that first movement of the Tschaikowsky concerto last night, there was an impulse to stand up and shout. There had been musical revelations."—Los Angeles Examiner.

"Who listen must marvel at his tone. It was as opulent as the deep velvet of Kreisler's violin."—St. Louis Times.

"We have had few violinists who held our attention as did Balokovic. From the elevated toe of his right foot to the last finger of his left hand there is no dullness in him."—Pittsburgh Post.

"Detroiters were afforded an opportunity to hear a violinist of exceptional merit and distinction last night."—Detroit News.

"Yesterday was an important concert for it presented a veritable 'young Kreisler' in Balokovic, who astounded and thrilled the audience with his tone, his brilliant technical accomplishments and his depth of temperament."—Washington Herald.

Season 1925 - 1926 in America

EXCLUSIVE MANAGEMENT:

DANIEL MAYER

Aeolian Hall New York

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:

J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

La Scala Offers Zandonai Novelty

I Cavalieri di Ekebu Presented for First Time With Toscanini Conducting.

Milan.

Riccardo Zandonai's newest opera, I Cavalieri di Ekebu, was heard for the first time on the evening of March 7 at La Scala. Arturo Toscanini was the conductor.

With this work Zandonai enters the decisive phase of his career. His mastery of means here is revealed in its full bloom. One feels throughout the opera the sure hand of the skilled composer for the theatre. No longer is he searching high and low for strange effects, for complicated symphonic devices which will lend weight to his score.

In I Cavalieri di Ekebu the world finds no disdain for the direct charm of melody, for the dramatic devices of the chorus or the duet. The orchestra of Zandonai in this score is solid, but not overbearing or superfluous in its weight. It gives the singer the opportunity to be heard without struggling in a vortex of instrumental complexity. The orchestration is colored and varied, and supports with praiseworthy economy the vocal parts; it is up-to-date without being singular or stupefying.

The text of the opera adds the fitting shade of meaning to the orchestral body of the score, or, it would be more proper to say, the music of the orchestra is extraordinarily fitting to the words which it was composed to support. In fact this appropriateness of the melodic declamation of the score to the instrumental figures to which it is joined is the leading achievement of the opera.

Nor is it the only achievement. In I Cavalieri one finds a composer whose tendency in the past has been to interest himself predominantly in the symphonic style in music turning completely about, and burying his thoughts completely in the traditions of genuine melodrama. Apparently there has risen a new faith in Zandonai, and many will think that it is one which better fits his operatic ideals than his old one.

Warmth Still Lacking

Nevertheless one needs more than a new faith to create art which will not die. Listening to the music of Zandonai one does not feel overcome by any dizzy passion which the music achieves. True enough there is melody there, and it flows unstinted and unhesitating. The form of the music is clear and firm, but somehow the creative artist does not climb to any lofty summit of spiritual achievement. There is beauty in the music, but it is not of that compelling originality which fascinates the hearer and dominates his mood.

One rather hears the clear exposition of the music with a sense of bland detachment. There is no impact of emotion, no trembling absorption in the artist's message. Zandonai does not proceed in the score of I Cavalieri beyond a calm mood of meditation, always restrained.

For that reason it appears not likely that I Cavalieri di Ekebu can hope for an established place in the general operatic repertory of the future. With good luck it will go the rounds of the larger opera houses of the world, because indeed it is the result of a noble and laborious artistic development. From this point of view the premiere of the opera at La Scala was really successful and noteworthy.

Leading Tenor Indisposed

Perhaps the success would have been greater if the leading tenor in the presentation Signor Lo Giudice (Giosta) had not been unfortunately indisposed.

The foundation of the opera is firm and solid. The obvious influences in the score of many of the past masters of composition do not detract from the value or effectiveness of Zandonai's own contribution. It is not true, as some of the reviewers declared, that the opera shows throughout the unmistakable accent of Mascagni.

Mascagni does peek out in one page or another from time to time, that is to say, one is reminded of his general style. At other times there is marked Slavic influence; some of the choruses are much in the manner of Moussorgsky. Here and there a bit of Puccini is apparent, and once in a while Wagner and Strauss are suggested.

The feeling is never that Zandonai has plagiarized. He simply has followed the past, just as all musicians follow what has gone before. There remain on every page the style and technic of Zandonai himself, and the music is always good enough to deserve the warm approval with which the audience greeted it at its premiere at La Scala.

Libretto Not Popular

It must be said that the story upon which the opera is based is not of the kind that is likely to be very popular with the general run of opera audiences. It is based on a novel of the Swedish writer, Selma Lagerlof, and shares the general weakness of novel material when applied to the stage. In turn the author of the novel based her work on some old Swedish legends which are quite far in interest from what the Latin theatre public is likely to prefer.

The fact that Zandonai has succeeded in working this unpromising material into a real work of the stage is an accomplishment which bodes well for the operas which he has yet to write even if this one does not reach the heights of genius.

For I Cavalieri di Ekebu is a real work of the theatre, and not an extensive symphonic poem which has been set to scenes on the stage. A certain amount of credit also is due the librettist Rossato, who condensed and transformed the elaborate Northern legend into an operatic scenario. He wrote skillfully and eloquently, and welded his material into its new form with the greatest ingenuity.

The audience appreciated his work, for he was called out on the platform several times to take his bow with the composer and with Toscanini, who, needless to say, interpreted the score with a meticulousness, an energy, and a sympathy which did full justice to its every possibility.

Signora Casazza Powerful

Vocal honors of the evening went to Signora Casazza (La Comandante), for the powerful and clear cut drama which she drew out of her role, that of a character always rude and imperious; to the baritone Franci, for his rich and powerful voice; and to Signor Lo Giudice, who displayed, despite his illness, a dramatic tenor voice of warm timbre, especially in the middle range.

The supporting members of the cast, including the basso Autori (Sintram), formed a homogenous group. The chorus added brilliant and varied color to the performance, was vibrant, powerful, and unified, and acted with admirable spirit and spontaneity.

The audience included music critics of importance from all parts of Italy, and the leading social elements in Milan. FEDERICO CANDIDA.

RICCARDO ZANDONAI
Italian Composer Whose New Opera, I Cavalieri di Ekebu, Had Its World Premiere Recently at La Scala in Milan.

Lusardi Organization Continues

Milan.—Emilio Ferone, who was in partnership with the late Giuseppe Lusardi, musical agent and Italian representative of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, has announced in the Corriere di Milano that after making an agreement with the Lusardi heirs, he will take up the directorship of the agency. The firm will continue under the name of Giuseppe Lusardi.

The organization of the agency will remain unchanged, and Egisto Tromben, editor of the Corriere, of which Lusardi was owner, will have full charge of the paper.

Marie Brema Dead

London.—Marie Brema, former English operatic singer, died in Manchester on March 22. She first appeared in England in Schubert's Ganymede in Oxford in 1891, and four years later she made her American debut in Die Walkuere, when Walter Damrosch conducted. During the season 1895-1896 she sang leading Wagnerian soprano roles at the New York Metropolitan Opera House.

I. S. C. M. Features String Music

Vienna.—Frederick Delius' Second Sonata for violin and piano, Arthur Honegger's Cello Sonata, Anton von Webern's three pieces for cello and piano, Op. 11, and Egon Wellesz's new Suite for cello solo made up the program at a recent concert under the auspices of the International Society of Contemporary Music here.

British Opera Company Tours

Birmingham, England.—The second week of the local season of the British National Opera Company began on March 16, and included performances of Othello, Tales of Hoffmann, The Golden Cockerel, La Boheme, Alkestis, Hugh the Drover, Aida, and Faust. The conductors for the week were Eugene Goossens, Aylmer Buesst, and Malcolm Sargent.

First Aida of Season at La Scala

Milan.—Aida was presented at La Scala for the first time this season on February 22. Ettore Panizza conducted. The cast included the tenor Pertile, Signora Arangi-Lombardi, Signora Zinetti, the baritone Franci, and Signori Righetti and Baromeo.

F. C.

Gabriele Sibella Dies

Genoa. — Gabriele Sibella, vocal teacher and composer, has just died here.

J. HENRI BOVE
FLUTE SOLOIST
Joint Recitals and Musicales
191 Claremont Ave. New York

BONCI
VOCAL STUDIO
For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900.
New York City
Knabe Piano

STELLA de METTE
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Formerly with Metropolitan Opera
Touring with San Carlo Opera Co.
Exclusive Management of
ANTHONY BAGAROZY
Aeolian Hall New York

OLD-WORLD HIGHLIGHTS

New Operas Heard in Germany

Kienzl's Hassan der Schwaermer and Simon's Die Frau Im Stein Given for First Time.

Berlin.

Although Berlin itself has been backward this season in the production of novelties in the operatic field, smaller cities of Germany have had several opportunities to hear new works for the stage. Hermann Kienzl's Hassan der Schwaermer (Hassan the Enthusiast) was put on for the first time at Chemnitz recently, and about the same time Stuttgart was hearing a remarkable novelty, Die Frau im Stein, by the Berlin pianist and composer, Dr. James Simon.

Hermann Kienzl, composer of Hassan, is known throughout Germany especially for his opera Evangelimann. Musicians were aware that during the last two years he was composing a new work, but their great desire to hear it as soon as possible did not prevent him from postponing the premiere from month to month in order that the score might be carefully revised and polished.

Frau Kienzl, the wife of the composer, was the librettist of Hassan. She took her subject from the traditional fantasy, A Thousand and One Nights. The story has to do with a poor cobbler who invites all his friends to a party in celebration of his birthday. Among the guests is included a Caliph, who conceives the joke of making Hassan, the cobbler, Caliph for a day.

As soon as Hassan is invested with his high office, he begins an unexpected campaign of social reform. The Caliph regrets his joke, and causes Hassan to be given a sleeping draught, and, while he is unconscious, to be brought back to his workshop.

Reviewers Find Music Good

The score of Hassan, according to the press reports of the premiere, contains some beautiful music. The catchiness of the melodies and the touching simplicity of the moods appealed to the audience, although from time to time the composer jolted them with some modernist audacities in his style.

Although Dr. Simon's Die Frau im Stein enjoyed only a moderate success in Stuttgart, it is to be gathered from what authoritative listeners said of this music-drama that it is an unusual work. Dr. Simon's music speaks to a broad public. It is modern without being incomprehensible, and pleasing without being banal. In general the score was favorably judged by the chroniclers.

They found the music clear and interestingly colored, and not slavish to the text. The voice parts have a characteristic easy flow. The second act marked the climax of the success of Die Frau im Stein as far as the audience was concerned. After the scene on the ship on its way to Naxos the composer was repeatedly called before the curtain. The applause at the end of the opera was less impulsive, partly because the unexpected solution of the complications of the plot surprised the audience and left it rather breathless.

Concert Novelties in Berlin

There have been many concert novelties this season in Berlin, and their number and interest in part make up for the lack of stage novelties which the public here has been able to enjoy. A new violin concerto was recently played by W. Waghalter, with the composer, Baron von Reznicek, conducting the accompanying orchestra. The composition was generally considered unimportant. After hearing this work the critic Dr. Schmidt wrote his opinion that Baron von Reznicek is at the top of his powers as a composer, so much so that "he can afford to give the public a weaker work, such as this, without endangering his reputation."

Sometimes during this concerto one got the impression that the composer was not always perfectly serious in his writing. He seemed on occasion to be poking fun at the hyper-moderns. His occasional great care to keep his tonality clear, his conservative melodiousness (some of the themes are reminiscent of Bellini), his old-fashioned flourishes make it at times difficult to believe that he wrote in all seriousness. Some of the reviewers expressed the theory that it might be an old work of Baron von Reznicek which he has lately worked over.

It was agreed that the soloist played with understanding and warmth. The applause of the audience was considerable, but friendly rather than enthusiastic.

Concert-goers here lately had the opportunity to establish in their minds more firmly the fact that the weaker sex is weaker also in the art of musical composition. A young musician, Grete von Gibler-Jieritz, presented in her recital lately a number of her own fugues for the piano, but they made no marked impression.

ARTHUR KURSCHNER.

Toscanini Presents Bust to Galleria d'Arte Moderna

ROME.—Arturo Toscanini has presented a bust of himself to the Galleria d'Arte Moderna. Some time ago the sculptor Adolfo Wildt had the conductor of La Scala sit for him, and carved his likeness in one of his rugged, pensive moods. Signor Fedele, Minister of Public Instruction, saw the bust, and asked Toscanini for permission to make a duplicate of it to be placed in the Galleria.

The musician immediately replied with an offer to present the original piece of sculpture to the Government, and his offer was accepted. The bust is being placed in the Galleria immediately.

Copenhagen Plans Danish Fete

Copenhagen. — The Dansk Tonekunstnerforening is arranging for the beginning of May a Danish Music Week here. The chief event will be the performance of a series of native operas.

Two conductors appeared at two recent concerts of the Danish Philharmonic Society this season. Paul Klenau featured the Petrouchka Suite of Stravinsky, and Victor Schioler, the pianist, conducted Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Frederic Lamond was soloist at this concert in the same composer's G major Piano Concerto.

Travel Club Itinerary

The Musical Travel Club of America announces its complete itinerary for the coming European tour as follows: The western contingent will sail from Montreal June 27, and the eastern from New York July 1. They will meet in Paris, and go thence to Nice, Monte Carlo, Milan, Genoa, Pisa, Rome, Florence, Venice, Lugano, the Italian Lakes, Lucerne, Zurich, Munich, Bayreuth, Nuremburg, Dresden, Berlin, Weimar, Eisenach, Frankfort, down the Rhine to Cologne, Bonn, and London, arriving in America September 3.

Howard Brockway is musical leader of the party.

D'Indy Conducts in Paris

Paris.—Vincent d'Indy, dean of French composers, appeared on February 20 as conductor of his own Chant de la Cloche, for orchestra and chorus. The work was composed over forty years ago.

American Choral Work Presented in England

London.

A recent broadcast affair of interest to Americans was the first production in England of Edgar Stillman Kelley's The Pilgrim's Progress. This the Observer called "dull," but added that it was "not performed adequately." The Sunday Times critic said, "The music is pleasantly sincere," but he thought it obvious. "In the absence of any marked gift of originality, the composer has molded his melodies and choruses now on lines reminiscent of the methods of Mendelssohn, now of Humperdinck, now of Elgar, now of Sullivan." This writer added, too, that "the performance was by no means ideal."

Several extra symphonic programs enlivened this same week, of March 8-15. The one regular orchestral concert was led by Felix Weingartner in the London Symphony Orchestra's series. The Telegraph was particularly impressed with the conductor's reading of the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique: "He never overstressed a point—the climaxes, however sonorous, retained a musical quality; the orchestra never descended to the level of a brass band. And the result of this fine sense of measure and proportion was that a weak phrase, or a commonplace, passed almost unnoticed." The Observer writer recorded "a happy evening, but not one which will provide a loving memory for our old age." The soundness of the interpretations seemed most worthy of notice to the press.

Women's Orchestra Concert

At the third appearance of the British Women's Orchestra the critics agreed that a great improvement in tone and unanimity were evident. "We could with honesty say that the playing was admirable, and leave it there without qualification," notes the Telegraph commentator. The Sunday Times spoke of a "marked improvement." Only some still-remaining uncertainty on the part of Gwynne Kimpton, conductor, was noticed.

At another of these extra symphonic events Mr. Maurice Besly took charge, and, according to the consensus of the critics, "showed himself a director of sound tastes and high technical ability," in the words of the Sunday Times writer.

The last concert was in the nature of a "farewell" for Miss Phyllis Lett, who is on the point of departing for a lengthy tour in Australia. The orchestra was that of the Royal Albert Hall, and Sir Landon Ronald conducted.

His reappearance, noted the Sunday Times writer, "made one wish that he more often exercised the function for which he is signally endowed." The Telegraph's summary of Miss Lett's accomplishment was: "In its suavity and unaffectedness she gave a great deal of quiet enjoyment, even if she rarely rose to any great heights of interpretation. But strong and broadly-designed phrasing is not one of the singer's strong points, while it was

(Continued on page 25)

RAYMOND HAVENS Pianist
Solist with BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 8 performances
Soloist with CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 2 performances
Soloist with MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 3 performances
For Dates and Terms Address:
EVELYN LIGHT, Sec. 87 Pinckney St., Boston, Mass.

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON 1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

ABBY MORRISON
SOPRANO SAN CARLO GRAND OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: H. J. ANDERSEN, 67 East 55th Street, New York City
Telephone Plaza 7147

Ethyl HAYDEN
Lyric Soprano
Management: Loudon Charlton—Carnegie Hall, New York

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

Albert Wolff Conducts Again

Retired Opera-Comique Director Returns to Lead Pasdeloup Concert; Modern Music in Paris.

Paris.

The return of Albert Wolff to the Parisian musical world during the second week of March was unexpected. When this conductor abandoned some months ago his baton at the Opera-Comique and the operatic venture which was to have taken place at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees reports had it that his leave taking was definite and that Paris would for ever more be deprived of his artistic services. His many admirers were thrown into a flurry upon learning that M. Wolff had weakened in his resolution and had consented to conduct a week-end pair of concerts of the Pasdeloup Orchestra.

On both occasions the Theatre du Mogador, in which the Pasdeloup concerts take place, was filled to capacity. His reading of the Beethoven First was beautiful. He does not seek in it the emotional wealth found in subsequent pages of Beethoven, but reads it as a score of refinement, grace, delicacy, good humor and refreshing youthfulness. The performance itself was polished and finished. The Introduction and Cortege from Le Coq d'Or of Rimsky-Korsakoff were played with such fire and gorgeous array of color they had to be repeated. The two soloists with M. Wolff—Mme. Caponsacchi, violoncellist, heard in the Schumann Concerto, and Mme. Nielka, soprano, heard in songs of Louis Aubert, Amedei and Bachelet—did not distinguish themselves.

Sings Modern Music

Marcelle Gerar is a soprano who seems to love all music provided it is new. At least she gives this impression, for one never hears of her singing anything else. The program Mlle. Gerar proffered at the Salle Pleyel last Monday evening was devoted to "first auditions" and to re-hearings of other and little known modern compositions. The list of composers comprised Alice Sauvrezis, Albert Roussel, Maurice Ravel, Roland-Manuel, Andre Caplet, Arthur Honegger, Jean Hure, Georges Migot and Joseph Strimer. The assisting artists were the Redele String Quartet (four young ladies from Belgium), Mme. Marcelle Blanquart, harpist; M. Gaston Blanquart, flutist; M. Jean Hure, organist, and M. Joseph Strimer, pianist.

Of the three first auditions, Three Songs for Voice and Four Stringed Instruments, on poems of Andre Spire, of Georges Migot, made the deepest impression. This is Migot's latest effort to find a new path, not that his is the first attempt that has been made to write for the voice and string quartet, but it is perhaps the first time that that combination has been treated "polyplanarilly." Migot has skillfully assigned to the voice and each of the instruments a "melodic line" distinctly different in color and personality from the others, all combining to create a sonorous atmosphere of exotic beauty and charm. Jean Hure's San Marco for voice and organ is based on a poem of Bergeron. This composition is ecclesiastically austere, profoundly devout in manner. It did not make an instantaneous appeal. M. Joseph Strimer's Pan et Psyche, for voice, string quartet, flute and piano, is based on a poem of Ivanoff. The means employed in this composition resembles that employed by M. Migot, but the effect is less happy. M. Strimer's is cerebral music at the expense of the heart and the ear. His scoring gives the impression of unsteadiness.

M. Reinhold Warlich's song recital on March 14 at the American Women's Club brought home to a large gathering a realization of what song interpretation is. He sang a group of Elizabethan love songs, five Scottish Ballads, the Schumann Dichterliebe and three dramatic ballads of Carl Loewe.

Societe Nationale Features Novelties

The Societe Nationale de Musique is an organization the end and aim of which are the presentation of new music. The concert given by the society the other evening brought out the following compositions: Quartet in C minor, for violin, viola, cello and piano, of Marcelle Soulage; El Poema de una Sanluquena, for violin and piano, of Turina; Six Sonnets de Michel-Ange, for voice and piano, of Jeanne Leleu; Fantaisie Rhapsodique, for cello and piano, of J. Jongen; Quintette Pastoral, for wind instruments, of L. Rohozinski; O de Repos d'Amour, for voice and piano, of Roland-Manuel; Ecoute, mon Coeur, and Du Printemps, for voice and piano, of Andre Caplet. All of these pieces were effective in their way and brought home the truth that in modern music the spirit of "seeking" is livelier than ever.

The concert which took place at the Theatre du Vieux-Colombier on Saturday afternoon gave pleasure to a large gathering. Goossens' Suite for flute, violin and harp was played by Mme. Siohan, Mlle. Laskine and M. Le Roy with freshness and a goodly wealth of expression. The Quartet for flute, violin, clarinet and harp, of Georges Migot, was played by Mme. Siohan, Mlle. Laskine, M. Le Roy and M. Hamelin. This reading was colorful, fluent and beautifully proportioned in point of nuances. Mme. de Gonith, soprano, interpreted songs of Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky, Taneiff and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

IRVING SCHWERKE.

MME. ANTONINA NEJDANOVA
Russian Coloratura Soprano Who Sang in the Performance of Moussorgsky's Fair of Sorotchinski at the Opera in Moscow.

Publish Tschaikowsky's Diaries

Petrograd.—The music director of the State Publishing House of Soviet Russia has published the diaries of Tschaikowsky dating from 1873 to 1891. They are written telegraphically, with simple words, names and signs jotted down. The first of the eleven diaries deals with the Russian composer's visit to the United States in 1891, and the others discuss many subjects, including Tolstoi's views of music, Tschaikowsky's adoration of Mozart and his tempered approval of Beethoven.

Truck Smashes Guarnerius Cello

London.—A Guarnerius cello, said to be one of the three of its kind in the world, and which was made in 1730, was completely smashed at a railway station here on March 21 by a truck containing bullion bars of silver. The instrument, which was valued at $2,000, was the property of Mischel Cherniavsky. The owner, who had just arrived from America, placed the cello, which was in a bag, against the wall while looking after other luggage. The truck backed into the instrument and destroyed it.

Furtwaengler Returns to Berlin

Berlin.—Wilhelm Furtwaengler was warmly welcomed on his return here after his visit to America. In his first concert with the Berlin Philharmonic he conducted Schumann's D minor Symphony, Georg Schumann's Variations on the Harmonious Blacksmith, Tschaikowsky's B flat minor Piano Concerto with Mitja Nikisch as soloist, and the Tannhaeuser Overture.

London Hears Special Orchestral Programs

(Continued from page 24)

evident also that a few notes in her voice have not yet been brought into strict conformity with their neighbors. Nor could Miss Lett quite achieve a big climax in which the voice has to dominate the orchestra."

With the mention of the Savoy Orphean jazz band's third well-attended concert here, the record of the week's concert events closes. At this affair a new piece of music especially composed for jazz instrumentation was given a premiere, but excited no great enthusiasm. The composer called himself M. N. Labrige, which, it is thought, is the pseudonym of a well-known English musician.

Luisa Tetrazzini Broadcasts

One of the best-known names so far inscribed on a broadcast program in England is that of Mme. Luisa Tetrazzini, who was so fortunate, on March 10, as to sing for the wireless under atmospheric and technical conditions which have everywhere been called perfect.

Up to four million people (according to some estimates) heard a concert which had been widely advertised and much anticipated, with none of the handicaps which have marred other great radio events.

Other artists popular with English concertgoers shared the evening with the soprano: the violinist, Isolde Menges; the contralto, Phyllis Lett; the pianist, Frederic Lamond, Dinh Gilly, and the Kedroff Vocal Quartet. Several reviewers noted that the program was purely musical and unmarred by discordant interpolations of comedy sketches, monologues, etc., which have hitherto seemed the inevitable accompaniment to even the most serious radio recitals.

P. L.

American in French Opera Debut

Paris.—An American contralto, Harriet Maconnell, made her French operatic debut on March 5 in the title role of Massenet's Herodiade at the Municipal Theatre of Turcoing. Mlle. Lalande (Salome), M. Granal (Jean) and M. Carbelly (Herode) were also in the cast, and M. Brisard conducted. It is said that Miss Maconnell will shortly appear with the Opera-Comique.

Costanzi Gives Trovatore

Rome.—The tenor Crimi and the soprano Poli-Randaccio stood out in the performance of Trovatore at the Costanzi Theatre on March 7. Edouard Vitale conducted, and other members of the cast were the baritone Molinari, Signora Gramegna (Azucena), the basso Belli, and Signora Porter.

Schneevoight Conducts in Paris

Paris.—Georg Schneevoight visited Paris during the first week of March to conduct two concerts of the Pasdeloup Orchestra. His program included Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, Strauss' Don Juan and Wagner's Tannhaeuser Overture.

Anton BILOTTI Pianist
Management: Lionel Powell & Holt, London, England
Steinway Piano Welte-Mignon Records Exclusively

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1921
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

LALLA THOMASON, pianist and artist pupil of Edwin Hughes, has appeared recently with much success before the Texas Club at the Plaza Hotel, at the Studio Club, and before the Women's Philharmonic Society.

During the four day convention of the Michigan Federation of Music Clubs, which closed on March 19, special emphasis was laid on music in the schools.

Monday was junior day and the members of the federated junior clubs were treated to luncheon and a children's concert by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. John W. Beattie, State supervisor of music, spoke Tuesday on music in the public schools. In the evening the annual club concert was given. Music in the Industries was the subject of a talk given the next day by William W. Norton, Flint community music director. An organ recital was given in the afternoon by Palmer Christian, and a concert by local artists. Several demonstration classes were given. The last day of the convention was devoted to the National Young Artists' contest.

William Stickles, New York voice teacher, will conduct a special six weeks' course of instruction for teachers of singing at his New York studio this summer.

Immediately following his two appearances in London, Beryl Rubinstein will return to Cleveland to conduct his summer classes at the Cleveland Institute of Music. On June 5 Mr. Rubinstein will appear as soloist at Queen's Hall, with Nikolai Sokoloff conducting the London Symphony Orchestra, and three days later will give a piano recital at London's Aeolian Hall.

Marcel Grandjany, the French harpist, has returned to France to resume his summer classes at the Fontainebleau School. He will return to the United States in November for his third American tour, which will take him across country to the Pacific Coast.

Plans for the summer session of the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester have been completed by Arthur M. See, secretary-manager of the school, who is director of its summer sessions. In great measure the summer faculty is the regular faculty of the school and the teachers of degree and certificate courses in majority remain to teach in the summer term.

The vocal faculty of the school this summer session will contribute its entire personnel to the teaching corps, Adelin Fermin and T. Austin-Ball both teaching this summer, and Frederick H. Haywood of New York joining the faculty for special private teaching in connection with his class work in the Public School Music courses. The piano faculty is a large one. Raymond Wilson conducts his course in methods for piano teachers and Max Landow his repertory course, as in the two previous summer sessions of the school. Pierre Augieras will this summer remain at work for the first time since joining the piano faculty of the Eastman school.

The organ department will retain its full faculty and the courses for Motion Picture Organists will as in the past constitute an important department of work in the summer session. Harold Gleason and Warren Gehrken will conduct the organ work; Robert Berensten and Harold Smith the courses for Motion Picture Organists.

All the departments of the Eastman School will be in session, including those of Orchestral Instruments.

Particular attention has been paid by Mr. See to arranging a schedule of courses for public school teachers of music that offers opportunities for intensive study of all branches of musical work required under present day school conditions. The public school music of Rochester is rated as in the van of that offered by American cities. The faculty of the Eastman School includes, by permission of the Rochester Board of Education, Charles H. Miller, director of music in the public schools; Sherman Clute, director of instrumental music in the Rochester schools, and David E. Mattern, teacher of school orchestras and instrumental classes in those schools.

Mr. Miller will offer the courses in Methods, Mr. Clute will conduct classes in woodwind and brass instruments and a class in organization of school ensembles, Mr. Mattern will conduct classes in stringed instruments, and Mr. Clute and Mr. Mattern will conduct a class in orchestra conducting. Particular advantage accrues from the fact that public school pupils of Rochester are available as classes affording the student of the summer session to gain experience in anist, will again conduct his summer master classes in Boulder, Colo., commencing the end of July.

Photo by Elzin

FRANTZ PROSCHOWSKY

New York Voice Teacher Who Addressed the Recent Convention of the Eastern Music Supervisors at New Haven, Conn.

teaching under supervision of an experienced instructor in the various departments of public school music.

Frederick Haywood will conduct courses in which methods of teaching vocal music to classes will be comprehensively covered; he will also offer private instruction to supervissors of music and teachers of vocal music.

Hazel Kinscella will conduct a two weeks' normal institute in which three classes will study the beginning and advanced work of her method in the teaching of piano to classes of children.

Appreciation of Music is given special place in the scheme of the work offered to teachers. Louis Mohler, of the Teachers' College of Columbia University, one of the experts in presenting Appreciation of Music, will conduct this course for two weeks. He will be succeeded by Grace Barr, formerly of Iowa State Normal School, and at present one of Victor Record Company's experts, who will continue the course for three weeks.

Harmony will be offered by George Barlow Penny of the Eastman School, who will also offer a course in Appreciation of Music which will be of general character.

E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, will again conduct his summer master classes in Boulder, Colo., commencing the end of July.

The Illinois State Teachers' Association held their forty-first annual meeting in Bloomington, Ill., on March 19, 20 and 21. The three days were marked by many recitals and by discussions of music in the schools and other pertinent subjects.

The Bloomington High School Band, conducted by E. M. Gould, and the Grade School Orchestra, conducted by Frances Kessler, played, and concerts were given by Harry F. Admire, A. L. Lovejoy, the string trio of Bloomington High School, and Mrs. Lela Mayer Long.

Pupils of William Fichandler, New York pianist, will be heard in recital at Chickering Hall, New York, on the afternoon of April 5.

The birthdays of Alexander Guilmant, the first honorary president of the Guilmant Organ School, and Joseph Bonnet, who recently accepted the presidency after the passing of Dubois, occurred in March.

Dr. William C. Carl arranged a celebration on March 18 in honor of these artists who have been so prominent in the life and success of the Guilmant School. In his address to the students Dr. Carl paid tributes to the life and work of both Guilmant and Bonnet. Several of the students participated in the program.

Several of Estelle Liebling's pupils are engaged for operatic roles. Devora Nadworney, contralto, will sing Bertha in The Barber of Seville in Washington on April 13 with Feodor Chaliapin. The Municipal Opera Company of Atlanta, which is to present light opera for six weeks, beginning June 15, has engaged Ann Yago, contralto; Louise Wright, soprano, and Charles Schenck, baritone. Paul Eisler is to conduct these operas. Gene Armstrong, soprano, sang the Priestess in Aida at the Manhattan Opera House twice last week.

Marie Bencheley, vocal teacher, of Minneapolis, has been forced to discontinue her teaching activities for a few weeks because of a breakdown caused by overwork. She plans to resume her teaching shortly.

Fraser Gange and Amy Evans (Mrs. Fraser Gange) gave the third concert in the annual series of Artists' Recitals at the David Mannes Music School on Wednesday evening, March 11. Mr. Gange and Miss Evans sang a duet by Mozart and concluded with one by Messager.

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
16—Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

V. TREVISAN Chicago Civic Opera Association
VOCAL STUDIO 74 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

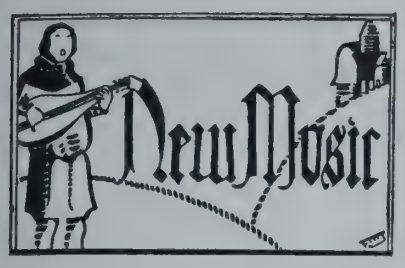
ARTHUR J. HUBBARD — VINCENT V. HUBBARD
Teachers of Singing in All Its Branches
246 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, MASS.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephone: Circle 10117

HILDA GRACE GELLING
VOCAL STUDIO
128 West 72nd St., N. Y. City
Telephone Endicott 1587
ASSOCIATE TEACHER WITH PERCY RECTOR STEPHENS



AMONG the latest publications for the voice of G. Ricordi & Co., New York (London, Elkin & Co.), are four compositions of Arthur Benjamin, his To Phyllis, Milking Her Flock; Man and Woman; The Piper; and The Moon. The latter two are issued in only one key fitted to medium range, and the former two are published for low and high voices. To Phyllis is a charming setting of a short verse of William Drummond, with a catchy melody set above a short rhythmic figure which is repeated throughout the song.

The Moon is tender, tranquil music with an accompaniment of unhackneyed harmonic color, and The Piper gives the piano accompaniment a swift flowing part of flute-like character. Elkin publishes this song also in an arrangement for piano, flute and voice. Man and Woman is a piece whose declamatory voice part fits the solemnity of its context.

From Elkin & Co., London, comes also a piano piece of moderate difficulty, the Phantom Minuet. It is a light opus, sprightly and dancing in spirit, with simple melodiousness and attractive rhythm.

Buzzi-Peccia, the New York vocal teacher and composer, has just written a new Spanish song, La Savilliana. It was composed expressly for the use of Amelita Galli-Curci in her concert repertory. It will be published shortly by Carl Fischer, New York.

Mandolin music is included in the recent publications of the Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Among the Ditson publications for this instrument are Guido Papini's Reve de Bonheur; C. W. Bennet's Sidonie, a Grecian Dance; T. H. Rollinson's The Crusader Overture; R. Gruenwald's Parade of the Dolls; R. Gruenwald's Light Brigade Overture; Charles W. Cadman's At Dawning; Gruenwald's Abila; C. W. Bennet's The Blue Jackets; James Bland's Carry Me Back to Old Virginny; T. H. Rollinson's By Moonlight; selections from Gounod's Faust; C. W. Bennet's The Ivy and the Rose, and T. H. Rollinson's One Flag for All, a march.

The editor of all these pieces is H. F. Odell. They are arranged as parts of an ensemble and rather require accompaniment.

The English version of the text of Igor Stravinsky's Histoire du Soldat is published by J. & W. Chester, London. The translation from the text of C. F. Ramuz is the work of Rosa Newmarch. The new version is in two parts, as is the original.

The title of the booklet is The Soldier's Tale, to be read, played and danced. Usually this music of Stravinsky is heard without the reading and dancing, and it is no wonder then that it is in many parts incomprehensible. The Newmarch translation appears to be necessary to the auditor who would like to hear the Histoire without an important part of its context missing.

A volume of anthems for Lent and Easter is one of the recent issues for chorus of the H. W. Gray Company, American agents of Novello & Co., London. The volume includes Fierce Was the Wild Billow, by M. Andrews; Mary Came Beside the Tomb, by William Benbow; Alleluia, by Handl-Dickinson; Christ the Lord, by Schrek-Dickinson; Lord Is Risen, by C. Dickinson; Star of the Coming Day, by H. M. Gilbert; Beyond the Starry Skies, by H. M. Gilbert; All Ye Whom Sorrow, by R. Kountz; Thine, O Lord, by P. C. Lutkin; Lo, the Dawn! by H. Mackinnon; Come Ye Disconsolate, by E. K. Macrum, and Day of Resurrection, by William Y. Webbe.

The Scholastic Series of G. Schirmer, New York, has several added numbers. Among the new members of this always growing pedagogical family is Mathilde Bilbro's volume, Pretty Finger Studies, for the young pianist.

The author of these studies says concerning her purposes, "The object of this book is to develop in the early grades strength and independence in the fingers, and to promote accurate fingering through the medium of simple technical exercises which are not too dry and unmelodious to be interesting.

"To gain a technical point, a good bit of repetition is necessary, but this repetition in one key grows tiresome—hence a number of these studies are repeated in several keys, so that the interest of the pupil may not flag before the lesson point is gained."

The studies vary in length from a few measures to a page and are carefully graded and edited. The work is an important addition to the repertory of the piano teacher who has to deal with beginners.

Anton J. Benjamin, publishers of Leipzig and Hamburg, have issued a composition by Krohn, his Erlosung, for soloists, chorus, and orchestra. Piano arrangements of the work are being prepared, and will soon be published.

SAMUEL GARDNER

American Violinist Who Was Soloist With the New York Philharmonic Orchestra Last Week in the Performance of His Own Concerto.

Festival Association Meets

Boston, March 20.—A meeting for the permanent organization of the New England Musical Festival Association was held in this city on Saturday. The meeting considered the problem of bringing together into one organization the various non-professional music societies in New England in the hope of stimulating friendly competition and more frequent music festivals. Those interested in its formation are co-operating in plans for a band and orchestra conclave in Boston on May 8 and 9 as a part of the civic music festival during Music Week, in which every professional band and orchestra in New England will be invited to participate.

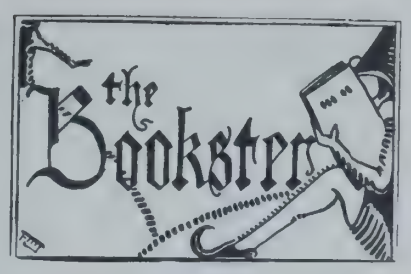
Ring Cycle Closes

Wagner's Ring cycle was brought to a close at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on March 19, with the third performance this season of Goetterdaemmerung. Rudolph Laubenthal substituted for Curt Taucher as Siegfried. According to the Post, Mr. Laubenthal gave "a very smooth and pleasing vocal performance."

Lawrence Gilman (Herald Tribune) commended the "youthful zest and vigor" of his Siegfried. Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail found him "good to look upon" and W. J. Henderson of the Sun said that he "achieved an artistic delineation." Otherwise the cast was familiar, and Mr. Bodanzky conducted.

Discovers Aged Score

Cambridge, Mass.—A music score dating back to the year 1550 has been discovered here by M. L. Stout, a student at Harvard. While doing research work in the Widener Library of the university, Stout noticed odd markings on the vellum cover of an original edition of Elizabethan plays. Closer scrutiny disclosed a crude score with Latin words, and Stout obtained permission to have the cover removed and examined by experts. The music is for a chant sung in connection with the Easter mass in the Catholic Church. It is written on a staff of four lines, and there is no division of measures. Dots are used to indicate the notes.



THERE is a class of music lovers who believe that to analyze a symphony is to dissect it, to tear it to pieces, to destroy its homogeneity and beauty. There is another class which believes that to analyze a symphony is to see it and hear its beauties more clearly. The latter group is not dismayed that a masterpiece of music is made up of chord progressions, rhythmic figures, orchestral color any more than a doctor that his best beloved is made up of flesh and blood and physical functions.

It is for musicians of the latter group—and some uncompromising persons may insist that such are the only real musicians—that BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES DESCRIBED AND ANALYZED, by Edwin Evans (published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York) is intended.

The nine symphonies are treated in two volumes, the first including five of these works, the second consisting of the analyses of the Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth.

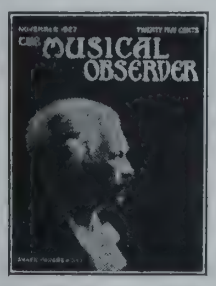
In the case of each of the symphonies Mr. Evans presents in concise form facts about the keys of the various movements, the dedication, the date of composition, and the like. Also for each movement he has compiled a table in which measure for measure he traces the composer's thematic material and its use, outlining definitely the various parts in the general pattern of the movement.

In the extensive discussion of the fabric of the symphonies Mr. Evans goes into his analysis in more detail than in the table, noting facts of orchestration and of transformation of material from one point to another, referring, where fitting, to certain details of composition in relation to programmatic intention on the part of the composer, and generally illuminating Beethoven's plans and achievements. The two volumes of course include hundreds of musical quotations from the symphony always reduced to two staves, although not within the easy compass of the single pianist.

As a book of reference, as a text in symphonic analysis, as reading matter for the lover of Beethoven's symphonies, Mr. Evans' work is interesting and informative. One may express the fear that the completeness of Beethoven's Symphonies Described and Anaylzed may attract the music student to Mr. Evans' pages when he might well be looking into Beethoven's. That will be the fault of the student, for the author often refers him to the scores themselves.

Pasadena Eisteddfod in May

Pasadena, March 19. — Pasadena's first Eisteddfod will be held during the week of May 4 to 9.



This Coupon Is Worth 25c

LET'S GET ACQUAINTED!

If you are interested in a Music Magazine full of good, practical, interesting, novel reading matter and carefully selected musical compositions, mail this coupon with 25 cents and let us send you two issues of the MUSICAL OBSERVER.

THE MUSICAL OBSERVER CO.

62 COOPER SQUARE, N. Y. CITY

NAME .....ADDRESS .....

CITY .....STATE .....

"Music & Letters"

FOUNDED 1920

The British Musical Quarterly

100 pages: 20s per annum post free to any part of the world

"Music and Letters is the best thing of its kind that is published, and forms a valuable addition to the library."—Musical Standard, August 23rd, 1924.

LONDON: 22, ESSEX STREET, W. C. 2

This is the first picture of Fritz Peter Pentzold, with his mother, Mme. Sigrid Onegin Pentzold, and his father, Dr. F. Pentzold. Fritz Peter was the reason for Mme. Onegin's cancellation of her American concert tour this season, but she will return for her third American tour next season under the direction of Concert Management Arthur Judson.

Cortot Plays With Two Orchestras

Alfred Cortot appeared in New York as soloist with two orchestras last week. He played Franck's Symphonic Variations and Germaine Tailleferre's Piano Concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, in Carnegie Hall last Tuesday evening; and Beethoven's E flat Concerto with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, under the baton of Willem Mengelberg, the Sunday before.

According to Olin Downes of the Times, Mr. Cortot in the Franck composition "gave the music a larger utterance and a bigger line than perhaps it inherently requires, and the effect was for the moment almost gigantic . . . it was a performance of magnificent authority, grasp and color, by a virtuoso whose technical resources it would be ridiculous to discuss." Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) thought the work played with "penetrating appreciation, and in the last pages with a dazzling buoyancy." In the opinion of Deems Taylor of the World, Mr. Cortot played "with all his wonted pungency and exhilarating vitality." Other reviewers wrote in the same vein.

The work by Mlle. Tailleferre (who formerly was a member of the famous Les Six in Paris) was, to Lawrence Gilman of the Herald Tribune, "a delightful piece of music . . . a riant and charming work" written with "an exhilarating buoyancy." He thought that the pianist played it "with superlative skill and verve." Mr. Sanborn wrote that "it is unashamedly melodious, and it is also youthful, gusty and with a pleasantly acrid edge to its sweet tunefulness." It was referred to by W. J. Henderson in the Sun as "infantile babbling" and Deems Taylor thought it disappointing.

The Post reviewer commented that Mr. Stokowski brought out "with keen understanding and warm sympathy" the "varied beauties of form and color" of the Chausson B flat Symphony. This writer also thought that Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture gave conductor and orchestra "opportunities for glittering but legitimate display." Mr. Sanborn asserted that the conductor "led a performance of Chausson's Symphony which in musical splendor, searching eloquence and spiritual exaltation futilizes comparison." The other number was Albeniz's Fete Dieu a Seville from Iberia. According to Mr. Downes, "the performances, in turn, were of superlative merit."

* * *

At the Philharmonic concert, Mr. Mengelberg conducted Niels Gade's Ossian Overture, which has not been heard here recently, Strauss' Don Quixote, and the Beethoven Emperor Concerto. Both Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail and the writer in the Post suggested that the Ossian Overture should be heard more frequently. Mr. Peyser thought it "agreeable, mellifluous music" and the Post chronicler found it a "delightful work."

In the Times, Mr. Cortot was referred to as "an ideal interpreter" of Beethoven, and the Sun commentator mentioned that the pianist "finds himself in rare accord with the spirit of Beethoven. . . . Mr. Cortot gave a memorable performance." This writer further wrote that "there was breadth of style combined with fine dynamic adjustment made plain by exquisite finesse of tone and color."

The Post considered it a performance "of the most exquisite and thrilling beauty, fully appreciated by a packed house" and added that Mr. Mengelberg gave "an inspired reading of the score." Mr. Peyser thought the Concerto played "gloriously, with inspiring breadth and splendid clarity of melodic enunciation."

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
Richard Dix in
"Men and Women"
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
"SCHOOL FOR WIVES"
With SIGRID HOLMQUIST
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
"THE WAY OF A GIRL"
With ELEANOR BOARDMAN and MATT MOORE
A Metro-Goldwyn Picture
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps

Lines o' News AND Chatter

"Why I Do, and Why I Don't" might well be the topics for City Chamberlain Berolzheimer to select in his first lectures to music pupils in the preparatory classes of the proposed New York Civic Music and Art Center.

* * *

Charlie Hackett has again started commuting across the Atlantic. That active American tenor will be singing before long in Spain and elsewhere on the European continent—following his vigorous Chicago Opera season.

* * *

A cablegram from Jack Salter to his partner, Lawrence Evans, announces the safe arrival in Australia of Mme. Amelita Galli-Curci, Homer Samuels, and the aforementioned Jack Salter. Now for the plaudits and the shekels.

* * *

Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, of Ampico and Common Sense Music fame, ought to introduce into his lectures the song: A Wandering Minstrel I. Sig is becoming a veritable globe trotter.

* * *

Influenza seized Dennis McSweeney last week, and for a few days the personal representative of John McCormack was seriously ill.

* * *

Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander entertained in her New York home, Fifteen East Thirty-sixth street, last Friday evening in honor of Willem Mengelberg, conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

* * *

Earle Lewis revealed his momentary bent of mind one day last week by absent-mindedly handing a Metropolitan Opera ticket purchaser a brand new golf ball, mistaking it for coin of the realm.

* * *

When Mrs. Edgar Stillman Kelley is elected president of the National Federation of Music Clubs next June at the biennial in Portland, Ore. (as there seems every likelihood she will) that organization may be counted upon to carry still farther along the fairway, the organization which has made noteworthy progress under the leadership of Mrs. John F. Lyons.

* * *

A fetching Marguerite in next Wednesday's performance of Faust, at the New York Metropolitan, should be petite Marie Sundelius.

* * *

Mme. Cobina Wright, the soprano, is back from Palm Beach where her appearance in song recital seems to have been attended with conspicuous recognition.

* * *

The Amherst twins, one might term them: Messrs. Beckhard and MacFarlane, the young New York managers. Both are graduates of the Massachusetts college, and they are the impresarios, incidentally, of the concert course given there each year.

* * *

A good-bye that is not to be an au revoir, is the way Vladimir de Pachmann's next New York recital is being advertised.

* * *

Sigrid Onegin writes that she will let nothing interfere with her planned season of concerts in this country during 1925-26. Since her time is nearly all filled such assurance should be welcome news.

* * *

She is a devoted daughter as well as a conscientious singer, May Peterson. That is why the soprano has been spending most of her recent days in New York, because of the illness of Miss Peterson's mother.

* * *

Seen lunching a few days ago in New York's Brown's Chop House were Louis Eckstein, monarch of opera at Chicago's Ravinia Park, and Ned Ziegler, the Metropolitan's executive officer.

* * *

Seen about recently in New York's society circles, and frequently, was George Gershwin, the popular-music composer with the real talent for bigger things.

* * *

Watch out, pretty soon, for an announcement from Manager Charlie Wagner. He's getting ready to do something different, which now and again is Charlie's way.

* * *

It looks as though Fortune Gallo's plans for next season's Alglala performances would work out nicely—thanks also to the co-operation of the member clubs of the National Federation.

* * *

The series of articles running in the New York Graphic purporting to be "exposes" of the Metropolitan's opposition to things American appears to be exposing nothing so plainly as the reporter's misinformation, miscalculation, and misfit as a writer of English that reads well.

* * *

Antonio Scotti's annual Bicchierata for the newspaper boys was held last Saturday night somewhere in the tortuous alleys of Greenwich Village. In the course of the festivities it was announced that the youthful Tony has developed his talent so far that the Metropolitan is thinking of casting him as Yniold in Pelleas et Melisande next season. Mr. Gatti, who was present, led the cheers which this announcement called forth, and Billy Guard seized the occasion to drink a toast for every one of Tony's years in grand opera.

* * *

Herma Menth is mourning the death of her father, Peter Menth, who died early this month at the age of eighty-four in Kritzendorf, Austria. Herr Menth carried on the tradition of Hans Sachs in his native town, for he was a bootmaker famous for his songs and verses. He was buried in a medieval costume similar to that which Wagner's Meistersinger hero wore, and over his grave a funeral oration was delivered by a former Austrian Minister of War, Baron von Auffenberg-Komarow.

* * *

At the final concert in Aeolian Hall March 21 of the children's series given by the Philharmonic Society, Ernest Schelling awarded six prizes for the best notebooks kept by his young listeners during the concerts. Twenty-two others received honorable mention.

The winners were Maddie Aldrich, Joan Blair, Lloyd Symington, Margaret Lindner, Clara Sauerbaum, and Martha Walters. Mr. Schelling will again conduct these concerts next season.

* * *

Armand Tokatyan sang in Russian for the first time at a recent opera concert together with Thalia Sabanieva. Those who know Armand's singing know that his diction must have been perfect.

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

One Night in Berlin
See Page 5

VOL. VII. NO. 25 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, APRIL 7, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

Sophie Braslau, American contralto, who has had a Coast to Coast concert tour this season, will give her only New York recital in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening. She will be soloist Saturday evening in the performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion by the Schola Cantorum and the Philharmonic Society under Willem Mengelberg.

Bulletins of News

Omaha, April 3.—Mme. Bernice de Pasquali, soprano, for several years a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, died here today of pneumonia. She was touring on the Orpheum vaudeville circuit when taken ill.

Before her marriage to Count Salvatore de Pasquali, she was Miss Bernice James of Boston. Mme. de Pasquali's musical education was received in this country. Her operatic debut was made in Milan as Marguerite in Faust.

Harry Harkness Flagler, president of the Symphony Society of New York, has announced a reduction in prices of admission to the concerts of the orchestra next season.

The subscription rates for the twenty Sunday concerts in the new Mecca Auditorium next season will be lower than those for the sixteen Aeolian Hall concerts in the same series this season. Single sale prices will be as follows: 662 balcony seats at thirty-five cents; 519 balcony seats at fifty cents; 608 dress circle seats at seventy-five cents; 565 dress circle seats at $1; 150 dress circle seats at $1.50; 900 parquet seats at $1.50.

The twenty concerts will be given in two series on alternate Sundays. Subscribers will receive a ten per cent reduction for subscription to one series, twenty per cent for subscription to both series.

The Thursday afternoon and Friday evening concerts will range in price from twenty-five cents to $2.50. The subscription rate for twelve concerts in either series will be from $3 to $20.

Many members of the Metropolitan Opera Company attended the funeral services held April 2 for Edward Siedle, late technical director of the opera. Services were held in the Grand Lodge Room of the Masonic Temple, New York, with the Very Rev. Oscar I. R. Treder officiating. Interment was at Woodlawn Cemetery.

The rumor that Richard Hageman had been engaged as conductor and artistic director of the Los Angeles Grand Opera Association has been confirmed by Mr. Hageman. He has conducted in the past with the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Chicago Civic Opera, and the Royal Opera House in Amsterdam, Holland.

It has been learned that the "Stephen Randolph" who recently won the five hundred dollar prize in the Ninth Biennial Prize Competition for American composers offered by the Harmony Club of Fort Worth, Texas, in honor of Mrs. John F. Lyons, national president, is in reality Edgar Stillman Kelley. The prize Symphonic Poem will be performed at the Portland Biennial.

Otto Klemperer to Be Guest Leader of N. Y. Symphony

OTTO KLEMPERER, German conductor, will come to the United States next year as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Society, according to an announcement of Harry Harkness Flagler, president of the Symphony Society. Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Klemperer will virtually divide the season between them, the former conducting during the first half, the latter the second.

At present Mr. Klemperer is conducting regularly at Wiesbaden, although he spends part of the year traveling as guest conductor in Central and Southern Europe.

The German conductor was born in Breslau, the birthplace also of Walter Damrosch. He is forty years old, having been born in the same year in which Mr. Damrosch made his debut as conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra. In 1907 Mahler obtained for him his first major appointment in the German Opera House in Prague.

No mention was made in Mr. Flagler's announcement of Bruno Walter, who this season was guest conductor with the Symphony Society for a number of weeks.

Music Supervisors in National Conference

Gather for Five Day Meeting in Kansas City.

Kansas City, Mo., April 3.—The Music Supervisors' National Conference brings its five day session to a close here tonight with the mid-West high school band and orchestra contest.

The morning will be occupied with unfinished business, reports of various committees, and an address by H. Augustine Smith on Religious Music in a Democracy. In the afternoon, the contest in mixed choruses, girls' glee clubs, and boys' glee clubs of mid-Western high schools will be held.

The first day of the convention was devoted to a study of music in the high schools. At the first general session of the conference the speakers were Mrs. Francis E. Clark, William Breach, and Dean Sweigler of Kansas University. An informal banquet completed the day.

Following demonstrations Tuesday morning in the first seven grades of the elementary schools, a concert was given by 4,000 children, conducted by Mabelle Glenn. The orchestra participating was from the Horner Institute of Fine Arts. In the evening the contesting groups in the Kansas City high schools in mixed choruses, boys' glee clubs, girls' glee clubs, and sight singing were directed by Mrs. Effie Hedges, Marie Whitney, Harry Seitz, and Frank Chaffee.

Music appreciation in the lower grades formed the subject of discussion on Wednesday. The fourth of the series of Childrens' Concerts was given by the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra, N. de Rubertis conducting.

Yesterday demonstration classes and discussions were held by the instrumental, piano, junior high school, and rural sections.

Jean de Reszke Is Dead in Nice at the Age of Seventy-five Operatic Tenor Succumbs to Heart Attack After Illness of Week.

TAUGHT UNTIL THE END

Nice, April 3.—Jean de Reszke, famous operatic tenor and teacher, died in his villa here at 4 o'clock this afternoon at the age of seventy-five. His death was due to heart disease, resulting from an attack of bronchial influenza.

At his bedside were his wife, his niece, and one of his last pupils. For twelve hours before the end came he was unconscious. It is thought that the burial will be held in Paris. For several years the singer had made a specialty of training American pupils at his Conservatoire here.

Jean de Reszke, or Jan Meczislaw Reschi, was born on January 14 in Warsaw, Poland, the son of a controller of the Russian railways. Instructed as a child by his mother, he first sang soprano solos in the Cathedral of Warsaw. After studying law for a time, he turned to the operatic stage and made his debut in Venice. In 1874 he sang the baritone role of Alfonso in Favorita in London, and his Paris debut was in Forza del Destino in 1876, where he first used the French spelling of his name.

About this time he began to listen to his brother Edouardo's advice, and retired from the stage to study with Sibriglia and cultivate his real voice, a low tenor. In Madrid in 1879 he made his debut as a tenor in Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable. He was later engaged by Massenet to sing in Le Cid at the Paris Opera.

From 1887 to 1890 he sang with his brother at Covent Garden in London. British critics declared Jean to be the greatest tenor since Mario. Following this the brothers came to America and, after a successful four weeks' season in Chicago, Jean made his New York debut on December 14, 1891, singing with Emma Eames in Romeo et Juliette.

He was later heard in such varied roles as John of Leyden, Faust, Raoul, Rhadames, Lohengrin, Otello, Vasco da Gama, Walther in Die Meistersinger, Tristan, and other Wagnerian roles. Acclaimed as one of the world's greatest tenors, nevertheless in 1903 he left America never to return, and, soon afterwards, retired from the stage. The fame and popularity of this tenor have been equalled by those of few singers.

After de Reszke's retirement from the operatic stage, he devoted himself to teaching at the school which he had established in Nice. One of his first pupils was the English soprano, Maggie Teyte. For some years he enjoyed prosperity, although with the war came the death of Edouard

(Continued on page 24.)

Philadelphia Chamber Series Ends

Association Plans Ten Concerts Next Year; Hofmann and Rachmaninoff Head Recitals; Flesch With Orchestra.

Philadelphia, March 31.—Ten members of the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Thaddeus Rich, took part in the eighth and last concert of the Chamber Music Association on Sunday evening in the Bellevue-Stratford ballroom. It was announced that the Association will schedule ten concerts for its next season.

Josef Hofmann and Sergei Rachmaninoff were among the recitalists of the week here. Leonora Cortez also gave a concert of piano music. Other important recent music events were the spring concert of the Choral Society, Henry Gordon directing; Maude La Charme's song recital; and the appearance of Oscar Shumsky, seven-year-old violinist.

The members of the ensemble who played at the Chamber Music Association concert were Thaddeus Rich, David Dubinsky, Romain Verney, Michael Penha, Anton Torello, W. M. Kincaid, Marcel Tabeteau, Daniel Banoade, Walter Guetter, and Anton Horner. According to Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer, "in all the music of the afternoon the players gave to the music the beauty of tone and clear phrasing which is associated with their names."

On their program were Beethoven's Quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, a Quintet by Corelli for two violins, viola, violoncello and contrabass, and a work by Dubois for two violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. Sidney L. Laciar wrote in the Public Ledger that the three numbers were "superbly" played.

* * *

Josef Hofmann gave a piano recital in the auditorium of the Curtis Institute of Music Wednesday evening. Mr. Laciar commented that Mr. Hofmann's "outstanding characteristic is perhaps his perfect rhythmic feeling, but added to this is a beauty, a power and a control of tone which is possessed to a similar degree by no other pianist now before the public."

The recital given by Rachmaninoff in the Academy of Music Sunday night was called "a musical event of outstanding interest" by the Bulletin reviewer. The pianist was, as always, heartily applauded.

A young pianist already heard as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra made her concert debut Monday. In her ambitious program she displayed, to quote Mr. Laciar, "splendid talent, combined with a fluent technique, a charming stage presence and remarkable musicianship."

The writer in the Record observed that "Miss Cortez presents the unusual and satisfying example of a beautiful talent admirably trained and developed." According to the North American reviewer, Miss Cortez exhibited "an astonishing brilliancy of style and technique." Mr. Muschamp wrote that "there is great fluency in the finger agility which she has at her command, and the tone was ample in size, but her variety of tone-colors is limited."

* * *

At the spring concert of the Choral Society in the Academy Thursday night, the soloists were Maybelle Berretta Marston, contralto, and Myrtle Eaver, pianist. To quote Mr. Muschamp, "the chorus was well balanced, and the tone was ample to express the several types of music." He found Mrs. Marston's voice "naturally pleasing" with "a nice feeling for each number," and that Miss Eaver "has a splendid technical equipment."

Mr. Laciar considered the contralto in splendid voice and that the chorus, although not perfectly balanced, had good tonal quality "and the technique of choral singing has been carefully cultivated by the director."

* * *

The recital given by the French coloratura soprano, Maude La Charme, at the Musical Art Club, consisted of French songs by Duparc, Saint-Saens, Auber, Debussy, Faure, and others. In the words of the Ledger writer, Mme. La Charme "has a voice of extremely high register and great flexibility and she sang with much emotional feeling."

* * *

"A remarkable demonstration of violin talent," according to the Inquirer, was given by Oscar Shumsky in Witherspoon Hall Friday evening. The writer in the North American stated that he played with "a remarkable grasp of his instrument, and with a force of rendition scarcely to be anticipated in a musician of his years."

Sidney Laciar found it amazing that he could play such compositions at all, and more amazing that he played them with "excellent execution, generally smooth tone and good intonation." He added that "the child undoubtedly has an enormous talent."

* * *

At the twenty-fifth anniversary concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Leopold Stokowski, which was reported in The Musical Digest last week, the soloist was Carl Flesch.

According to Mr. Laciar of the Ledger "his tone was exquisite throughout . . . and he paid great attention to the architectural structure" and the various themes were performed "with beautiful taste and in perfect balance. . . . Mr. Flesch, by his gigantic talent and splendid artistry, always charms and captivates."

Mr. Muschamp wrote that "again he was the excellent musician, to whom the violin is the medium of musical expression. The tone he draws from his instrument is pure and cool." Other reviewers praised his playing.

Schelling Ends Children's Series

Boston, April 1.—With the assistance of an orchestra recruited from the Boston Symphony, Ernest Schelling gave his concluding Children's Concert in Jordan Hall Sunday. The afternoon's instruction was devoted to the percussion instruments in an orchestra, and Mr. Schelling awarded prizes for the best notebooks kept during the course.

ALFRED CORTOT
French Pianist, Who Has Won New Laurels on His Transcontinental Tour, During Which He Has Appeared With Leading Orchestras From Coast to Coast.

Cincinnati Festival Plans

Cincinnati, March 30.—One matinee and five evening programs will be given in Musical Hall in the Twenty-sixth Biennial Cincinnati May Festival next month. The concerts will be given between May 5 and 9. Frank van der Stucken will be musical director, but Frederick Stock and Edgar Stillman Kelley will be guest leaders, each in a work of his own.

The first concert will include Elgar's Dream of Gerontius and Liszt's Psalm XIII. Margaret Matzenauer, John McCormack, and Fred Patton will be soloists with the chorus and orchestra in the former, Mr. McCormack in the latter. The feature of the second program will be the Passion of St. John, of Bach, with Ethyl Hayden, Margaret Matzenauer, and Messrs. Edward Johnson, Maitland, Beddoe, Patton, and Thuman.

Brahms' Requiem will be the main item on the third program, and after the intermission Mr. Stock will conduct his own Symphonic Variations. Florence Austral and Howard Hafford will sing. Gabriel Pierne's St. Francis of Assisi, with Miss Hayden, Nevada Van der Veer, and Messrs. Johnson, Beddoe, Maitland, Patton, and Thuman will be heard Friday.

At the Saturday matinee concert Mr. Kelley will conduct a Symphonic Poem of his own composition, Mme. Matzenauer will sing a song cycle of Klenau, and a children's chorus will sing Mortelmans' Young America. The final concert will include the third act of Tannhaeuser, the Grail Scene of Parsifal, Act I, and the quintet and finale of Die Meistersinger. Above mentioned soloists will sing.

Cortot Is Soloist on All-French Program

Sokoloff Introduces D'Indy Symphony in Cleveland; Mme. Schumann-Heink in Recital.

Cleveland, March 31.—Alfred Cortot appeared as soloist in last week's Symphony concerts, when Nikolai Sokoloff conducted an all-French program. Mr. Cortot played Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations, and the piano obbligato in d'Indy's French Mountain Song Symphony which had its first hearing here. The program included Debussy's Clouds and Festivals, and Chabrier's Gwendoline.

According to Eleanor Clarage of the Times, Mr. Cortot's playing "is richly eloquent. Every measure is expressive of rare musicianship. . . . His touch is exquisitely soft and resoundingly forceful by turn; for sheer pliancy and sense of coloring he has few equals. He has a highly ingratiating personality." James M. Rogers (Plain Dealer) called him a "master virtuoso" and "a master musician. . . . Here is a tone of astonishing brightness, power and sonority, yet modulated at will with subtlest art."

Wilson G. Smith of the Press commented on his "superlatively brilliant playing" and referred to him as "one of the few genuine virtuosos of the day." In the Leader News, Archie Bell asserted that "his playing was vigorous, broad and big. The beautiful passages were there, moments of delicacy and beautiful tone shading; but it was a virtuoso at the keys."

The local artists, Gertrude Englander, pianist, and Harold L. Branch, tenor, made their debuts as soloists at the ninth popular concert given by the orchestra. Mr. Sokoloff conducted compositions of Weber, Bizet, Rimsky-Korsakoff and MacDowell.

In the opinion of Mr. Rogers, Miss Englander disclosed "ample facility and assurance" as well as "agile and dependable fingers." On the other hand, Mr. Bell considered that Mr. Branch showed "a beautiful lyric voice that was used to best advantage at all times."

An unusually large and enthusiastic audience heard Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink's annual song recital in Masonic Hall on March 20. Wilson Smith commented that time has made no inroads on public devotion if they have upon her vocal equipment. Her art, he continued, "defies the encroachments of time" and her "consummate artistry" covers her vocal deficiencies. Mr. Rogers observed that "she found for each lyric the fitting emphasis; she rounded her phrases with unerring skill and finesse." Florence Hardeman, violinist, who was assisting artist, received laudatory notices.

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

RUDOLF LAUBENTHAL
TENOR, METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

A New Note in Song-Recital Giving Charming Programs of Melodious Beethoven Songs—With Talks.
Management:
DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York City
FREEMANTEL

Philadelphia Opera Closes With Samson

Julia Claussen, Althouse, Patton and Smallens Share Praise; Bonci Sings.

Philadelphia, March 30. — Saint-Saens' Samson et Dalila was sung before a capacity audience by the Civic Opera Company as the last of its ten productions this season. The Inquirer reviewer commented that "it was in many ways the best executed effort of this very capable musical organization."

This writer continued that Julia Claussen sang "with beautiful tone" and that there was in her two solos "a velvety volume of tone and an authority that was most pleasing." He wrote that the "more than capable" Paul Althouse "repeated the favorable impression he made with his former appearances;" that Alfredo Gondolfi's "beautiful baritone well sustained the role of the high priest;" and that Fred Patton "was more than adequate as Abimelech." He congratulated Alexander Smallens for conducting in "his usual competent fashion."

The North American reported that "outstanding excellences of the production were the singing of Julia Claussen and Paul Althouse in the joint title roles; the splendid choral work and the lithesome and youthful all-Philadelphia ballet, supervised by Florence Cosanova. Other members of the cast who displayed both histrionic ability and vocal precision were Alfredo Gandolfi, Fred Patton, Helffenstein Mason, Alexander Angelucci, Nino Mazzeo and Theodore Bayer.

Mr. Smallens was also commended in the Record, and Mme. Claussen was praised for the "power and beauty" of her singing and her "irreproachable" interpretation; Mr. Althouse "made the character a dramatic as well as a vocal triumph." In the Ledger, the conductor was lauded for "a spirited and temperamental, but always thoroughly sane and musicianly reading of the score." This reviewer also admired the work of the principals as well as that of the singers in the minor roles. The chorus and ballet received special mention.

* * *

Another recent operatic production here was that of Donizetti's L'Elisir d'Amore by the Puccini Opera Company at the Metropolitan Opera House on Saturday evening. Antonio Dell' Orefice conducted.

Alessandro Bonci sang the role of Nemorino with "glimpses of real humor and touches of pathos," to quote the Bulletin. This chronicler asserted that, although he was not in best form vocally, he was still "the fine artist, singing with beauty of tone and an artistic skill that enabled him to give a splendid performance." Rosalinda Rudko, soprano, also was commended for "the purity and freshness of her voice" and her "genuine ability and abundant promise as a coloratura singer."

Stage Crowded to Hear Hofmann

An audience that overflowed on the stage applauded Josef Hofmann's last New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall March 29.

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

Malipiero Songs Draw Favorable Comment

Tullio Serafin Conducts Program of League of Composers; Hindemith Music Presented.

The first American performance of Malipiero's Sette Canzoni was the feature of the third and last concert of the League of Composers this season at the Forty-eighth Street Theatre, New York, on March 29.

Tullio Serafin conducted, and the assisting artists were Lucilla de Vescovi, soprano, Richard Hale, baritone, Albert Rappaport, tenor, and a Trio composed of Gregory Besrodny, violinist, Samuel Stillman, viola, and Lajos Shuk, cellist. The other numbers played were Malipiero's Stagione Italiche for voice and piano, Paul Hindemith's Kammermusik, and his Trio, Opus 34.

The four of the Sette Canzoni heard at the concert were The Vagabonds, The Serenade, The Drunkard, and The Return. W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun of the difficulties of judging these pieces when presented in concert form without the miming and the settings called for. "That the four numbers made such vivid impressions as they surely did demonstrated the potent simplicity, directness and unerring judgment of the composer's art. . . . All revealed uncommon delineative power and genuine musical invention." According to Pitts Sanborn they are marked by "a fine native Venetian folk flavor and by exceedingly apt and vivid orchestration."

The Post reviewer referred to them as "a unique conception of the synthesis of dramatic action and music in a modified operatic form" with "highly sophisticated orchestration" and ultra-modern in harmonic construction. He liked their "strikingly simple and fresh beauty." The songs were called "brief, vivid, provocative, highly pointed" in the World, and Olin Downes of the Times thought the music "intensely and intensively dramatic." To Lawrence Gilman (Herald Tribune) they revealed Malipiero in his pre-war period "as one of the most intelligent and sensitive of the Italian modernists."

According to Mr. Downes, the performance "was worthy of the composition. Mr. Serafin conducted as if his fate depended on the successful issue." Other writers lauded the conductor. Mr. Downes also commended the "manly resonance of voice and the dramatic instinct" shown by Mr. Hale, the interpretation, "appropriate in mood and manner," of Mr. Rappaport, and "the musicianship, intelligence, and excellent Italian diction" of Miss de Vescovi. Mr. Gilman agreed that she sang "with fine understanding and imaginative sympathy" and that the tenor and baritone were effective. The soloists received other laudatory notices, and the Post noted particularly the work of Mr. Rappaport.

Neither the Stagione Italiche nor Hindemith's Trio received much favorable comment (although the performances of both were commended), but the Kammermusik by the latter was praised.

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

FRANCESCO MALIPIERO
Italian Composer, Whose Sette Canzoni, Conducted by Tullio Serafin, Were the Feature of the Final Concert of the League of Composers in New York.

Carmen Sung in Rochester

Rochester, March 31. — With its fourth production, Bizet's Carmen in English, last week, the Rochester American Opera Company closed its activities for the season. The company was under the supervision of Vladimir Rosing and Reuben Mamoulian, producing directors, Frank Waller, music director, and Norman Edwards, scenic director.

Stewart B. Sabin, reviewer of the Democrat and Chronicle, wrote, "To one listener this seemed perhaps as vital a demonstration as has been given, of the actual teaching that has been going on in the Eastman School of Music. Here was a colorful performance by young singers who eighteen months ago could not sing or act opera; here was a chorus that sang excellently; here were singers who sang with intelligent conception of what it is to sing dramatic text and to accompany that singing with acting. More than all, here was real ensemble performance."

A. J. Warner of the Times-Union likewise was impressed with the realism of the picture which the ensemble presented, instead of stereotyped posturing. He praised the scenic and lighting effects of the production. He said further, "Olivia Martin's Carmen proved to be an unerringly consistent characterization of the heroine. She never lost either the melodic or the histrionic line of her role."

N. Y. Again Welcomes Mme. Schumann-Heink

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink gave a recital of songs on March 29 at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Just twenty-six years ago she made her initial appearance on that stage, singing the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia at a Sunday night concert.

According to Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) "the lasting wonder of her voice, her art, her inimitable manner worked their unfailing spell." The writer in the World commented on the "steadfast, genuine quality" of her voice, and the Sun chronicler found her voice in "a remarkable state of preservation." This writer continued that Mme. Schumann-Heink "sang with the dramatic feeling and the emphasized style which long ago made her a commanding figure in the lyric world."

In the opinion of the Herald-Tribune commentator, her singing "had strength and resonance, with the familiar full, powerful lower notes and the usual notable interpretative capacity," although occasionally her tones were not so well sustained, with "a slightly clipped effect." Olin Downes of the Times wrote that "by means of the most finished diction and consummate musicianship" Mme. Schumann-Heink "made each of the songs mentioned stand out in the memory for individuality and dramatic significance."

The Post chronicler observed that "the consummate art of her interpretation and the emotional fervor of her reading still hold us entranced. . . . Though she seemed to be suffering from the exigencies of our climate, there was still the old luscious richness in the upper and lower registers and no lack of power."

Mme. Schumann-Heink was assisted by Florence Hardeman, violinist, and Katherine Hoffman, pianist.

Taucher Returns in Meistersinger

Curt Taucher was warmly applauded on his return to the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on March 26 in Die Meistersinger. This performance marked the close of the Wagner matinee cycle.

The only new member in the cast was Michael Bohnen in the role of Sachs. According to the Telegram-Mail his is "an engrossing impersonation always, wrought out with minute care; an operatic portrait of compelling vocal and histrionic potency." The Sun said he "sang much of his music with beauty of tone and sincerity of feeling, but he was seldom the tender sensitive interpreter of human hearts."

GIGLI

ROSA PONSELLE
Exclusive Management
NATIONAL CONCERTS, INC.
1451 Broadway—New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, APRIL 7, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 25

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.: Canada, $6.00: Foreign Countries, $7.00
Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

The Value of Competition

Competition, quite apart from being "the life of trade," can serve advantageously in other fields . . . one of which is music. Striving to excel is a spur, oft-times a helpful spur and productive of results. Contests wherein the entrants are pitted against one another in the display of talents and skill are generally fruitful. They at least stimulate those participating to their best efforts, which is good.

The New York Music Week Association is conducting a series of contests in the different boroughs altogether interesting. Systematically planned and carried out, with music experts officiating as juries, these contests are encouraging hundreds of young folk (and a few of their elders as well) in the disclosing of their abilities in playing some music instrument and singing.

The undertaking has attracted widespread attention, for the quantity of music proficiency thus brought out is astonishing even to some of the seasoned persons called on to listen to the candidates who seek ratings that will yield either a gold, silver, or bronze medal or a certificate indicating marked music proficiency on the part of the recipient.

Miss Isabel Lowden is responsible for this movement in New York. The procedure formulated by her has secured the financial support of a number of public spirited men and women, and there has been talk of expanding the project into one of national scope.

The final district contests in this particular contest have just been held, and it is gratifying, as well as astonishing, to learn that ratings of from ninety to ninety-five percent. have been bestowed upon some of the district winners, most of whom are pupils in grade schools.

Individual efforts are confined principally to playing pianoforte and violin; but there are some entrants in the string and wind instruments groups, and also the one set apart for mixed choruses.

Whenever human endeavor aims for a definite objective there usually attends a maximum of possible accomplishment. That fact forms the basis for encouraging these New York Music Week Association contests, which will be concluded with the interborough finals, to be held during the week of May 3 next.

Boston appears to be showing signs of wanting its own opera again. At any rate, some of its citizens are thus inclined. Perhaps one live spark may start the necessary conflagration.

Now for the announced season of opera in Paris by a company on which a label has been sewn that purports to be part-American. It won't be American, that is sure. What else it will be remains to be determined—the performances have yet to take place.

Regardless of our other crops, the native opera output, before long, seems bound to grow. Seeds are being planted, and they have been put into fertile soil.

The radio is running into unpropitious weather. An excess of static will bring a lull, shortly, in any apprehension which recognized concert artists may have over the invasion into their domain of the radio.

A new conductor is cropping forth . . . almost every hour on the hour.

Hizzoner Hylan has not yet assigned bands on the subway station platforms during the rush hours. What's the matter with Hizzoner? He seems to be missing a chance at some further publicity.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

REPEATED hearings do not diminish the virtues of Petrouchka, which has become a regular member of the Metropolitan's repertorial family. They do expose one marked fault. Both the mass scenes in the ballet—and particularly that which opens the performance—are too long.

There are no more than six or eight important thematic ideas in the first scene of the fete. Most of the orchestration portrays the more general murmur and bustle of the crowd. The few themes recur again and again and usually are literally repeated.

For example, the opening flute passage, which itself is in D minor, is heard eight times more before the first curtain. Each time the characteristic motif and the emphasis are as they were in the beginning, and only twice is the theme transposed to another pitch. The result is that after a while the ear is tired of the idea and the musical interest lags.

Most of the other material of the forty pages of the opening scene is treated the same way. The interlude of the barrel organ imitations in the flutes and clarinets is refreshing, but the persistence of the familiar motifs becomes wearing immediately again.

APPARENTLY the choreographers felt this weakness in the score, for colorful and interesting as the action is most of the time, there are moments during the fete when the movement on the stage becomes indeterminate and aimless.

The second of the fair scenes is weak in the same way, but it is stronger than the first because the greater variety of the composer's ideas gave the stage directors more suggestive material to illustrate with the ballet.

The rest of the score is ingeniously concise, descriptive and witty. The Metropolitan production brings out its possibilities fully, although Mr. Serafin has unfavorable acoustics to contend with. The solos have special difficulties down in the pit in being heard through the characteristic mass of incidental rhythm and color.

THERE is pathos in Petrouchka, and mostly it is effected, not by conventional broad sweep of melody, but by a concise stroke of harmony or melodic expression. For example, there is the short down-moving figure first heard in the bassoons in the Lento passage before the old charlatan appears on the scene with his flute. There is also as illustration the fortissimo cry of Petrouchka in the two trumpets in the fifth and sixth measures from the end of the entire work.

IT is odd that music can make a virtue of bad material. In the Pastoral Symphony Beethoven quoted in their rude and banal forms peasant dances, and within the frame of his picture made them sound charming.

In Petrouchka Stravinsky has done the same sort of thing in a half dozen instances for humorous purposes—in the flute cadenza, the Ballerina's cornet dancing tune, the two barrel organ themes and the salon music of the waltz of the heroine and the Moor.

IT has been said that Samuel Gardner's performance of his Violin Concerto not long ago was the first time in a half century (since the visit of Wieniawski) that New York has heard a violinist play his own concerto with orchestra.

The same is not true of the pianistic fraternity. Within the last few seasons Paderewski, Hofmann, Dohnanyi, Medtner, Schelling, Stravinsky, Ornstein, Stojowski and Mlle. Tailleferre have all been soloists with orchestras here in the performance of major compositions of their own.

The Concerto of Mlle. Tailleferre was played recently by the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Alfred Cortot as soloist, and within a fortnight by the Philharmonic Orchestra with the composer. The latter orchestra was fittingly diminished for the occasion, and the result was good.

It is a small composition, rather designed as chamber music than anything else. Taken in this way it is at times pleasantly melodious and interesting in its rhythm. Some of it Stravinsky might have written if he were a perfect lady. ALEXANDER FRIED.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, of The Musical Digest, published weekly at New York, N. Y., for April 1, 1925.

State of New York }
County of New York } ss.

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Pierre V. R. Key, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the editor and publisher of The Musical Digest and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in Section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher, Pierre V. R. Key.....243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y.
Editor, Pierre V. R. Key.....243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y.
Managing Editor, Alexander Fried.....243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y.
Business Manager, Bruno Zirato.....243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y.

2. That the owners are: (Give names and addresses of individual owners, or, if a corporation, give its name and the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of the total amount of stock.)

The Musical Digest, Inc.....243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y.
W. A. Clark, Jr.....2205 West Adams Street, Los Angeles, Cal.
George Eastman.....200 East Avenue, Rochester, N. Y.
Harry H. Flagler.....32 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.
Mrs. Christian R. Holmes.....525 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.
Pierre V. R. Key.....243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y.
Clarence H. Mackay.....253 Broadway, New York, N. Y
J. G. McNary.....Austin Terrace, El Paso, Tex.
Hiram W. Sibley ..... 384 East Avenue, Rochester, N. Y.
Mrs. Chas. P. Taft.....316 Pike Street, Cincinnati, Ohio
Herbert Witherspoon.....44 West 86th Street, New York, N. Y.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

PIERRE V. R. KEY,
Publisher and Editor.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 18th day of March, 1925.

[Seal] CARL A. POWERS.
(My commission expires March 30, 1925).

One Night in Berlin

Elisabeth Rethberg Describes the Charm of a Certain Post-War Concert When Music Was All That Mattered.

by LAWRENCE LENSH

IT was in Berlin shortly after the end of the war. Night drew on, and the city was in complete darkness. The electric lamps in the streets remained unlit. Trolley cars stood dark and deserted in their tracks. Few persons were abroad, and they hurried quietly on their way.

On one street there was unusual traffic. Men and women were coming from all directions toward a building whose shadowed hulk merged with the blackness of the sky. It was one of Europe's largest concert halls. The lobby of the theatre was pitch black. Attendants with pocket lamps guided those who entered.

Within, the gleam of flashlights lit the way down the aisles. There were muffled ejaculations as persons stumbled in the darkness. There were giggles and laughter, and the murmur of subdued coversation. From time to time sudden tiny lights speckled the darkness.

The platform was almost invisible. A door opened at the side of it, and a man entered with a lighted candle in each hand. He walked to the center of the stage where stood the bulk of a piano. He set the candles on the piano, and fumbled about to see that they stood firmly. Then he felt his way back to the door whence he had come.

Again the door opened, and this time three persons entered, two men and a woman. They carried large electric lamps whose light they threw before them. The audience burst into applause as the two men took their places at the piano—one to play and one to turn the leaves—and the singer stood before it.

There was some delay while the lights on the piano were readjusted. Another large candle was brought out in whose light the artist might stand. The dull and flickering illumination was found too weak for her to read the text of her songs from her tiny book. The audience was nervous; it wondered whether it would hear any music that night.

A few words of consultation among those on the platform. She put aside her notebook, and faced the audience one half her face in shadow. The pianist improvised a few moments. The candles stood firm.

Then he began his first accompaniment, and Elisabeth Rethberg sang. . . .

"That was one of the most beautiful experiences in my musical life," said Mme. Rethberg, when she had related the story of this strange concert.

"It was in the feverish unsettled period after the war, when every day fresh quarrels and fresh strikes would upset the traditional ante-bellum comfort and order of the German people. At this particular time the employees of the street railways and the electric companies in Berlin had gone on strike. The result was the greatest inconvenience in the carrying on of personal, commercial, and civil affairs, but for me it had a redeeming feature. It gave me a beautiful concert.

"All the distractions with which an artist has ordinarily to deal in a recital were removed. The members of the audience could scarcely see each other, so that comparison of clothes and the satisfaction of curiosity were impossible. Only those who really were hungry for music had fought with inconvenience to be present, and the darkness and quiet that shrouded everything made them reverent.

"That night music was the thing; nothing else mattered. The result was a concert that satisfied everyone, audience, critics, and myself.

"That is when music comes out at its best, it seems to me, when it is all-important simply because the demand for it is spontaneous and insistent. An audience which is gathered by force or persuasion is a bad and inattentive audience. One which overcomes every difficulty to hear music and which does not allow itself to be distracted by circumstances—that is a good audience.

"Propaganda, you know, cannot do everything. One cannot build up music in a grown person or in a great number of persons simply by intellectualizing about it. It must be bred in the bone first of all, and cultivated then with a minimum of self-consciousness."

The story of Elisabeth Rethberg from the time of her infancy to the present is good illustration of her theories of the necessity of spontaneity in the development of musical inclinations in the individual as well as in a nation. Her parents were musical—amateurs, not professionals—and music was a part of their daily lives. They sang and played for the sheer pleasure of it. They had done that as long as they could remember.

The tiny Elisabeth sang the melodies of children's songs before she could talk. At four years of age she played the piano. As a child of six or seven she was singing and playing for friends on gala occasions in the kindergarten, and at the many and various festivals and competitions which were almost a daily occurrence even in the smaller German towns before the war.

MME. ELISABETH RETHBERG

At the beginning of her career she had an opportunity to attract unusual notice. There was at the time an important Bach festival in Leipzig, and the youthful Elisabeth was invited by Straube, cantor of the famous St. Thomas Church where Bach officiated in his day, to sing the soprano solo in a difficult cantata of Telemann at the famous Gewandhaus. The part required more than thirty minutes of continuous singing in several styles, ranging from coloratura to expressive dramatic. Arthur Nikisch, who was in the audience at this concert, immediately invited Fraulein Rethberg to sing at the next New Year's performance in the Gewandhaus under his baton, an invitation which was one of the highest honors that an artist can attain.

At seventeen Mme. Rethberg studied at the Dresden Conservatory and opera school. "For a time," she told me, "I studied piano as well as the voice. There really was a question in my mind as to which career I should choose. I finally gave up the piano, professionally, but I still retain my love of instrumental music.

"It is the purely musical values in singing that appeal to me most even now. I do not care for vocal display. As far as my personal pleasure goes, I should prefer most of all to sing the music of Mozart, and that—in crowded halls and large theatres—has perhaps the least inflammatory effect on a great and mixed audience.

"The taste of audiences, of course, is something to be led by conscientious artists, as well as to be followed. It is in that way largely that a love of good music is created.

"You see," said Mme. Rethberg in explanation, "it is so much easier for a person of innate musical inclinations to be influenced by music of less profound appeal, by careless music of the moment. One walks in the street and hears it all about; one turns a knob on a radio apparatus, and the flood of the less serious music is let in. Music is like other valuables in this world. The cheaper, poorer kind is much more available than that which is good.

"But an artist must be practical in his arrangements, too. For example, I should sometimes prefer for myself to sing entire programs of music of a single composer. Yet I realize that an audience which is sitting in a confined space for perhaps a couple of hours cannot pitch its temperament and varied disposition to a single mood for that entire time Hence a variety of styles is necessary on any well constructed program.

"It is difficult to be an audience, you know. It is not natural for healthy persons to sit still for hours with their attention strained in one direction all that time. The programmaker must be aware of this fact.

"But not only is it difficult to be an audience. There is such a thing as overdoing it, too. One should not always depend upon others for one's music. The foundation of a musical people is the ability to create music one's self. To listen to music is good, to play it, even in merely a moderately competent manner, is better. The education of children should be conducted, I think, from that point of view.

"With the person who plays as well as listens, music becomes a natural enjoyment. The spontaneity is important. For example, I have often wished that I could have another recital under the beautiful conditions of the one in Berlin of which I have told you. But unfortunately it cannot happen again. The charm of the situation was largely that it developed of itself. If I were to strive to create those conditions artificially, I probably should fail to re-establish that magic atmosphere of appreciation. The affair would lack spontaneity; it would be a pose."

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

GEORGE PERKINS RAYMOND
Tenor
CONCERT—RECITAL—ORATORIO
Exclusive management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

"Again it was the young American's night."—Times

Photo by Geo. Maillard Kesslere

"The beauty of his voice and the excellence of his diction meet the test of recital singing with triumphant completeness."—World.

TIBBETT

IN RECITAL

Carnegie Hall, Monday, March 16

"a manly voice of mellow resonance, range and clarity."—Times.

". . . a singer of unusual vocal range, and skill in delivery, and an artist of striking interpretative gifts. . . . He held his hearers at all times and won applause in exceptional volume."—American.

"His singing is intelligent and expressive, with climactic passages made amply dramatic."—Herald Tribune.

" . . . the ovation he received in opera was repeated by the large and friendly audience in the big concert auditorium."—Telegraph.

" . . . an evening of vocal mastery, admirable diction and a veritable spectrum of dramatic color."—Telegram-Mail.

"The young baritone's good method, beautifully clear diction and beautiful tones lend themselves well to recital."—Post.

"His tones were well produced, always fluid and liquid, and his voice was used with skill."—Sun.

"Judging from the amount of applause which was showered upon him, he promises to be a very popular concert artist."—Eve. World.

CERTIFIED THE MUSICAL DIGEST

Management: Evans and Salter 527 Fifth Ave., New York

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

ANENT GOOD MUSIC, at cheaper prices, here is what the New York Times had to say editorially last Friday with respect to next season's plans of the New York Symphony Orchestra management:

"It is good news that the New York Symphony Orchestra will hold its Sunday concerts next year in the new Mecca Temple, about three times the size of Aeolian Hall, and that it will reduce the price of seats. Mr. Flagler, whose generosity in support of the New York Symphony Orchestra has been unstinted, states that this cut is made in the face of an increase of about $25,000 in the annual expenditures through the increase in wages. But this added burden, he thinks, should not be shouldered by concertgoers, and they will have the entire benefit of the larger revenue expected from the larger hall.

"Under the new arrangement balcony seats may be obtained for 35 cents a concert, or $3.15 for the series of ten concerts, or $5.60 for the series of twenty concerts. At Aeolian Hall there were eighty so-called 'blind seats,' which were offered at 50 cents each. At the new Mecca Temple there will be 662 seats available at 35 cents and 519 at 50 cents. These prices should bring the Symphony Orchestra's concerts within reach of thousands who heretofore could rarely attend. It may easily prove that the available space will meet hardly one-tenth of the demand.

"Some people do not believe that music should be subsidized. They speak of 'pauperizing' concertgoers. Fortunately, Mr. Flagler and the Symphony Society feel otherwise. Their conviction is that the best music should be brought within the means of every one. This was one of the reasons that led to the concerts in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, which have met with such a wonderful reception. Even those who were at first opposed to the plan were deeply impressed by the appreciation of the audiences and by the manner in which persons would come hours ahead of time in order to be able to get in, and would wait in decorous patience for the brief program of music.

"Those who are accustomed to sneer at the lack of appreciation of the arts by Americans have already begun to admit that, at least of music, there is a certain understanding. The wealth of music in New York is not alone a response to high prices paid to performers. Without a genuine love of music, the many varied performances would not receive sufficient support. The high prices, in fact, have served in part to check the spread of a genuine interest in good music. There are great numbers somewhat uninformed, and for that very reason keenly desirous of hearing the best. They are the ones that the Symphony Society will now be able to reach."

JEAN RESZKE is dead, at seventy-five. He was a great opera tenor; in most respects, say some, the greatest of them all. But that is a matter of opinion rather than one of fact. For there is no indisputable means of estimating to the nth degree the precise qualifications of singers, pianists, violinists, symphony orchestra, et cetera.

Nevertheless, de Reszke was undoubtedly one of the very foremost of his craft: a gentleman born, with a fine mind which he had cultivated; an artist with a highly developed vocal, histrionic, and interpretative technique; and an aristocrat in taste.

De Reszke began his career as a baritone, and having attained fame was often referred to as a "baritone made over into a tenor." He always had a tenor voice. The training and use of it for baritone roles did not alter its inherent quality. Had he been a baritone de Reszke never could have sung tenor music with such high tessitura as obtains in the characters of Romeo, Vasco da Gama, Raoul and so on.

WHEN HE CAME first to this country Jean de Reszke was nearly fifty; but that did not deter his forging onwards in his art. A prodigious worker was de Reszke. He lived at the Gilsey House, when in New York, which stood in Broadway at Twenty-ninth street and was the congregating place for Metropolitan opera habitues during the nineties.

Associated with de Reszke was his brother Edouard, more gifted vocally than the tenor. But Edouard had not the flair for singing which was conspicuous of Jean. That basso voice was of course unique: a genuine profundo organ, which was loosed with the freedom peculiarly Edouard's and was generally a torrential flow of sound. There was little finesse in Edouard's vocalism or in his interpretative art. He was, in this respect, the antithesis of Pol Plancon, the polished Frenchman who appeared in the same company here, which Maurice Grau captained in the days when deficits were regular affairs and their payment by no means as assured as they later came to be.

IT WAS Jean de Reszke who proved that the music of Tristan and of Siegfried could really be sung, and had no need to be barked—according to the beliefs and methods of those German high-voiced persons who coughed and growled, and refused to give attention to such matters as an open throat and the cultivation of a legato.

In Jean's palmy days he had as contemporaries such artists as Mmes. Melba, Nordica, Eames, Sembrich, Ternina, Calve, Schumann-Heink, and Mantelli, and MM. Maurel, Campanari, Ancona, Journet, La Salle, De Lucia, Alvarez, Di Marchi, Gremonini, and others. Manchinelli and Bevignani and Seidl conducted; and Mme. Materna was also heard, as were Emil Fischer, Anton Van Rooy, David Bispham and their kind.

There was not the perfection of scenic investiture in opera that now prevails at the Metropolitan, and less perfection in ensemble than is common these days. But—the individual vocalism and artistry was of a higher general level then than now. It was a period of vocal glory which appears to have passed.

THE DE RESZKE voice was no golden affair. Intrinsically it had no such melting beauty or liquid facility as Caruso's. De Reszke always found it difficult to sing a mezzo voce; he could deliver his tones mezzo-forte, forte, and fortissimo . . . and was happiest when so doing.

His distinguished bearing, a physique never matched in our day by another tenor, gave him an advantage. Authority was his: in appearance, suggestion of look or bodily movement, and the utterance of text and music. Blessed in these ways, de Reszke was so preeminent intellectually that he towered above his colleagues . . . even in that period when they knew what should be done and how to do it.

New York, and Chicago too, still remembers his "come back," in 1901-03, after reports came from Europe that he had gone into a vocal decline. His reappearances in those two cities were events of breathless interest for the assemblages that gathered to discover whether de Reszke was indeed vocally gone. And how masterfully, and with what assurance, did he dispel the rumors. Now he is gone. During recent years he confined himself to the teaching of singing. Some assert that he was a master also at that craft, but others dispute those assertions.

The opera world will go on. New tenors will arise. None are likely to come, however, to leave any such illustrious name as did Jean de Reszke. He was great because he copied no one. As there was only one Enrico Caruso so was there only one Jean de Reszke. It is usual that a great individuality shall be unique unto himself.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER is, as The Musical Digest readers are aware, a belligerent friend of opera in English, of opera (in this country) by Americans. Whether he inclines towards opera being exclusively for Americans he has not, to my knowledge, yet said.

Mr. Meltzer has a way of hitting aggressively at anyone whom he believes is not for opera in just the way he is for it. He is uncompromising, and not to agree with his views is not to be right.

Rarely does Mr. Meltzer temper his printed and spoken remarks about the persons who are running our established opera houses. He opens broadsides against them, and assails their motives and their methods. He wants Americans to manage the Metropolitan and the Chicago Opera companies, and he wants American singers to be given greater opportunities in leading roles than they are given. He holds that the operas written by native composers are not accorded the consideration due them, and that when one is presented that it is accepted and produced half-heartedly and with covert sneers.

SOME OF Mr. Meltzer's contentions are deserving of attention, but not all of them. In point of strict fact, most of his criticisms carry symptoms of acidulous fault-finding and are utterly impracticable of present adoption. The Meltzer procedure is to hammer intolerantly at both the Metropolitan and the Chicago organizations; to accuse, generally and specifically, in that hard fashion which gives hint that Mr. Meltzer nurses some personal grievance or grievances. This may be only the effect caused by what he says or writes. It is quite possible that Mr. Meltzer is not grinding the opera-in-English opera axe, opera-by-Americans axe for any save a constructive purpose; and it is quite possible too that he is not aggrieved over anything in which he holds a special personal interest.

If this be so then it would seem that the Meltzer criticism and attacks are unwise. They will not win as many adherents to the cause he professes to be championing as might ensue through the adoption and practise of a policy eminently broad and upbuilding.

Mr. Meltzer has hooked on to the New York Graphic newspaper's criticism of the Metropolitan—a criticism, presented in a series of articles, that is almost as silly and incorrect as some of Mr. Meltzer's own printed harangues.

The Musical Digest has given considerable space to Mr. Meltzer's utterances. It has tried to be patient with him, and to examine carefully and fairly all he has offered for the reader's eye. The results have not alone been wearisome but they have produced very little of a truly helpful nature.

I personally have reached the conclusion that the continuation of such methods as those of Mr. Meltzer are damaging rather than helpful to the cause of opera in this country. And I am also moved to wonder why a man who belabors so heavily everything foreign in opera in this country, and who has been permitted to earn his livelihood here, should have overlooked all these years the little matter of becoming an American citizen. Would it not be to the point for Mr. Meltzer to pause in his campaign until he has taken out United States citizenship papers? For until he does so, being a foreigner, he occupies the awkward position of having the ball hit him at its every rebound.

AMERICANS who never, never get an opportunity to assume first roles at the Metropolitan Opera House must have received a shock when Clarence Whitehill appeared in the recent presentations of Pelleas et Melisande and, as Golaud, tucked the major individual honors under his arm and walked off with them.

This is not intended as any disparagement of the accomplishments of Miss Bori or Edward Johnson, both of whom impressed the newspaper reviewers sufficiently to gain for them commendation of a most desirable sort.

It is that Mr. Whitehill's characterization, and his vocalism and diction, were of such outstanding eminence that he rose to seldom attained heights. He was for me superior to Hector Dufranne, who introduced Golaud to us and made us feel that his superior would never be met.

The point at issue is simply this: Americans of exceptional abilities do receive recognition in our foremost opera houses. What is more, they are gaining ground steadily. Their number in those institutions will increase in proportion to the excellence which newcomer candidates exhibit. So, in part at least, it appears to be more or less up to the American artists themselves.

ANNOUNCEMENTS appearing in certain music journals touching upon the operas which the Metropolitan Opera Company management purposes presenting next season—new works, and others to be revived—have missed by a wide margin their target. Those published, and exclusively, in The Musical Digest of March 31 were accurately set forth. In addition to the operas mentioned there will be one other, thus far decided on, for Metropolitan opera goers during 1925-26. It is The Barber of Bagdad, by Peter Cornelius.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

L'Oracolo

L'Oracolo was given its first production of the season by the Metropolitan Opera Company on March 26 on a joint bill with Petrouchka and Cavalleria Rusticana. Gennaro Papi conducted the Leoni opera and the cast consisted of Lucrezia Bori, Henriette Wakefield, and Messrs. Tokatyan, Didur, Scotti, d'Angelo, and Paltrinieri.

Olin Downes wrote in the Times that Mr. Scotti's "incomparable" impersonation "is one of the most striking in his amazing portrait gallery." The Win-Shee of Mr. Didur, according to Mr. Downes, was "superbly contrasted with the figure of the abductor and murderer" and had "the prophetic and ancestral quality which gives tragic dignity and worth to an otherwise repellant and sensational subject."

The Post reviewer commented that Miss Bori sang her aria "with great charm and looked the pretty Chinese maiden to perfection." Mr. Downes also commended her competence as well as that of others in the cast. The Post said, Mr. Scotti's "remarkable characterization" made it "difficult to recognize the artist, who is able to so perfectly lose his own identity in his various assumptions."

Mme. Wanda Landowska

A concert of seventeenth and eighteenth century music was given by Wanda Landowska in Aeolian Hall March 31 with the assistance of a small orchestra conducted by Willem Mengelberg. Mme. Landowska played both the harpsichord and piano in a program which included C. P. Bach's Concerto in C minor for harpsichord, strings, horns, and wood winds; the larghetto from Mozart's Coronation Concerto for piano and orchestra; two polonaises by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach; Laendler and waltzes by Mozart; and Haydn's D major Concerto for harpsichord and orchestra.

Richard Aldrich wrote in the Times that "the remarkable vigor and variety of color, the fidelity to the style and the consequent freshness and vitality of her interpretations made these performances of Mme. Landoswka notable." Of equal enthusiasm were the reviews in other papers, and Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) wrote that "Mr. Mengelberg fulfilled his sacerdotal office with irreproachable sympathy and tact; the men of his orchestra were faultless acolytes." Other chroniclers praised the sympathetic understanding of the conductor and orchestra.

Katherine Bacon Gives Recital

Katherine Bacon gave her second and last New York recital of the season in Aeolian Hall on March 30. Mozart, Chopin, Schubert-Liszt, Brahms, and Liapounoff were represented on her program. According to the Times reviewer, Miss Bacon expressed herself in the Mozart Sonata with "engaging charm. It rippled and ran, lightly and musically, sparkled and shone, without let or hindrance from the allegro to a delightful close."

Sundelius—Bohnen

The production of Faust by the Metropolitan Opera Company last Wednesday had a new Mephistopheles in Michael Bohnen. According to Alison Smith of the World, he was "forceful vocally and dramatically."

Lawrence Gilman wrote in the Herald Tribune that Mr. Bohnen's performance was one "of singular power; neither subtle nor sinister, often thick fingered and over-comic, yet achieved with enormous gusto and vitality." In the opinion of Pitts Sanborn of the TelegramMail, he was "eye-filling and vocally commanding . . . . his diction was better than anybody else's in the cast, excepting only Paul Ananian."

The Post found him "a delight" vocally, although he spoiled his scenes by his restlessness. The reviewer in the Sun commented that "it was evident that he had given much care and thought to the role. He made a sinister figure of compelling, ruthless power . . . the rolling, sonorous volume of his voice, his massive frame and his malignant humor created a creature reflecting diabolical, brutal strength."

This was the first time that Mr. Bohnen had sung a role in French.

Marie Sundelius sang the role of Marguerite and, to quote Mr. Sanborn, showed the results of "careful and intelligent study, both dramatically and vocally." Mr. Gilman declared her performance "persuasive through its sincerity, simplicity, restraint, its true charm," and called some of her mezza voce singing "delightful." The Sun thought her voice in "excellent" condition, and found her an "appealing" figure. The Post writer commended her, too.

This reviewer observed that Edward Johnson's Faust "was an artistic performance and gloriously sung." Mr. Gilman thought him "poetic and distinguished in action, beautifully adroit in song." Other writers admired his acting, but did not consider him in his best form vocally. Others in the cast were Mmes. Howard and Dalossy, and Mr. de Luca. Mr. Hasselmans conducted.

Clifton Conducts Society

The American Orchestral Society, Chalmers Clifton conductor, was assisted by Boris Saslawsky, baritone, and Bianca del Vecchio, pianist, in its second concert under the auspices of New York University, in Town Hall, on April 1. The program consisted of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Daniel Gregory Mason's song cycle for baritone and orchestra, entitled Russians, an excerpt from Parsifal, and Tschaikowsky's B flat minor piano Concerto. Deems Taylor wrote in the World that their work is far from amateurish, "the material of the society is decidedly promising. . . . Mr. Clifton led his forces with skill and understanding."

Mueller—Tokatyan

Petrouchka and La Boheme constituted the double bill at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on March 30. Maria Mueller sang the role of Mimi in the latter for the first time here, and Armand Tokatyan substituted for Lauri-Volpi, who was indisposed.

Archie Coates wrote in the Telegram-Mail that Mme. Mueller "brought to the role some excellent upper tones and a sympathetic impersonation from an interpretative viewpoint. Albeit a trifle more tragic than merely wistful, her Mimi was refreshing and alluring almost to the point of sweetness." The Herald Tribune reported that "she sang generally well, with a voice of smooth quality and, for the most part, ample carrying power."

The Times reviewer observed that she brought to the role "combined beauty and lyric charm." The chronicler in the World said she "acted delightfully, but sang without much power or distinctness." According to the Post, Mme. Mueller "sang the music with much charm and gave a very realistic and often pathetic presentation."

Mr. Tokatyan's singing "was delightfully resonant and pleasing" and he "made his part thrilling with solicitude for his sweetheart," reported the Post. Mr. Coates mentioned that "he sang with an abandon and lyric glamour which somewhat taxed" his vocal volume. The writer in the Herald Tribune asserted that Mr. Tokatyan sang with tones of "commendable strength and steadiness."

The remainder of the cast and the performers in Petrouchka were familiar in their parts.

Miss Helen Fogel

A twelve-year-old pianist, Helen Fogel, played Bach, Beethoven, Debussy, Chopin, and Schumann at her recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, Thursday evening. To quote the Times, she made a good impression, displaying "much technical facility and a good memory."

According to the Sun, "she gave evidence of talent, immaturity and future promise." Alison Smith wrote in the World that "apart from a touching earnestness and devotion to her music, the performance revealed little justification for so early a debut. Miss Fogel shows a certain technical facility." In the Herald Tribune it was reported that "considerable technical skill and faithfulness to the notes marked the young pianist's performance." Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) thought that "at best she showed herself capable of striking without mistakes a given number of notes in a given time."

New York Symphony

Roland Hayes was the soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on March 26 and 27, and at the following Sunday afternoon concert Bruno Walter conducted the orchestra for the last time this year.

The farewell performance of Mr. Walter consisted of Brahms' First Symphony, Pfitzner's Overture, Katchen von Heilbron, and Haydn's D minor Symphony. To quote the Post "it was a fine choice for Mr. Walter's farewell, music of depth and content, which he read feelingly and intelligently and which the orchestra played splendidly." The writer in the Sun commented that, in Mr. Walter's conducting "were evident his rich musicianship, his fine regard for rhythms and remote but significant phrases, and his power of welding a multitude of musical details into an impressive, coherent ensemble." Mr. Walter was given an ovation.

According to the Post, Roland Hayes displayed "his luscious tone and consummate artistry." The World spoke of "the sincere and ample art" which he brought to his songs. Olin Downes wrote in the Times that he was "most expressive and convincing" in the negro spirituals, and Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) commented that "his style and expression were admirable, but not his vocal production" in the Bach airs, although the spirituals he delivered "with irresistible effectiveness."

F. D. Perkins of the Herald Tribune agreed that Mr. Hayes was not at his best in the Bach, but that in the spirituals he was "in excellent form" and that his interpretations were marked by "purity of tone and expression." The Sun reported that he was not in best form.

Elgar's First Symphony was played for the first time in several seasons, and the other numbers on Mr. Walter's program were Weber's Der Freischuetz Overture and Liszt's Les Preludes.

Myra Hess Bids New York Farewell

Myra Hess gave her farewell piano recital of the season at Aeolian Hall on Wednesday evening. Her much applauded program was made up of Bach, Brahms, and Schumann.

The writer in the Sun observed in a typical review of the concert that "the unfailing delight of Miss Hess' playing seems to be one of the few things that can really be counted upon in this world of shifting values." Other reviewers wrote similarly.

PERSIS COX
Pianist and Teacher
Address: Pierce Building, Copley Sq., Boston, Mass.; or
Dana Hall, Wellesley, Mass.
Baldwin Piano Welte-Mignon Records

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

CLARENCE ADLER
PIANIST
Instruction for Advanced Pupils
137 West 86th St. New York
Telephone Schuyler 3580

ALLEN McQUHAE
TENOR
RECITALS—ORATORIOS—ORCHESTRAS
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Bldg., 57th St. & B'way, N. Y. C.
Brunswick Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1921
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

ANNA FITZIU
SOPRANO
Management: R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

Louis Bailly

Louis Bailly, French viola player, gave a recital in Town Hall on March 29. His program consisted of works by Strube, Jongen, Schumann, and Hindemith.

According to Olin Downes of the Times, Mr. Bailly's instrument "is one of the finest Gasparo da Salos the writer has had the privilege of hearing. Mr. Bailly, for that matter, would doubtless draw from another viola a tone of exceptional fineness and richness of color." Mr. Downes admitted that the artist "did not appear wholly at his ease," but his playing, nevertheless, "was that of an exceptionally accomplished musician who unites the most substantial knowledge with unusual feeling and control of tonal nuance."

The Herald Tribune chronicler found him "an excellent player" who "urged the merits of the viola as a solo instrument. His lower tones had the characteristic rich mellowness . . . his higher notes were violinistic, with the slightly cloudy timbre of the larger instrument. Mr. Bailly's technical skill was beyond exception."

The Schumann Maerchenbilder, in the opinion of the Sun writer, served him for "a display of the rich tonal beauty afforded by the viola." Mr. Bailly was accompanied by Alton Jones, who, to further quote this reviewer, was "an admirable pianistic coadjutor who shared the warm applause." Mr. Downes said he "ably assisted" the viola player.

David J. Putterman

David J. Putterman, cantor of Temple Emanuel, was heard in recital in Town Hall, New York, the evening of March 31. He was assisted by the Hazomir Choral Society, under the direction of Zavel Zilberts; and by Philip Morrell, violinist. Gladys Brady and Arthur Kline accompanied.

The Times reported that Mr. Putterman is a singer "of talent and a true lyric tenor. He has a voice of beautiful soft timbre, very true in intonation and emotional in every fibre." The writer in the Herald Tribune thought he had a good voice, "smooth of surface, clear in timbre and of ample volume." According to the Sun, he disclosed a voice "of delightful quality, of light volume, but good carrying power. His singing had faults of tone emission which can easily be eradicated."

This reviewer thought Mr. Morrell played with good tone and commendable skill. He was congratulated for a "tone of much sweetness" in the Times. The performance of the choral society under Mr. Zilberts' direction also received commendation.

Isa Kremer Sings Again

A large audience applauded the second New York concert given by Isa Kremer, international balladist, at Carnegie Hall, on March 29. Her program included songs in Russian, German, Polish, Italian, Jewish, and English. She was assisted by Leon Rosenbloom, pianist, and M. Buknik, cellist. To quote the Sun, Mme. Kremer was "in exceptionally good voice."

Mahler's Second Symphony

Mahler's Second Symphony was performed for the first time by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg conductor, in Carnegie Hall on March 28. Assisting were Marie Sundelius, soprano, Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto, and the chorus of the Schola Cantorum.

Lawrence Gilman wrote in the Herald Tribune that this composer, "for all his striving, all his deep and passionate sincerity, was unable to convert his visions into terms of potent and communicative tonal speech." According to Olin Downes of the Times, the music "is sincerely intended, but irritatingly long-winded, grandiose and only half inspired."

In the opinion of W. J. Henderson (Sun), in spite of "some pages of genuine beauty and a mighty framework," it lacks "an inner spirit."

This reviewer spoke of Mr. Mengelberg's "cherishing and authoritative" interpretation which was "of extraordinary impressiveness." Mr. Henderson wrote that the soloists were in good voice; that Mr. Mengelberg "has seldom worked harder or conducted more effectively;" and that the chorus "sang with fine tone, true pitch and excellent effect. The performance won honor and praise for all concerned." The writer in the Post noted that "orchestra, soloists and chorus all did their parts with skill and spirit and Mr. Mengelberg's conducting was a triumph."

Mr. Downes thought "the performance was a very fine one, at least from an orchestral point of view, the general excellence of the chorus, and the sincerity shown by all the performers." According to Mr. Gilman, Mr. Mengelberg "gave extraordinary fervor and a touching quality of conviction to his reading of the score. The great orchestra played superbly, and the choristers and the two soloists . . . sang as if they, too, believed whole-heartedly in this pathetic effort to conquer heaven by the power of will and the impact of good intentions."

Miles Case Boyd

A recital was given in Town Hall, New York, March 29, by Miles Case Boyd, baritone. His program included songs by Falconieri, Cesti, Monteverde, Schumann, and others. To quote the Sun reviewer, he revealed "a pleasant voice, not very impressive in volume, but used with intelligence and sensitive phrasing. His diction was admirable."

The Herald Tribune observed that Mr. Boyd's voice had "an agreeable quality of tone in its softer notes, but some notes of more volume produced a certain effort, some tremolo, and a lessened clearness." According to the writer in the Times, Mr. Boyd, "although nervous, sang agreeably when not straining for dramatic effect." His accompanist was Umberto Pisani.

Van Vliet Chamber Concert

The last of Cornelius van Vliet's series of three chamber music concerts took place at Rumford Hall, New York, on March 27. The artists participating in the program were the New York Trio, composed of Louis Edlin, Clarence Adler, Mr. van Vliet; Everyn Jeane, soprano; John Amans, flutist; and Bernard Wagenaar, pianist.

The program of "modern" music included Ireland's Second Trio; a group for cello and piano comprising Busoni's Suite, the minuet from Joseph Marx's Suite in F and the Fantasy and Capriccio of Paul Hindemith; two Song Poems by Scheinpflug; and Goossens' Five Impressions of a Holiday. To quote the Sun reviewer, the Ireland work "was beautifully played by the New York Trio." The Goossens work, according to the Herald Tribune received "a spirited, well unified performance."

The chronicler in the Telegram-Mail made the assertion that Mr. van Vliet played "with a skill, a taste, a devotion worthy of any music ever written." Miss Jeane, who has not been here in concert before, displayed a voice "of adequate size and agreeable quality" in the opinion of the writer in the Herald Tribune.

Miss Florentine Fortier

A Canadian soprano, Florentine Fortier, gave a recital in Town Hall, New York, the evening of March 30, with the assistance of Alfred Laliberte, composer-pianist. To quote the Times writer, "Miss Fortier's voice is small, but it carried well in spite of its fragilty. The singer had some difficulties with her highest and lowest notes, and was happiest when she remained between the two extremes. Her range of expression was limited to the gentler emotions."

The Herald-Tribune found evidence of a good voice "with fluency and a very agreeable quality of tone, though not without occasional slight unsteadiness."

According to the Sun, "when Miss Fortier did not force her voice she sang effectively, for her interpretations were always intelligent." Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail wrote that "she has a voice of pretty and appealing quality that suffers from defective schooling."

Muri Silba Reappears in New York

At her second New York recital of the season in Aeolian Hall the afternoon of March 31, Muri Silba, pianist, according to the Times, "again displayed a remarkable technical equipment, used with great facility." The Herald Tribune reported that "as before, Miss Silba gave a proficient and promising performance with vigor and marked technical polish."

Vincente Ballester

According to the writer in the Herald Tribune, Vincente Ballester, Spanish baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, "showed marked capacity for the concert field" in his first recital here at Carnegie Hall, March 29. This chronicler added that he displayed "a powerful voice, of unruffled, resonant tones, despite a slight sense of effort in some top notes, musicianly phrasing and interpretative skill."

The Times reported that he made "a succesful debut as a recitalist" and commended his "strong, sonorous, and round" voice. In the Sun, the reviewer noted that Mr. Ballester's voice "is a good one and he used it with ability and assurance. His general style lacked in variety, perhaps, but he knew how to make emotional appeal without resort to sensational methods."

Archie Coates of the Telegram-Mail commented that the baritone's voice "showed commendable variety of mood and considerable skill of management and control" and, although it wandered from the pitch once or twice, "there was much genuine joy and gusto in singing—a rare enough matter nowadays—and a freshening of familiar material to the satisfaction of just about everybody concerned." The Post commentator agreed that Mr Ballester was equally good in operatic airs and Spanish folk songs. Ina Grange was the accompanist.

Miss Lillian Fuchs

Lillian Fuchs, "a young violinist of considerable talent" (Sun), gave a recital in Aeolian Hall the evening of March 27. She was accompanied by Samuel Chotzinoff.

To quote the Sun further, Miss Fuchs "played with evidences of sound musical training. Her bowing was free and elastic, her tone full and firm, and she revealed plenty of confidence and vitality. She is still a young and immature artist." . . . But she had a good technique, a competent sense of form and structure, and many other qualities worth cultivation."

Alison Smith of the World wrote that Miss Fuchs "displayed a gratifying smoothness of tone and accuracy of intonation, but her work lacked depth and maturity of interpretation in the heavier numbers." According to the Herald Tribune, she seemed to have the fundamentals of violin playing "well in hand."

Francis Rogers
Concert Baritone and Teacher of Singing
Member American Academy of Teachers of Singing
144 East 62d St., New York City

DOROTHY MILLER DUCKWITZ
AMERICAN PIANIST
Will accept a limited number of pupils
CHICKERING PIANO WELTE-MIGNON RECORDS
Management Dorothy Miller Duckwitz, 145 West 77th St., New York City

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. Telephone
New York City Circle 8815

RHYS MORGAN
THE WELSH TENOR
Management: ROGER DE BRUYN, 1540 Broadway, N. Y. C.
DR. J. O. HOWELLS, Associate

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

GUSTLIN
AMERICAN OPERA INTERP-RECITALS
for Music Clubs and Schools
REPERTOIRE OF 10 AMERICAN OPERAS
BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MGT., 130 WEST 42nd ST., NEW YORK CHICKERING PIANO

Recital Activities Diminish in Chicago

Chicago, March 31.—Considerable shrinkage was noticeable in the list of recitals for the past week. The only recitalists heard were Renee Thornton, Clara Clemens, Isador Berger, Hans Hess, Elsa Chandler, and Esther Walrath Lash.

Mme. Thornton, accompanied by Richard Hageman, sang before the Musicians' Club of Women in the Blackstone Theatre. Edward Moore wrote in the Tribune that an unusual program, her "exceptionally lovely singing" and the "superb" accompaniments made the recital "the most pronounced success" she ever achieved in Chicago."

According to Karleton Hackett of the Post, "there is not as yet much variety of tone coloring in her singing and the full voiced phrases are not always evenly sustained. But she has fine artistic appreciation and knows well just what she wishes to do." Glenn Dillard Gunn (Herald-Examiner) commented on her "slight but lovely voice" and the "incomparable" accompaniments of Mr. Hageman.

At the second of her series of seven historical song recitals, Clara Clemens sang airs by Bach, Gluck, Handel, Lully, Rameau, Purcell, Scarlatti, Pergolesi, Paradies, Mozart, Spohr, Haydn, Beethoven, Weber, and Loewe. Maurice Rosenfeld (News) commended Mme. Clemens for the good taste evidenced by her selections.

Mr. Berger concluded his series of violin recitals at Kimball Hall with a Tschaikowsky program, assisted by Mossaye Boguslawski, Bruno Steindel, and a string ensemble under the direction of Herman Felber, Jr. A violin concerto played by Mr. Berger was "a brilliant piece of virtuosity," in the opinion of Mr. Gunn. According to Mr. Rosenfeld, the Trio was interpreted "with songful, musical style, with a blending of tone which was commendable and with the abandon and freedom which the work demanded.

Hans Hess, cellist, was commended by Mr. Gunn for "a tone of virile, rather penetrating quality, sturdy rhythms, a fine sense of form and of the melodic diction necessary to its definition."

Photo by Kesslere

RAFAELO DIAZ

Tenor Whose Singing Is One of the High Lights of the Metropolitan's Performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Coq d'Or.

As Mr. Hackett expressed it, there was in Mr. Hess' playing "appreciation for the music, mellow tone and clean technique." The romanza in the Lalo Concerto he played "with poetic feeling and sustained the melody with tone of lovely quality and delicate shading." According to Mr. Rosenfeld, he displayed "technical facility and carrying tone."

Miss Chandler, pianist, and Mrs. Lash, soprano, appeared at the last concert of the Young American Artists' Series at Recital Hall. Mr. Hackett said Miss Chandler showed "a good technical equipment and understanding of the music, though not quite the imaginative power to make clear the illusive meaning"; and that Mrs. Lash displayed self possession, clean enunciation, and a hard tone quality. According to Mr. Moore, each seemed "beyond her present acquirements in the art of music."

GRADOVA

"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

FORREST
LAMONT
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

INA BOURSKAYA
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Metropolitan Opera Company—Chicago Civic Opera Company
Concert Management: S. HUROK, INC. Aeolian Hall, New York City

MUZIO
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Musical Chicago En Courant

San Carlo Company Starts Week of Performances; Schwarz Not With Opera Next Season.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, March 31.

FORTUNE GALLO, who in fifteen years of touring the United States has succeeded in making opera pay without the aid of subscription or guarantee, has merged the two sections of the San Carlo Grand Opera Company, and has invaded the home of the Chicago Civic Company for a week's presentation of its wares. The repertoire is that which has made the companies popular on the road, the familiar list of Aida, Butterfly, Carmen, Traviata, the twin Cavalleria and Pagliacci, Boheme, Martha, Trovatore and Faust.

Particular interest is manifest in the Wednesday matinee performance of Carmen sung in English by a cast with one exception American born, and in at least four instances resident in Chicago. Isaac Van Grove, who has been operating with the Civic company, will conduct. The translation used is that of Charles Henry Meltzer from the Edith Rockefeller McCormick edition. The American Opera Society and the Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs are active in co-operation with the San Carlo Company.

The Gallo San Carlo companies afford large outlet for good American talent. Fully two-thirds of his singers are Americans. This puts ready to his hand the necessary singers for the light opera company which Mr. Gallo is recruiting for a five weeks' season in Memphis, Tenn., to start late in May.

THE FOLLOWING ITEM appeared in the Chicago Tribune last Thursday: "Musician Pay Hits High 'C.' Civic Opera Orchestra Salaries Largest in World With New Increase. Musicians playing for the Chicago Civic Opera Company will receive a substantial salary increase for the season of 1925-26 despite the $400,000 deficit last season. James C. Petrillo, president of the Chicago Federation of Musicians, has obtained a new contract through which their salaries will amount to $150 a week.

"Last year the musicians obtained an increase of 25 per cent and 19 per cent on rehearsals. This made them the highest paid members of any orchestra in the world, not excluding the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, according to Mr. Petrillo. The new scale is $119 a week plus rehearsals, on which they obtain $8 a week increase. The old scale was $111 a week."

Things would seem to be looking up for the musicians and down for the guarantors.

AT LEAST two announcements of the personnel of the Chicago Civic Company for next year would seem to have been premature. A telegram from Feodor Chaliapin's American manager, S. Hurok, states explicitly that the Russion basso will not sing with the Chicago company and that his appearances for the season will be limited to an engagement with the Metropolitan in New York and a concert tour across the country.

H. M. Johnson, business manager of the Chicago company, admitted Chaliapin's absence from the list of singers, but made no comment as to necessary changes in casting the Chaliapin operas, Boris Godunoff and Mefistofele.

Joseph Schwarz has also announced his intention of remaining away from Chicago next season.

Robert Steel, an American baritone who was expected to join the company last season, but who remained in Rome instead, is now announced for appearance here next year. He has been singing recently in Venice and Milan in the roles of Tonio in Pagliacci and Germont the elder in Traviata.

COMPOSITIONS by Chicago composers occupied a large part of the program offered by the Chicago Madrigal Club in its annual concert last Thursday night. D. A. Clippinger, conductor of the chorus, states that the club policy of featuring a prize composition each year for the past twenty-three years has reaped rich reward in its available repertoire of choral works. About 100 such have been published. Three were featured on last week's program, May A. Strong's May Comes Laughing, this year's prize winner; Adolf Weidig's Sing Again, My Heart, and Chant It, which was last year's prize composition; and Louis Victor Saar's What Care I? written for the club last year. Rollin Pease, in capacity of soloist, sang a group of songs by John Alden Carpenter. Rossiter Cole, Daniel Protheroe, Jeanne Boyd and Arthur Dunham were other local composers whose compositions were favored.

The Civic Orchestra drew a large meed of praise from a large audience at its last concert of the season at Orchestra Hall on Sunday. The praise was deserved, as the orchestral growth of this student orchestra each season is truly remarkable. Conductors Stock and deLamarter must feel fully repaid for their labors by such a performance as their well nourished orchestral babies gave on Sunday. Mr. deLamarter conducted the concert in a way to show that the orchestra was a vent for his own fine talent with the baton. Raymond Koch, artist pupil of Marx Oberndorfer, was the soloist, singing the prologue to Pagliacci, and as an encore the cavatina from Faust.

The Thursday night popular program of the Chicago Symphony permitted Kathryn Witwer to show how she had won the Society of American Musicians' contest for singers by singing the prescribed aria from Verdi's Forza del Destino.

WHEN ADOLPH BOLM moves to Buenos Aires this summer to stage Petrouchka and Le Coq d'Or at the Colon Theatre, he will have the assistance of two premiere dancers, Anna Ludmilla, formerly of the Civic Opera, and Ruth Page, who danced on the Allied Arts programs this year. Miss Page is at present fulfilling guest performances with the Diaghileff ballet in Monte Carlo.

NEWS NOTES from the Gunn School are that: the school will move its quarters on May 1 to the Fine Arts building; Lee Pattison has returned from his concert tour with Guy Maier and has resumed his teaching; Amy Neill will join the faculty April 1; Leo Sowerby's activities will continue throughout the summer, as will Erie deLamarter's summer master classes.

Stock Offers Collins Concerto

Chicago Hears American Composer Play; Civic Orchestra Ends Its Season.

Chicago, March 31.—A piano Concerto in E flat major by a young American composer-pianist, Edward Collins, was given its first performance by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, last week. Mr. Collins played the solo part.

Maurice Rosenfeld of the News found the Concerto "constructed with evident musical skill, with an adept knowledge of the scope of the modern symphony orchestra, with an original plan of utilizing the spirit and the rhythmic bustle characteristic of American musical invention." He thought that the composer played "with great swing and brilliance." According to Edward Moore of the Tribune, "all three movements are direct in action, well written, and not too long; the third, constructed on some jazzy rhythms would seem to have stepped from the field of worthy effort into definite accomplishment. . . .. In interesting figures, in spirited action, above all in brilliant performance, it is excellent."

In the opinion of Glenn Dillard Gunn (Herald-Examiner) the Concerto "abounds in effects, but has few ideas. The last movement is the best." He thought Mr. Collins displayed "efficient piano playing, precise, spirited, technically infallible, tonally resonant, rhythmically decisive." Karleton Hackett of the Post observed that "it was joyous and vigorous music, with forceful melodic basis and strongly accented rhythms. There were energy in the creative impulse and fine workmanship in the manner of expression. It had the structural sense and was well knit together. The contrasts of mood were clearly expressed through richly colored orchestration and the rhythmic quality was of constant variety and interest. . . . Mr. Collins played the piano part brilliantly. His tone was full and sure."

The other works conducted by Mr. Stock were Brahms' Fourth Symphony, and the Bach Suite in B minor for strings and flutes.

* * *

Kathryn Witwer, soprano, was the soloist at the popular concert of the orchestra Thursday night. Mr. Moore wrote that she sang "with excellent tone and apparently complete understanding." The program consisted of The Sorcerer's Apprentice by Dukas, the Berceuse of Signe Lund, Massenet's Le Cid, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

* * *

The Civic Orchestra, trained by Frederick Stock and Eric de Lamarter, closed its sixth season at Orchestra Hall Sunday afternoon with Raymond Koch as soloist. Under Mr. de Lamarter's baton, the orchestra played Auber's The Dumb Girl of Portici, two movements from Moritz Moszkowski's Suite, In Foreign Lands, the march from Tannhaeuser, and an excerpt from Ippolitow-Ivanow's Caucasian Sketches.

Mr. Hackett found Mr. Koch's voice sounded "rich and had the true operatic range, so that he added the high A flat with certainty. There was resonant timbre, though, with a tendency to sing the upper notes a bit too open. He had excellent style and sang with spirit."

According to Mr. Gunn his is a voice "of abundant power, of virile timbre, used with intelligent appreciation of its capacities and an excellent sense of drama." Mr. Rosenfeld said the soloist "has a good, resonant voice of high range, pleasing and well trained." The reviewers were as one in praising the remarkable strides made by this orchestra.

* * *

A concert of Lenten music was given by the Paulist Choristers, conducted by LeRoy Wetzel, under the auspices of Loyola University, in Orchestral Hall on Friday. Claire Dux was the assisting artist, and Watt Webber, Charles Cooley and Joseph Mollengraft also were heard in solos.

Edward Moore wrote that Mme. Dux "did some heavenly solo singing" and that Mercandante's Thousands of Sins Oppress Me "was a performance of sheer delight." In Mr. Gunn's opinion, she is "a charming concert artist" and Mr. Hackett commented that she sang with "lovely tone and understanding of the text."

This writer considered Mr. Webber's voice, "though light, of good quality and his range sufficient." According to Mr. Gunn "his voice has charming lyric quality, is slight in volume, and refreshingly youthful" and Mr. Moore thought his voice has a quality "quite out of the ordinary and he would seem to possess much of both the sense and sensibility of music.'

Mr. Wetzel received favorable notices, and Mr. Gunn wrote of the chorus: "the tone is not voluminous, but it is beautifully balanced between the four voices, vital, flexible, especially attractive in alto, tenor and bass divisions." Mr. Hackett found that "the choral tone had full body and the sopranos were particularly good. Their tone was pure and gratifyingly true to pitch."

* * *

The program at the concert of the Madrigal Club, D. A. Clippinger conductor, at Kimball Hall on Thursday consisted of prize compositions written for the organization. The organization has completed twenty-five years of existence. The soloist was Rollin Pease, who, to quote Mr. Hackett, sang with "appreciation for the music" and with "notably good" enunciation.

The twin organ concert given at the Chicago theatre Sunday afternoon by Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Crawford included on the program Vice President Charles G. Dawes' Melody. Lillian Winter, soprano, was the assisting artist, and both Mr. Rosenfeld and Mr. Gunn lauded the "temperamental quality" and clear diction in her singing.

Photo by Mishkin

MME. MARIE SUNDELIUS

As Marguerite in Faust, a Role Which She Sang at the Metropolitan Opera With Success Last Wednesday Evening.

Reappointed Zoo Opera Head

Cincinnati, March 30.—Ralph A. Lyford has been reappointed managing director of the Zoo opera company for its eight weeks' season this summer. This will be Mr. Lyford's sixth season in this post, which he has held since the Zoo productions began.

Produce Operas in English

Chicago, March 31.—Cavalleria Rusticana and the Enchanted Well, both in English, will be given as a double bill here on April 12 by the University and Smetana Choral Association.

Varied Ensembles Are Heard in Cincinnati

Mildred Dilling Assists de Reszke Singers; Symphony Quartet in Last Concert.

Cincinnati, March 30.—With a concert by the de Reszke Singers and Mildred Dilling, harpist, last Monday the Matinee Musical Club, of which Adolf Hahn is president, closed its season.

The program was made up of seventeenth century French songs, English madrigals, negro spirituals, Studies in Imitation by Herbert Hughes, and Mendelssohn's On Wings of Song, the last with harp accompaniment. The members of the quartet, Hardesty Johnson, Floyd Townsley, Ervin Mutch, and Sigurd Nelson, received commendation for their ensemble and individual voices.

Mrs. Plogstedt, reviewer of the Post, thought that the four singers "reflected the greatest credit on their illustrious master, Jean de Reszke." One reviewer declared their ensemble equal to that of the finest string quartets. Of Miss Dilling the Commercial-Tribune chronicler said, her playing and personality "were so successful that one might express the wish to have her for another concert next year." Pierne, Bach, Debussy, Zapel, and others were among the composers whose pieces she played.

An outstanding music event of the season was the appearance of the Cincinnati Symphony Quartet on March 26. The group consists of Emil Heermann and Sigmund Culp, violins; Karl Kirksmith, viola; and Edward Kreiner, cello. For Brahms' Quintet in G, Opus 111, which was on the program, Carle Wunderle, violist, assisted the quartet. The other number on the program was the Schubert Quartet in A minor, Opus 29. The concert was warmly received by press and audience. It closed the season of this ensemble.

Mrs. Thomas Prewitt Williams, pianist, and Peter Frohlich, violist, gave an evening of sonatas of Schubert, Hans Sitt, and York Bowen at Conservatory Hall on March 24.

B. G.

Introduces Uruguayan Novelty

Syracuse, April 5.—The first performance in the United States of Edoardo Fabini's Symphonic poem, Campo, took place yesterday at the concert of the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Vladimir Shavitch. Fabini is a native of Uruguay.

Aeolian Company Finds New Home

The Aeolian Company, which deserted Fifth Avenue twelve years ago, for its present home on Forty-second Street, which it recently sold, is to return to the Avenue, it is announced, and will occupy quarters in a building to be erected on the northeast corner of Fifty-fourth Street.

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

RUTH BRETON
VIOLINIST
"A welcome apparition on the concert stage."
(Lawrence Gilman, N. Y. Herald-Tribune)
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York
Packard Building, Philadelphia

MAY KORB
Lyric Coloratura Soprano
Exclusive Management
R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

Sensational in Opera Triumphant in Concert
Jeritza
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
Sole management Metropolitan Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall New York City
Knabe Piano Victor Records

ELLEN BALLON Pianist

"Not since Teresa Carreno's warm blooded performance here has such eager, ardent and picturesque playing been heard in these parts. Her effect on her hearers was electrical. She received uproarious applause and played encores in plenty."

New York American.

"She possesses qualities of interpretation and virtuosity, which place her on a level with the greatest celebrities."

Montreal La Press.

"Let us say at once that Miss Ballon fully merited the spontaneous acclaim of her numerous audience."

Montreal La Patrie.

"Ellen Ballon, in recital at Windsor Hall last night, brought Montreal such music as is often read about but rarely heard; masterful, facile, intellectual and at the same time emotional without being extravagant."

Montreal Gazette.

EXCLUSIVE MANAGEMENT

DANIEL MAYER

AEOLIAN HALL NEW YORK

STEINWAY PIANO

ARTHUR

SHATTUCK

Pianist

"His interpretations are convincing, beautiful and wonderfully interesting."

Chicago American.

These three popular artists available for a very limited period only from March 15th, 1926 to April 15th, 1926 in a Joint Recital of Solos, Duos and Trios

SASCHA

JACOBSEN

Violinist

"A player of poise and brilliant clarity."

New York Times.

FOR TERMS AND DATES
Apply to
DANIEL MAYER
Aeolian Hall New York
STEINWAY PIANO

HANS

KINDLER

'Cellist

"A master of his instrument."—
Washington Times.

American Cast Scores in Aida

President Attends Inaugural Performance; Capital Visited by Three Symphony Orchestras; Varied Concerts.

Washington, D. C., March 28.—The gala event of Inauguration Week, signalized by the presence of the President and the ladies of the White House party during the second act, was the Aida of the Washington Opera Company under Edouard Albion's direction, Jacques Samassoud conducting. "The big moment of the evening," said Mrs. Poe in the Post, "was the debut of John Charles Thomas in grand opera. The unanimous conclusion was that he had made good. He made a striking appearance, displayed histrionic ability and his superb voice was very telling and of true operatic quality. . . . The heralded showing of a new tenor in Hunter Kimball was at least partially sustained. He has a most pleasing voice, dramatic force and fine stage presence."

Miss MacBride in the Times noted "as many as six curtain calls following several scenes" as indicating that "Washington was alive and appreciative beyond her usual mood." This reviewer expressed the opinion: "Thomas, in his first grand opera performance leaps to front rank as interpretative actor, with a voice that transcends any that Washington has heard in this role" (Amonasro). She thought Kimball "truly a find" with "a rarely beautiful voice, not yet reaching the heights of tenor robusto caliber." . . . "Our own Tittmann as the High Priest has grown in operatic stature to commanding heights. . . . The great climax of the full chorus in the return of the victor was splendidly given; the groups alive and mobile in their limited space."

The Evening Star thought "highest honors for inspiration and for truly operatic singing must be given the Aida of Frances Peralta and the Amneris of Jeanne Gordon, for the smoothness of the performance, the finish of their tonal work. . . . Above all, the quality of enthusiastic, dramatic sincerity and love of their respective roles dominated both characterizations. . . . Kimball was extremely nervous at first. His voice however is of really beautiful quality." Miss Root of the News recorded that to Jeanne Gordon went "perhaps the most spontaneous ovation of the evening." The few moments of Paul Tchernikoff's dancing in the ballet were much mentioned.

* * *

On the afternoon of that day the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, played Purcell's Trumpet Suite, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Strauss' Don Juan, and, with Hans Kindler, a Valentini cello suite and Bloch's Schelemo. "A program somewhat different from the ordinary," wrote Miss Joyce in the Times. T. Arthur Smith, Inc., has announced that these concerts will be given in the new Auditorium next winter. The National Theatre has long been unable to meet the demand for seats.

Later in the week these managers presented the Hinshaw players in Mozart's The Impresario. Mrs. Brooks of the Herald said Washington had "seldom if ever seen so dainty and exquisite a thing." The co-stars were Hazel Huntington, Lottice Howell, Henri Scott, Frances Tyler and Harold Hansen, particularly sympathetic in the role of Mozart himself.

Later concerts under the same management were those of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and of Alfred Cortot. Mr. Mengelberg presented a truly heroic program, consisting of Beethoven's Eroica and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben. Miss Fetter in the Star wrote that "the multiple beauties of the Beethoven score had never been more finely shaded and emphasized. . . . Perhaps the outstanding feature of the Strauss was the love episode, with beautifully played violin solos by Mr. Guidi."

Mr. Cortot's program was unconventional, including, besides a dozen Chopin Etudes, Franck's Prelude, Choral and Fugue, Debussy's Children's Corner, and Moussorgsky's Pictures from an Exposition. The Post found his "singing tone of unusual quality."

* * *

Mrs. Wilson-Greene's offerings comprised a Carmen Fantasy, in which the Evening Star thought Geraldine Farrar "eclipsed" Carmen; the de Reszke Singers and Alberto Salvi in a program that gave much pleasure; Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was found "as supreme as ever," and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison. "These two boys—for youth is of the spirit," wrote Miss MacBride in the Times, "dare indulge in astonishing rubatos, amazing quick pauses, a freedom in tumult of runs or trills that are interchanged with an abandon that is unbelievable. . . . Tone qualities, too, of the modern piano in its most elusive moods they bring out." Mrs. Brooks of the Herald thought it one of the most brilliant concerts of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's series.

The last concert of the season by the New York Symphony Orchestra under the same local management was distinguished by the first performance anywhere of Gustav Strube's Lanier Symphony, with the composer conducting; by Walter's leading of Tschaikowsky's Romeo and Juliet, and by the collaboration of Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis with the orchestra in Mozart's Concerto for violin and viola. Miss Fetter in the Star found in the Symphony "an undercurrent of rich melody that would suggest calm, invincible faith, such as rings through the poems of the nature-loving Lanier." Mr. Walter and his men also played the night before in the Fine Arts course, in which Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique held the place of honor. The concert of the National Polish Orchestra, colorful, unpretentious and refreshing, was also a recent feature of Washington's music.

* * *

Of choral concerts—a type no more highly in favor here than in our other large cities—Washington had the Rubinstein Club under Claude Robeson with Reinald Werrenrath's assistance in solo; the Interstate Male Chorus under Clayde B. Aitchinson, with Ross Farrar as soloist; and the Washington Choral Society, under Charles Wengerd in Rossini's Stabat Mater. The soloists of the last concert were Mrs. Florence Sindell, Thelma Smith, substituting for Mrs. Wm. T. Reed, who was ill; W. F. Raymond, tenor; and J. H. Marville, bass.

Two concerts of American music in aid of the MacDowell Colony have been offered by the Washington Alumnae Club, Mu Phi Epsilon. Mrs. Beach was presented in the first as pianist and composer, assisted by Gretchen Hood, soprano, and Mary Howe, pianist. Charles Wakefield and the Princess Tsianina were second in the series.

A vocal recital by Mme. Marica Palesti, formerly of the Moscow Opera, won favorable comment. According to the Times "a musical intelligence of a high order was evident in all her numbers, and her ample delivery aroused special enthusiasm."

M. G. S.

Oratorio Gets $5,000 Gift

A gift of $5,000 has been received by the New York Oratorio Society from the Carnegie Foundation, the sum to go toward covering the expenses of the Society during this season, which closes tomorrow night with the singing of Franck's Beatitudes in Carnegie Hall.

Beniamino Gigli Is Heard in N. Y. Concert

A capacity audience applauded Beniamino Gigli in his concert at Carnegie Hall, New York, March 30 for the benefit of the Soldier's Home in Rome. The Italian tenor was assisted by Beatrice Mack, soprano, and Vito Carnevali accompanied.

The Herald Tribune commentator found Mr. Gigli "in good voice, with his familiar, freely flowing tones," although he was reported slightly indisposed. The Sun reported that he used "his beautiful voice lavishly and showed rare skill in phrasing and dynamics. In certain operatic airs some undue forcing of tone produced only a magnetic influence upon the auditors, and again, in some of the songs, falsetto sob and other effects, together with charm and abundant sentiments, proved of enthralling value to his purpose."

Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) commented that he sang Le Roi d'Ys, which was substituted for Aida, "charmingly and without trace of illness." Mr. Sanborn also wrote that "Mr. Gigli is a rare tenor. He possesses a delicious voice; he is adept in the lovely graces of bel canto." The Post did not find him "in especially good voice." Although many of his notes were "lusciously beautiful," there was some huskiness in his head tones as well as some falsetto.

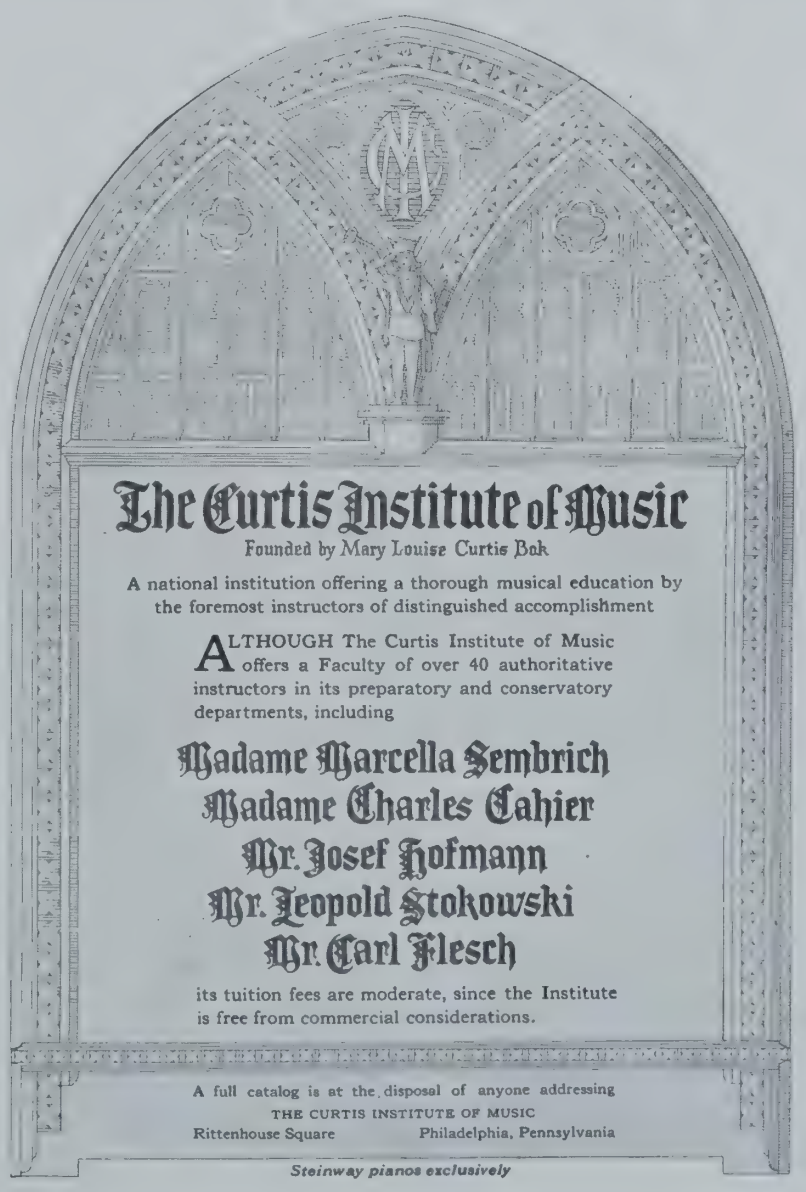
Mr. Sanborn observed that Miss Mack's "fresh and limpid soprano, soundly trained and used with intelligence and taste, was heard with pleasure." The Post had it that her voice "is true and sweet, but seemed thin and at times a little shrill . . . She has a pleasing personality and sings with plenty of expression."

BONCI

VOCAL STUDIO

For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900. New York City

Knabe Piano



The Curtis Institute of Music
Founded by Mary Louise Curtis Bok
A national institution offering a thorough musical education by the foremost instructors of distinguished accomplishment
ALTHOUGH The Curtis Institute of Music offers a Faculty of over 40 authoritative instructors in its preparatory and conservatory departments, including
Madame Marcella Sembrich
Madame Charles Cahier
Mr. Josef Hofmann
Mr. Leopold Stokowski
Mr. Carl Flesch
its tuition fees are moderate, since the Institute is free from commercial considerations.
A full catalog is at the disposal of anyone addressing
THE CURTIS INSTITUTE OF MUSIC
Rittenhouse Square Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Steinway pianos exclusively

On The Music Highway

SOPHIE BRASLAU gave her Chicago recital on April 5. On April 11 and 14 she is soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra and Schola Cantorum in New York and on April 16 she makes her only New York recital appearance of the season.

Anna Case, soprano, has just returned to New York from two concerts in Ames and Grinnell, Iowa. She sang last Saturday at Atlantic City in the Haddon Hall series of musicales and will sail for Europe on April 16 to make her debut appearances in Amsterdam and Berlin. In the former city she is appearing as soloist with orchestra under the direction of Willem Mengelberg.

John Barclay has been engaged to sing in Franck's Beatitudes with the Oratorio Society in New York tomorrow and with the Philharmonic Orchestra and Schola Cantorum in Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music on April 11 and 14.

Evsei Beloussoff, Russian cellist, who has just come under the management of Daniel Mayer, will give a series of three recitals next season in Aeolian Hall. The dates are October 15, December 10 and January 27. Of these the second recital on December 10 will be devoted to sonatas for cello and piano, Mr. Gabrilowitsch sharing the program. The third recital on January 27 will be devoted to music by Bach, and will include works for cello alone, for cello and harpsichord, and for cello and piano. Wanda Landowska will share the program with Mr. Beloussoff.

An organization called Musicians' Enterprises, of which Manfred Malkin is head, has been formed in New York, and aims to combine musicians for their personal advantage on a profit-sharing basis. In general the object of the enterprise is to improve the artistic condition and financial condition of musicians. In particular there is planned the foundation of a society of stockholding, profit-sharing members, composed of music teachers and other musicians, which is to establish a chain of retail music stores in all parts of the city, owned by musicians, and operated by appointed experts solely for their benefit. The stores will be public.

Remoter plans of Musicians' Enterprises call for the organization of an orchestra, and the establishment of an auditorium, a concert bureau, and a student orchestra. Many well known musicians have bought stock, according to Mr. Malkin, or endorsed the project in letters.

Max Rosen, who reappeared in recital recently after an absence of several seasons, gives a second violin recital at Carnegie Hall on Friday evening, with Richard Wilens at the piano. Mr. Rosen will play two concertos, the Nardini E minor and the Dvorak A minor, a group of short pieces by Franko, Chopin-Huberman, Bach-Kreisler and Wladigeroff's Bulgarian Rhapsody, which he introduced here at his previous concert. In this work the artist lowers the G string one-third during certain passages to obtain the tonal effects demanded by the composer.

The fifth and final appearances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at each of these concerts two choral works — Scriabin's Prometheus, A Poem of Fire, and Borodin's Dances from Prince Igor. Koussevitzky was the first to produce Prometheus, and indeed a number of Scriabin's principal works, in Russia. The composer took the piano part at the first Moscow performance of this score. The chorus at these performances will be taken by the Cecilia Society of Boston, and the piano part by Alexander Steinert.

There will also be played at the Thursday concert, Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major for String Orchestra and Solo String Quartette, and Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

The remaining numbers of the final matinee program will be Respighi's arrangement of Old Dances and Airs, and Debussy's Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals.

Samuel Gardner, violinist, and John Powell, pianist, will appear in a joint recital in Plainfield, N. J., Tuesday evening, April 28, under the auspices of the Plainfield Concert Society.

Mr. Powell will be one of the artists to appear in the All-American music festival to be held in Buffalo next October.

Mischa Elman and his string quartet will make their third and final appearance of the season at Town Hall on Wednesday evening, April 15. The program will comprise quartets by Haydn, Mozart and Brahms. Mr. Elman plans to continue his series of chamber music concerts for next season. The quartet will make three appearances at Aeolian Hall on December 1, February 16 and April 6.

William Bachaus makes his last New York appearance of the season at Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon when he will give a Chopin program. There is no sonata on this program, which includes the twenty-four preludes and the twelve studies, as well as the Romance from the E minor Concerto (arranged for solo piano by Mr. Bachaus), and three works in A flat—the Ballade, a waltz and the Polonaise.

The Wolfsohn Musical Bureau has announced that among the cities which will have a Wolfsohn series next season will be Akron, Ohio. The dates and the artists for Akron will be: Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, October 13; Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, November 17; Cecilia Hansen, violinist, December 15; Olga Samaroff, pianist, January 12; Hulda Lashanska, soprano, February 16; and Edward Johnson, tenor, March 2.

Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, has fully recovered from the severe attack of ptomaine poisoning which forced her to cancel some of her New York recitals. The artist appeared lately in Moline, Ill., Pittsburgh. Pa., Syracuse, N. Y., and Boston, Mass. In those two last cities she was heard with Orchestra, in the Variations Symphoniques, by Cesar Franck.

Mme. Schnitzer is at present on her way to the Coast, where she is booked for concert tours through Northern and Southern California, Washington, and British Columbia.

Marie Tiffany sings in California, Pa., on April 14. Shortly thereafter Miss Tiffany will go on tour as soloist with the Minneapolis Orchestra.

The Columbia University Glee Club, directed by Walter Henry Hall, gave its third annual New York concert in Town Hall Thursday evening, with Nora Fauchald, soprano, as assisting artist.

Clarence Whitehill, baritone, has been engaged to appear as soloist with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra next season.

Tomorrow evening in Aeolin Hall, New York, Burnerdene Mason, contralto, will sing a program of songs by Wilson, Lalo, Saint-Saens, Verdi, Debussy, Burleigh, Dvorak, Meyerbeer, Hageman, Carpenter, and Gounod.

On March 29, Marie Sundelius will give a recital at the Norwegian Seamen's Church for the benefit of the philanthropic work connected with this institution.

In the final musicale, on March 24, of the series given by Joseph Adler in New York, Gretchen Altpeter, soprano, substituted for Kathryn Meisle. Vladimir Dubinsky also appeared in a group of cello soli.

May Peterson, soprano, was heard in concert March 19, in Pilgrim Hall, New York, for the benefit of the Bethany Kindergarten and other philanthropic undertakings of the Society for Women's Work.

Seventy choruses of children's voices from the public schools of New York City, including more than 4,000 singers in all, began preliminary competitions last week under the auspices of the Music Week Association. The eliminations will continue until the final competitions of the best choruses take place during Music Week in May.

Arthur Whiting and the Lenox String Quartet gave their fifth and last concert on March 25 in the annual series of classical and modern chamber music at Cambridge, Mass. The program included Ravel, Mozart, and Schumann.

Guiomar Novaes, Brazilian pianist, who next season will be under the direction of Concert Management Arthur Judson, will play an all-Chopin program in her final New York appearance of this season in Town Hall next Saturday afternoon.

Walter Damrosch will be at the head of the New York Symphony Orchestra when it takes part in the coming May festival under the auspices of the Westchester County Recreation Commission beginning on the fourteenth of next month. The orchestra will accompany a chorus of 2,000 voices. Among the soloists who will be heard are Florence Easton, Katherine Meisle, Arthur Middleton, and Paul Althouse. Mrs. Eugene Meyer is chairman of the commission.

A special performance of Cavalleria Rusticana together with Pagliacci will be given at the New York Metropolitan Opera House next Monday afternoon for the benefit of the free municipal open air opera season which will be held in Brooklyn this summer. The entire proceeds of the double bill will be turned over to the Mayor's Committee of Music. The artists who will take part are Florence Easton, Armand Tokatyan, and Millo Picco; and Queena Mario, Giovanni Martinelli, and Antonio Scotti. Mr. Papi will be the conductor.

Charles Stratton sings with the Albany (N. Y.) Choral Club April 21, and on May 14 and 15 he will make his sixth appearance at the Nashua (N. H.) Festival within five years.

A short recital of Maria Carreras, Italian pianist, will be broadcasted next Saturday afternoon by stations in Schenectady, New York, and Washington, D. C. Luiza Tetrazzini, together with a private party, will listen in on the concert in her home in Rome. Mme. Tetrazzini is said to be the only private person in Italy whom the Italian Government allows the ownership of a radio receiving set. The concert will be received there on Sunday morning, Rome time.

Endorsed by the New York State Federation of Music Clubs, a concert is being given tonight in the Carnegie Chamber Music Hall by Mabel Zoeckler, soprano; Martin Burton, pianist; Nell Esslinger, contralto; Daniel Seidenberg, cellist, and Viola Blanchay, coloraturo soprano.

NINETEENTH
BACH FESTIVAL
DR. J. FRED. WOLLE
Conductor
Fri., May 29th—4 p. m. and 8 p. m.
Christmas Oratorio
Sat., May 30th—1 p. m. and 4 p. m.
Mass in B Minor
Bach Choir, 250 Voices
Members Philadelphia Orchestra
Soloists—Organ
Moravian Trombone Choir
For tickets and information, address Bach Choir, 304 Wilbur Trust Bldg.
BETHLEHEM, Pa.
Packer Memorial Church
LEHIGH UNIVERSITY

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

WINIFRED BYRD
America's Pianist
Management: Marie Gouled
25 West 42d St., New York

Fleta
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

Recitals Draw Many Bostonians

Mmes. Culp, Zulalian, and Cobb Sing; Heifetz, Risman and Oswald Appear.

Boston, March 31.—Large audiences were attracted by the recent recital of Julia Culp, Rose Zulalian, and Mildred Cobb, vocalists; Jascha Heifetz and Julius Risman, violinists; and Alfredo Oswald, pianist.

Of Mme. Culp's Jordan Hall recital Saturday, the Transcript reviewer wrote, "the depths and the warmths of song remain at her command; while she now excels herself in the summoning and the shading of its more sombre coloring. . . . Her diction keeps clarity, plasticity and unforced suggestion."

The chronicler in the Herald thought that, although Mme. Culp "sometimes gave more tone than she can at present make sound beautiful, her half voice is often still of an entrancing beauty, of a lustre truly splendid. Her diction is clearer than ever, of a finer significance than ever. Her phrases often have a grace, a loveliness very rare." Both writers commented that occasionally the singer over-emphasized the meaning of her song.

* * *

Rose Zulalian, contralto, was heard in recital last Tuesday, accompanied by Margaret Kent Hubbard. According to Evelyn Gerstein (Herald) "her voice is large and of a wide range, in its middle register of a dark and beautiful quality, and full of resonance; and, although her head tones were often delicate and well placed, she took all dramatic climaxes in the upper register harshly, even metallicly." Miss Gerstein also admired her "ardent temperament, rich sentiment, flair for style."

The Transcript commentator observed that Miss Zulalian's voice "is large and rich and beautiful. It ranges from tones well up in the soprano register to deep sonorous low tones. It is capable of many degrees of power, from subtle pianissimo to forte of burning intensity. It modulates through many shades and tints of tonal color. Through all its variety it maintains its excellent quality. Miss Zulalian knows how to use her voice, but better than all these is that to which she makes them all servant, her musicianly intelligence."

* * *

The Herald reviewer wrote that Mildred Cobb, soprano, "brought a delightful voice to a hearing, a voice lovely all through its long range when not forced at all, but of especially fine quality in the low and lower medium registers. . . . She phrases musically." He also praised her for her distinct enunciation, but added that she should strive for a "neater attack."

To quote the review which appeared in the Transcript, "when she was not sliding on and off a note one began to suspect that her voice was rather unusual in quality and strength. Many luscious tones did she bring forth." This commentator was of the opinion that her voice "presents excellent material, excellent training, but not yet sufficient control to sing always consistently up to her best."

* * *

The usual large audience enthusiastically applauded the second recital here this season given by Jascha Heifetz. He was assisted at the piano by Isador Achron. The Globe reviewer thought most of his playing, "of course, as always, a delight to the ear," although "it seemed, on occasion that his interest flagged and his tone was flatter than is its wont. But as sheer playing it was very beautiful indeed."

* * *

The other violinist of the week was Julius Risman, who was accompanied by Samuel Goldstein. He introduced some new pieces by Bloch, Baal Shem. In the Transcript, the chronicler wrote that "his tone is large, full, round, not only in the rich lower register of the G string, but throughout the entire compass of the violin. . . . With such tone, with energetic rhythmic feeling, he was excellent mouthpiece for the intense Bloch."

According to the Herald, he played these works "admirably, with warm, strong tone, with sympathy for the insistently characteristic melody, with rhythm quite stirring, and throughout the improvisation with a finely romantic spirit. . . . Although he has not developed into a player of marked poetic feeling or of notable sweetness and light, beyond a doubt he approaches fine music in a finer spirit than lay in his grasp a year ago."

* * *

Alfredo Oswald gave a piano recital at Jordan Hall the previous week. To quote Mr. Mason, "Mr. Oswald's playing was delightful. He has a complete knowledge of the resources and capabilities of the piano. His tone is brilliant and varied; he plays in musicianly fashion; and he seems to have a particularly clear and sympathetic understanding of music of the modern school."

Mr. Hale reported that he showed "an agreeable touch and fluent mechanism." The Transcript chronicler thought that some of the pieces by Villa Lobos were played "with considerable sense of humor, with many a characterizing or delineating turn." This writer praised the "admirable tones," poetry, and "splendid sense of climax" displayed in the Schumann works.

METROPOLITAN OPERA BILL

WEDNESDAY

Freischuetz—with Mmes. Rethberg and Dalossy; and Messrs. Taucher, Schuetzendorf, and Bohnen; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

THURSDAY

Faust (matinee)—with Mmes. Mario and Dalossy; and Messrs. Tokatyan, Chaliapin, and de Luca; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

Pelleas et Melisande (evening)—with Mmes. Bori, Howard, and Hunter; and Messrs. Johnson, Whitehill, and Rothier; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

FRIDAY

Parsifal (matinee)—with Mmes. Larsen-Todsen, Telva, and Roeseler; and Messrs. Taucher, Bohnen, Whitehill, Meader and Schuetzendorf; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

Samson et Dalila (evening)—with Mme. Branzell and Messrs. Martinelli, de Luca, and Mardones; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

SATURDAY

Rigoletto and Petrouchka (matinee)—the former with Mmes. Mario and Telva and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Danise, and Mardones; the latter with Mmes. Galli and Rudolph, and Messrs. Bolm, Bonfiglio, Bartik, and Agnini; Mr. Serafin conducting both performances.

Die Meistersinger (evening)—with Mmes. Mueller and Wakefield; and Messrs. Taucher, Bohnen, Rothier, and Schuetzendorf; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

MONDAY

Cavalleria and Pagliacci (matinee)—the former with Mme. Easton and Messrs. Tokatyan and Ballester; the latter with Mme. Mario and Messrs. Martinelli and Scotti. Mr. Papi conducting.

Pelleas et Melisande (evening)—with familiar cast.

EASTMAN
SCHOOL OF MUSIC
of
THE UNIVERSITY OF ROCHESTER

Summer Session

JUNE 22 — JULY 25, 1925

All Regular Departments in Session With Complete Faculties

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC

Faculty of Nationally Known Experts Offer Courses in

METHODS, INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC
(Woodwinds, Brasses, Strings)

PIANO CLASS TEACHING, APPRECIATION, VOCAL CLASS TEACHING, HARMONY

NORMAL AND REPERTORY CLASSES FOR PIANO TEACHERS

Organ Accompaniment of Motion Pictures

Academic Work in University in Conjunction with Music Study

For Information Address Director of Summer Session

EASTMAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC
ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

Again this Season

the Operatic Appearances of

Stella de Mette

Have Been Winning Significant Comment.

"Miss de Mette not only has a rich and warm contralto voice, but she is an actress of ability. Her work as Ortrud was an outstanding feature of the performance."—San Francisco Bulletin.

"She sang with clarity and considerable strength, rising to a tragic climax at the end."—San Francisco Call and Post.

"She made a dramatic impression that is unforgettable."—Philadelphia Record.

"She was able to cast a spell of illusion as well as sing."—Minneapolis Daily Star.

"Both her vocal and histrionic representations were excellently done. Her unerring artistic sense of the role lent much to the performance."—Detroit Evening Times.

"Miss de Mette is a fine artist and Carmen is one of her big chances. The part, of course, requires a singing actress and that Miss de Mette emphatically is—one of the very best."
—Detroit News.

"Dominating the stage at every appearance, she rendered her lines with passion and sincerity."—Detroit Evening Times.

"She is pretty, with a sparkle and vivacity for the part. Her voice is luscious as it should be for the role, passionate, tropical, and now and again rent with the lightning of her higher tones."—Spokane Spokesman-Review.

Formerly With Metropolitan Opera
Now Touring With San Carlo Opera

Exclusive Management of
ANTHONY BAGAROZY
Aeolian Hall, New York City

Another Triumph for Cobina Wright

BEFORE one of the most musically sophisticated audiences in the United States—The Palm Beach Colony—Cobina Wright repeated her New York triumph in her recital in the Kettler Theatre on March eighth.

The criticisms received from all papers are shown below, photographed directly from the press clippings without alteration of any kind. Such enthusiastic recognition is due to the exquisite beauty of her voice, a soprano of limpid and melting beauty, and the perfection of her art. The unique stage setting she uses seems but a fitting frame for the musical picture she evokes.

PALM BEACH POST

Gorgeous Italian Setting Features Wright Concert

Madame Cobina Wright, who appeared last night in concert at the Kettler theater, is thrice blessed with a marvellously sweet voice, a beautiful face and charming personality, and the soul of a true artist which is responsible for her performances being a thing of beauty not only to the ear but to the eye.

Never had one stage of the Kettler theatre presented a more soul satisfying aspect than it did last evening hung with magnificently wrought tapestries in the background and drapes of dull blue overhead. Tropical plants in profusion and a tall lighted taper in a wrought iron holder on either side of the stage completed the setting for the grand piano.

Amidst this luxurious and exotic setting stood the beautiful young singer, sheathed in a lustrous Renaissance gown of shimmering green velvet, her hair arranged with Madonna like simplicity and her face framed by large carved Italian earrings. In her hand she carried a small volume bound in Florentine leather.

Altogether in keeping with the magnificence of the setting and the beauty of the singer was the exquisite soprano voice which held the audience with its gloriously sweet cadences and rare appeal in interpretation, all permeated with the magnetic personality of Madame Wright.

Equally proficient in Italian, French, German and English, the singer was perhaps at her best in the Italian songs on the program, due perhaps to the association with the entire setting. Especially appealing in its loveliness was the ever beloved aria from La Boheme.

Opening with a group from Handel, Gluck and Scarlatti, Madame Wright next gave a German group featuring Brahms and Strauss, passing to several sprightly French numbers with an aria from Manon as the climax. After another group of Italian songs, Madame Wright concluded with four charming English numbers.

PALM BEACH TIMES

Mme. Wright Charms Audience with Songs in Artistic Recital

Seldom is an audience privileged to enjoy so completely an artistic evening as that afforded last night by Mme. Cobina Wright at the Kettler theatre. Possessed of a glorious soprano voice of lilting tenderness and of rare clarity and sweetness; of personal beauty, grace and charm, Mme. Wright further displayed her love for the beautiful and the artistic in her unusual stage setting.

It was perfected with the use of exquisite tapestries and potted plants, combined with which her stunning gown of emerald green velvet of the Rennaissance period presented a most artistic effect. A lighted candle in a tall wrought iron stand at either side of the front stage gave an added classic touch.

Mme. Wright's program in itself proved the true artist in her, as the five groups portrayed artistic and intelligent selection. So also did their rendition show that not only is her voice a "golden" voice but that she sings with thought and deep feeling. And her very high notes are accomplished with exquisite ease and sweetness and purity of tone seldom heard.

Through a different old Italian group which included the exacting "Mio Caro Bene," by Handel, the melodious aria "Il Trionfo di 'Clelia" by Gluck, in which continuity of tone and phrasing were delightful, and the lovely "kanzonette" by Scaraltti, Mme. Wright went into a German classic group which included two songs by Brahms and two by Strauss which were accomplished pleasingly.

Then followed a group of modern French numbers and it was in these that Mme. Wright seemed to come completely into her own, reaching a glorious climax in the aria from Manon, whose difficult passages were encompassed with an ease and an abandon typical of the true artist.

Another group of Italian songs, but from the modern school, displayed her complete surrender to the exquisiteness of her art, finishing again in an aria — this time from La Boheme. This compared favorably with her aria from Manon and reminded one of the operatic triumphs this young singer has enjoyed.

Four lovely but all too short songs in English completed the wonderful program. Of the four, it was perhaps Roifald's "Down in the Forest, with its difficult closing note of extremely high pitch through several measures with unwavering sweetness, that completely captivated the audience.

PALM BEACH NEWS

DELIGHTFUL SONGS BY COBINA WRIGHT

Famous Singer Offers Brilliant Program to Audience at Kettler Theater —Sings With Equal Beauty

Cobina Wright, well known in operatic circles in this country and abroad thrilled her audience by a brilliant recital in the Kettler Theater Sunday night. It is seldom that Palm Beach audiences have had the pleasure of hearing an artist of the calibre of Mrs. Wright, and they showed their appreciation of the rare deligh by bursts of applause, while others close the medium of flowers.

The selection of her numbers was particularly opportune, as it gave her an excellent opportunity to display the brilliance of her voice as well as the excellence of her technique. She was dominant in every instance. Her middle register was particularly fine, beautifully modulated in several of the numbers. The entire recital was a great triumph for her, and the approval of the audience meant more than it ordinarily does, for it was the verification of her triumph by one of the most discriminating audiences in the world.

Her program was opened by a Handel composition Mio Caro Bene. She sang t in excellent spirit, giving the audience just a taste of what was to follow. The air from Il Trionofo di Clelia, by Gluck was her next number. It was beautifully sung. She closed the first part of the programme with the delightful Kanzonette, of Scarlatti, a delightful lilting song of exquisite beauty. It challenged her ability to the utmost, and she responded with a range of technical and interpretational brilliance that drew a spontaneous burst of applause from the audience.

Her next two numbers were both Brahms, followed by two Strauss selections. She proved her great versatility by these songs, displaying the same beauty of technique and excellent tone that featured her previous numbers. To an Aeolian Harp and Nightingale were the Brahms numbers while Bad Weather and the Why Should We Seek to Hide our Passion were the Strauss compositions. Her ability could not be fairly judged by any less than the program that she offered her audience.

She ended the third part of her programme with the aria from Manon, and in this she rose to the heights of beauty in vocal offerings. The mastery she showed in the Massenet masterpiece was one that is proof of the high position that she occupies in the operatic firmament.

The Aria from La Boheme was the selection that brought the greatest applause from the audience. In the familiar Puccini aria she laid before the audience rare gems of vocal magnificence, making a gorgeous display of tonal beauty and effective dramatic interpretation. She was superb in every instance.

The last part of her programme was a perfect relaxation for the audience that had been given the essence of vocal delight. She presented the charming little ballads in English that were of a crystal beauty after the other rich offerings.

Exclusive Management

THE CONCERT GUILD

30 E. 14th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

WILLIAM C. GASSNER

Sing Mendelssohn's Elijah in Detroit

Detroit, March 31.—Mendelssohn's oratorio, Elijah, was given in Orchestra Hall last Tuesday evening by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony choir, and Arthur Middleton, Judson House, Rosalie Miller, Mary Allen, and Jeanette Reaume as soloists. Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducted.

According to Ralph Holmes of the Times, the chorus, trained by Victor Kolar, is "a fine and well drilled body of singers." Mr. Middleton, he added, "displayed the rich beauties of his sterling baritone voice" and Judson House sang "with marked beauty of tone and sufficient sense of the dramatic implications of the part." Eugene Leuchtmann (Free Press) commented that the work of the soloists was "of uniform excellence" and praised them individually. He also thought that "Mr. Gabrilowitsch read the work with a breadth and dignity which added considerably to the excellent work" of the chorus, soloists, and orchestra.

R. J. McLauchlin of the News observed that Mr. Middleton "combines his natural vocal endowments with an artistic maturity, a mellow musicianship, that makes his every declamation a perfect study in tone." He was impressed with Mr. House's "sweet, not over-vigorous tenor" and added that Miss Miller's voice "is scarcely a great one, but clear and true and she shows experience and fine cultivation." The other two singers received his commendation, and he considered that the chorus was "in excellent, lusty voice, attacking its tones and releasing the same with perfect precision, accomplishing great volume and modulating to subtleties and refinements with a skill and unanimity that spoke eloquently of hard work and painstaking direction."

Pianists in Busoni Memorial

A memorial concert for the late Ferruccio Busoni will be held in New York next Monday afternoon. Five pianists will take part: Maria Carreras, William Bachaus, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernest Hutcheson, and Ernest Schelling. Another feature of the concert will be the performance by a Duo-Art piano of Bach's Chaconne, as transcribed by Busoni and recorded by himself.

Miss Liebling on Sunday Program

An unusually large audience heard the eighth free concert given by the Sunday Symphonic Society in the Criterion Theatre March 29. Josiah Zuro conducted Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Hugo Riesenfeld's Romantic Overture. Estelle Liebling was the soloist in two Ravel numbers.

Photo by Kesslere.

MISS MARIE TIFFANY

MARIE TIFFANY was heard as soloist with the Springfield (Mass.) Symphony Orchestra, Arthur H. Turner conductor, recently. Her reception was most cordial, and Francis Regal, music reviewer of the Republican, asserted that Miss Tiffany proved one of the most successful soloists, from every point of view, that the orchestra has had.

Not only her vocal attainments but her charming appearance awakened his admiration. Willard M. Clark, writing in the Union, remarked that she was a happy choice in view of the great purity and carrying power of her voice; the warmth and brilliance found in her wide range; and her smooth tone. No less enthusiastic was the Daily News chronicler.

Another New England town that accorded this singer enthusiastic applause was Norwich, Conn. Miss Tiffany sang there last month in the Lenten series of Sunday concerts. Here, too, her charming personality as well as her distinctive vocal virtues (Norwich Record) pleased the audience and the press commentators. This was her first appearance in Norwich.

Miss Tiffany has also been singing as far West as Texas. She covered a good deal of ground in a short space of time by singing in Fort Worth March 23, in Abilene March 24, in Sedalia, Mo., March 25, and in Kansas City, Mo., on March 26.

In Kansas City she sang at the National Flower Show in a bower of multi-colored blossoms, the air heavy with the fragrant perfumes of innumerable flowers. Miss Tiffany's concert was given in ideal circumstances and, as she says, was "a rare experience."

Prometheus Has Boston Premiere

Cecilia Society Aids Orchestra in Scriabin Work; Sanroma With People's Symphony.

Boston, March 31.—The first performance here of Scriabin's Prometheus was given last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with the assistance of the Cecilia Society, directed by Malcolm Lang. Alexander Lang Steinert played the piano part.

Stuart Mason wrote in the Christian Science Monitor that there are pages "of undoubted beauty, even inspiration," although there is little that is "original" in the symphonic poem. He also commented that "the loftiness of this work must be conceded, as well as the mastery of the composer." According to Philip Hale of the Herald, the work has passages "of more individual strength and beauty; the instrumentation is more varied, more interesting, with greater charm of coloring" than his earlier orchestral poems. Mr. Hale added, however, that the music "is too often diffuse and negligible."

In the opinion of H. T. Parker (Transcript) there is "considerable variety and richness of color" in the composition, although it is sometimes "dry and monotonous." The Globe reviewer observed that Scriabin's "gift is, as always, insufficient to sustain intense emotions throughout a whole composition." He thought that Mr. Koussevitzky brought out "the full nervous intensity" of the music.

The performance was meritorious, according to Mr. Mason, and Mr. Steinert played the difficult part "with a rare display of musicianship." He considered the orchestra and chorus "more than equal" to the demands made upon them. The Globe reported that the pianist played "excellently" and Mr. Hale felt that his performance was both intelligent and effective.

According to the Transcript the piano part was "perceptively, sensitively and anxiously played" by Mr. Steinert. The chorus, to further quote this writer, was in excellent form and "missed neither quality nor volume of tone." Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducted the first performance of the work in Moscow with the composer as assisting pianist, received full measure of praise.

The rest of the program consisted of Borodin's dances from Prince Igor, which were done here for the first time with chorus. Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, and Rabaud's La Procession Nocturne.

* * *

Jesus Sanroma was the soloist at the last regular concert this season of the People's Symphony conducted by Emil Mollenhauer. According to Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald, the soloist played the Rachmaninoff C minor Concerto "with a largeness and a musicianliness that would do credit to a much more experienced pianist. . . . Mr. Sanroma is an intelligent, and an exceedingly able young pianist; he has a sense of rhythm, a beautiful and limpid touch."

The Transcript found him "a purposeful and vigorous performer."

The remainder of the program was made up of Svendsen's Carnival in Paris, three ballet pieces by Rameau, and the Tannhaeuser Overture.

J. HENRI BOVE

flutist

Has Toured With Mmes. Tetrazzini, Ivogun, Dal Monte and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

"Gave individual performance that won repeated encores."—San Francisco Call and Post.

"A player of very smooth technique and crystalline sweet tone."—Toronto Globe.

"Showed a most musical tone and gave evident delight with his playing."—Washington Times.

"Henri Bove, the noted flutist, played with rare delicacy and finish."—Baltimore Sun.

AVAILABLE FOR JOINT RECITALS AND MUSICALES

Address: 191 Claremont Ave., New York City

Marie Rappold

SCORES ANOTHER SUCCESS

WITH THE

Philadelphia Civic Opera Company

singing Leonora in "Trovatore"

"A generous share of the honors in the cast went to Marie Rappold, as 'Leonora' . . . Mme. Rappold has the statuesque figure and a grace of manner to make Leonora a majestic heroine, and there was authority in her acting as well as in her singing. Her voice is of good volume and retains much of the pure soprano quality of her earlier operatic days, and both of her principal arias, 'Tacea la Notte Placida' (Peaceful was the Night), with its touch of coloratura, in the first act, and the dramatic 'D'Amor Sull 'ali Rosee,' (Love, Fly on Rosy Pinions) in the last act, were sung with no little brilliance."

Philadelphia Bulletin, February 27, 1925.

"CROWDED HOUSE HEARS 'TROVATORE.' MARIE RAPPOLD AS 'LEONORA.' The performance last night was remarkably good. Marie Rappo d, the 'Leonora,' was in even better voice than when she appeared as 'Aida' with the company, and gave the difficult arias with which the role is crowded with excellent effect."

Philadelphia Public Ledger, Feb. 27, 1925.

"One of the most difficult roles in opera is that of Leonora, which Mme. Marie Rappold sang. Her fine natural voice and long experience enable her to present the character in a manner seldom heard."

Philadelphia Inquirer, Feb. 27, 1925.

"MARIE RAPPOLD SINGS PRINCIPAL ROLE IN FINE PERFORMANCE. The real start was with the colorful singing of Marie Rappold."

Philadelphia Record, Feb. 27 1925.

Available for Recitals, Oratorio, Opera This Season and Next

Management: M. H. HANSON

437 Fifth Ave., New York City

EVSEI BELOUSSOFF

"A Master 'Cellist"

Redfern Mason—San Francisco Examiner

Will Tour America during Season 1925 - 1926

under the exclusive management of

DANIEL MAYER

Aeolian Hall

New York

MR. BELOUSSOFF

will give

THREE RECITALS

in

AEOLIAN HALL

during the coming season

of especial interest to Lovers of Music for the 'Cello

October 15

'Cello Recital

December 10

Sonata Recital with

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist

January 27

An evening of Bach with

Wanda Landowska at the piano and harpsichord

"He is a real artist."

New York Evening Telegram.

"Beloussoff is an artist of high merit."

New York Herald.

"A 'cellist of unlimited technique."

Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"His performance was wonderful."

Buffalo Commercial.

"Mr. Beloussoff won golden opinions."

Detroit News.

"He is one of the foremost artists of the 'cello."

Chicago Herald and Examiner.

"E. Beloussoff is undoubtedly in the forefront of the greatest masters of that instrument."

St. Louis Times.

"Mr. Beloussoff, master 'cellist, received ovations."

Los Angeles Evening Express.

"Mr. Beloussoff completely carried his audience with him."

Los Angeles Evening Herald.

"A master of the 'cello."

The Miami Herald.

"What Kreisler is to the violin, Beloussoff is to the 'cello."

The Montgomery Advertiser.

"His technical attainments place him in the front rank of living 'cellists."

New Orleans Times-Picayune.

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

Mozart Boyhood Opera Heard

Vienna Academy Presents La Finta Semplice; Kienzl Ballet and Rienzi at Opera; Le Sacre Causes Storm.

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Vienna.

Mozart's boyhood opera, La Finta Semplice, was given here recently by older students of the Vienna Academy of Music and Acting, a government institution, to celebrate the establishment of the Academy as a school of university rank. Members of the faculty supervised the production.

This was the second performance of La Finta Semplice in modern times, the other having taken place in Karlsruhe in 1921. Previous to that the only time that the opera saw the light was in 1769 when it was given in honor of the bishop-ruler of Salzburg. That first performance of the piece was in the nature of consolation for the family of Mozart, whose father was in the service of the archbishop, after the promised performance of the work at the Hofoper in Vienna had fallen through because of the intrigues of local musicians and officials of that organization.

Mozart was only twelve years old when he composed this opera, probably his first. La Finta Semplice is in three acts. The plot, quite in the manner of the times, describes the ultimate triumph of innocence over evil, after many complications of situation.

Eclectic Work

The biographers of Mozart have not been much pleased with La Finta Semplice, which they call not sufficiently independent in its style. When one hears the work without thought of historical parallels, one must take pleasure from the charm, the loveliness, and richness of the music, especially when one is conscious of the later masterpieces whose germs are already in this early composition.

The performance was greeted with such favor by the public and the press that it has already been repeated a number of times. Dirk Foch, professor of conducting in the Academy, conducted, and the stage direction and scenic settings were under the supervision of Josef Turnau.

Those interested in the Academy have been much pleased with the addition of prestige which the action of the government has given it. The reputation of the school has been of the best, but its strength is now increased. In the future the members of the faculty will have in all their relations the standing and duties of university professors. Joseph Marx, the director of the Academy, has already begun to strengthen the courses and faculty with the new means at his disposal.

Kienzl Novelty at Opera

At the Opera one of the novelties which has been promised by the direction for many months at last has been produced. This was the ballet-allegory of Wilhelm Kienzl, Sanctissimum. The work includes not only music and pantomime but also, at times, the spoken word.

Kienzl is one of the oldest living Austrian composers. He is best known for his Evangelimann. In his youth he was familiar with Adolph Jensen and with Wagner. Despite his years he remains a lively old man keenly interested in the latest developments of the modern exponents of his art. At present he is most busily engaged in writing his memoires.

Sanctissimum contains itself new remarkable novelties in style, but its story is so well portrayed and enhanced by Kienzl's music that it is thoroughly interesting and worth while. The plot concerns a musician of the Middle Ages whose music is so entrancing that with it he entices the Holy Fathers from the church, and is lead by them to heaven. The production appealed to the audience, and the composer was accorded a hearty ovation.

Revival of Rienzi

After an interval of several seasons Wagner's Rienzi has been restored to the Opera repertory. At the revival a new conductor made his debut, Robert Heger. Herr Heger is known particularly for his activities in Munich. He is still a young man, but his qualities, as known through his reputation and as demonstrated in this performance, created a demand for his reengagement.

Negotiations are also said to be under way with Bruno Walter, and the authorities of the Opera hope to persuade him to come to Vienna to conduct at least during a part of the season.

The fiftieth anniversary of the premiere of Goldmark's opera, Die Koenigin von Saba, fell on March 10. Thanks to the ingenious libretto—and still more to the rich music in the score—this work has been reproduced repeatedly in the last half century on the leading stages of Austria. The Opera celebrated its birthday with a gala performance which was warmly received, and which employed all the powers still remaining with that organization during these trying years.

The convalescence of the Volksoper proceeds slowly, but surely. Negotiations have been carried on with Mme. Ganna Walska, and it is not impossible that she may become personally and financially interested in the theatre.

Of novelties the Volksoper has offered lately only Massenet's Werther. The performance was unusually good.

Stravinsky Rouses Tumult

Great excitement was aroused at a recent concert of the Philharmonic orchestra when Franz Schalk surprised and shocked his conservative audience with the performance of Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps. At the general rehearsal the playing of the piece was interrupted at times by the noise of disapproval of the audience. Among those in this city who are interested in modern music Herr Schalk won great applause for producing Le Sacre.

At the public performance next day parts of the audience were again audibly indignant, but the conductor had taken the precaution to cut part of the second movement, and this minimized the excitement.

Several oratorios have been heard here of late, including the Verdi Requiem, Handel's Israel in Egypt (directed by Victor Zuckerhandl), and the almost forgotten Stabat Mater, of Dvorak (directed by Reichwein). The Dvorak composition contains some beautiful and rich-sounding music, although not of the kind that one would expect to find in such a work.

Recitals Numerous

Recitals have been many in number here recently, and there have been interesting personalities continually in the music news. Among them have been a twenty-year-old, much spoken of composer, Frau Gigler-Zieritz; the Parisian singer Mme. Lubin; Erika Morini, the violinist; Richard Buhlig, pianist; Erno Rapee, of New York, who conducted Carpenter's Perambulator Suite in an orchestral concert here; the pianist Therese Diehn-Siottko, a pupil of Leschetizky who has for some time been in Asia and has just returned; and Adolf Weissmann, critic and writer of Berlin, who contrasted Wagner and the Russian composers in a well-attended lecture.

Another artist who has attracted attention is the young contralto of the Opera, Rosette Anday, who has shown remarkable improvement in her voice in both operatic and concert appearances.

PAUL STEFAN.

Name Artists for Hague Orchestra

The Hague.—In behalf of the Zeebad Maatschappij Scheveningen, the Dutch Musical Agency of Dr. G. de Koos has engaged the following artists for the symphony concerts of the Residentie Orchestor under the direction of Georg Schneevoight: vocalists, Ilona Durigo, Claire Dux, Irene Eden, Birgit Engell, Lydia Kinderman, Lotte Leonard, and Jacques Urlus; violinists, Carl Flesch, Alma Moodie, Erika Morini, Albert Spalding, and Jacques Thibaud; cellist, Judith Bokor; pianists, Carl Friedberg, Ignatz Friedmann, Jose Iturbi, Myra Hess, Frederic Lamond, Moritz Rosenthal, Arthur Rubinstein, Ernest Schelling, Arthur Schnabel, and Sigrid Schneevoight.

Weissmann May Come to U. S.

Berlin.—Adolf Weissmann, German music critic and writer, may go to the United States next winter to lecture, it is said. He recently returned from lecture-engagements in Austria.

Elisabeth Rothberg
SOPRANO
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
FISK BLDG. NEW YORK
PACKARD BLDG PHILA., PA.
BRUNSWICK RECORDS
HARDMAN PIANO

GRAVEURE
IN
LEADING MUSIC CENTERS
"As a vocalist he is so far ahead of other baritones on the concert circuit as to seem a representative of a different art altogether from theirs."
—(Boston, Mass., Christian Science Monitor.)
Management:
Metropolitan Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

Moscow Enjoys Modern Music

Two Miaskovsky Symphonies Heard in Premiere; Chamber Concerts Feature Contemporary Works.

Moscow.

One of the most important events of the present season was the performance for the first time of two of Miaskovsky's Symphonies, his Seventh and his Fourth. The former was written in 1922, the latter in 1918. The two symphonies were given at the first of a series of four concerts of modern Russian music by the symphony orchestra of the Theatre of the Revolution under the auspices of the Moscow Association for Contemporary Music.

The concert aroused great interest among Russian musicians. The large hall of the Theatre of the Revolution was crowded and a part of the audience had come all the way from Leningrad for the event. The program was conducted by Constantin Saradjev, formerly a pupil of Arthur Nikisch, and considered one of the best of the contemporary leaders of modern music.

The two works belong to different periods of creative activity on the part of Miaskovsky. The Fourth Symphony is close in chronology and style to the same composer's symphonic poem, Alastor, after the poem of Shelley. The symphony is pervaded by the "spirit of solitude," and contains a musical portrayal of the struggle of the human being against the imperfections of the world, and of his longing after highest ideals.

In Three Movements

The symphony is in three parts, the first movement tense and turbulent, the second slow and impressively solemn, and the finale impetuous and violent.

Much as the audience liked this work it seemed to prefer the Seventh, in which Miaskovsky is even more personal in his style. The symphony consists of two parts, and is played without any interruption. The form is masterly without being traditional.

The sense of unity in the form is gained by the manipulation of the introductory theme of the English horn, which is supposed to symbolize nature. This theme appears again in the passage to the second part of the symphony, and in the coda before the conclusion of the whole work.

The composer has tried to show in this composition the complicated and strange world of the human soul opposed to nature and to the events of life. A beautiful song in the horns in the second part gives the impression of a lovely cradle song, and on its second appearance is interwoven with masterly technique into a remarkable and impetuous fugue.

Notwithstanding its shortness this symphony probably is one of Miaskovsky's finest works, for the skill and economy with which the ideas are developed are extraordinary. The performance of these two symphonies has whetted the public appetite for the premiere of Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony, which was recently completed, and which is now the only one of the set not yet heard anywhere in public.

The most recent composition of Nicolas Miaskovsky is his Fourth Piano Sonata. It is a work in three movements, entitled Sonata, Intermezzo, and Rondo. Unlike the previous works of this composer in the same form and for the same instrument the Fourth Sonata is entirely new in its thematic material, and is not related to them as they are to each other.

Chamber Music Concerts

The series of seven chamber music concerts given by the Association for Contemporary Music has now been completed. The final concert included a number of compositions of Vladimir Kriukov and a new violin sonata by Basil Shirinsky. The composer himself played the latter work.

This new sonata is a marked step forward from his last compositions, a string quartet which was heard in Vienna during this season. It contains music of warm beauty and marked individuality.

Of Kriukov there were given the Third Piano Sonata, played by Mme. Mirzoieva; a group of songs, and a scene from the opera, The King of the Square (after Alexander Block). Mmes. Nubatskaya and Aleneva and Mr. Velikanov were the singers, and the composer was at the piano.

The most interesting members of this group were the excerpt from the opera, which showed in the composer a gift for dramatic music, and the piano work, which demonstrated the fact that the composer is well on his way toward the development of an individual and original style.

Shebalin and Mossolov Represented

The first concert of the series was devoted to two young composers, Alexander Mossolov and Vissarion Shebalin, both pupils of Miaskovsky. The latter was represented by his string quartet and a series of piano pieces, and Mossolov offered two piano sonatas, his first and third, three lyric compositions for viola and piano, and a group of songs.

CONSTANTIN SARADJEV
Russian Conductor, Who Presented Miaskovky's Fourth and Seventh Symphonies in Their Recent World Premieres in Moscow.

Mossolov as represented in these compositions of his seems to be an accomplished and interesting musician. The younger Shebalin has a distance to travel to full maturity, although he is looked upon as perhaps the most promising of the youngest figures in the new Russian music.

Karol Szymanowski, often referred to as the "new Chopin," was the only composer whose works figured in the second concert of the Association. One may question this description of Szymanowski, but it is hardly to be denied that he is one of the leading figures among the composers of the present day in the whole world.

Heinrich Neuhaus played two of Szymanowski's most difficult and most impressive piano sonatas, his first and third. Mme. Alexandrova, assisted by her husband, Anatole Alexandrov who is a composer of importance also, sang some songs after Tagore, Opus 41; Hafis, Opus 24; and Muezzin's In Love, Opus 42.

The third concert also was devoted to works of a single composer. On this occasion Feinberg was the solo performer in a concert of his piano compositions. Needless to say he is foremost among the interpreters of his own music, for he knows exactly the proper capricious touch to give them.

Besides his known works, such as his First Sonata, his Fantasy, Opus 5, and his Suite, Opus 11, Feinberg played his Sixth Sonata, his Preludes, Opus 15, and his new Seventh Sonata.

Roslavetz Music Featured

The fourth concert featured music of Roslavetz, who appeared before the audience himself as lecturer and commentator. Roslavetz's music is quite unknown in the United States although he is probably the most productive of modern Russian composers.

This program contained for the most part works played at the concert of the Association last year. The numbers were First Cello Sonata, Fourth Violin Sonata, the Fifth Piano Sonata, the Third Piano Trio, and a group of smaller pieces for the voice, piano, and for the cello.

In the fifth concert Leonid Sabaneiev appeared with a new piano trio, his Opus 20, with his Sonata for the piano, Opus 15, and with two Sketches for the same instrument. The composer himself was at the piano, and was assisted by Messrs. Zyganov, violinist, and Shirinsky, cellist.

Although Sabaneiev, whose critical writings regarding Scriabin are noteworthy, denies having undergone the influence of that composer's style in his own work, the presence of the influence seems unmistakable in the actual pages of his music.

Play Bartok Quartets

Two string quartets of Bela Bartok, the Hungarian composer, were performed at the sixth concert by the Stradivarius Quartet (consisting of Anatole Knorre, Semen Hamburg, Basil Packelman, and Victor Kubatzky). The performances were premieres. The applause of the audience was so insistent that they were immediately repeated. Especially remarkable was the conclusion of the second quartet, with its whirling pace and marked rhythm.

The seven concerts of the Association have not been the only major chamber music events of the season in Moscow. The State Moscow Conservatory Quartet (Dimitry Zyganov, Basil Shirinsky, Vadim Borisovsky, and Serge Shirinsky) featured Paul Hindemith's Second String Quartet at one of its concert appearances.

VICTOR BELAIEV.

Wagner Score on Sale

Berlin.—The original piano score by Richard Wagner of the funeral music which he composed for Carl Maria von Weber has been put on sale here. The manuscript is dated November 15, 1844, and covers eight octavo pages. It has not yet found a purchaser, for the antique dealer who is displaying it is holding out for a high price.

Young Stresemann a Composer

Berlin.—Wolfgang Stresemann, son of the German Foreign Minister, Dr. Gustav Stresemann, has joined the ranks of musical composers. He has brought out a symphony for orchestra which is to be given in the near future at a social evening arranged by the German Actors' Society. The performance will be directed by Leo Blech of the Deutsche Volksoper.

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist
Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer-Flutist
Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter
527 FIFTH AVE
NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records
Maron & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter
527 FIFTH AVE.
NEW YORK

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York
Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York
STEINWAY PIANO

EUROPEAN NEWS AND VIEWS

Paris Season at Its Height

Eighteen Music Events Daily Average for March Week; Gaubert Conducts Beethoven; Pianists Heard.

Paris.

An average of fourteen recitals and concerts, and four operas a day were Paris' portion for the week of March 15-21. The local musical gleaners have rather a hard time of it, since in a city where so many performances take place, quality is bound to suffer on account of quantity. Those who keep their eyes on such things were agreed, however, that last week five or six musical events which were uncommonly fine took place.

Philippe Gaubert, conductor of La Societe des Concerts, created something of a sensation with his performance of Beethoven's Fifth. La Societe des Concerts is noted for its adherence to the Beethoven tradition, and is the orchestra Walter Damrosch directed last winter when he gave his Beethoven series in Paris. M. Gaubert's reading of the Fifth won commendation from his hearers and in the press.

Winifred Christie gave a recital the other evening on the Moor Double-Keyboard Piano. Demonstrations of the Moor piano are uncommonly interesting, for the very fact of its creation is an open sesame to tonal worlds long since dreamed of but hitherto unheard. The double-keyboard piano is the last word in the exploitation of the sonorous potentialities of the piano.

The program played by Mme. Christie consisted of Fantaisie in G. Trois Mouvements, Suite Anglaise (A minor), Chaconne, Prelude and Fugue (D minor) of J. S. Bach, and the Petite Suite of Mr. Moor. Mme. Christie's rhythmic control of her music and her phrasing were excellent. Her Bach numbers were remarkable in clarity of articulation and presentation of idea. Some of the reviewers were inclined to think that hearing Bach on the Moor piano is apt to spoil him for the ordinary piano, so completely are his Gothic grandeur and provincial majesty realizable by means of the former.

Roumanian Music Pleases

There is manifest an increasing interest in Roumanian music. Whenever and wherever concerts of it are given, they are well and intelligently attended, as for example that which took place at the Salle Mustel, Tuesday evening. At this time a number of rising Roumanian composers were brought to public attention, among them Goldestan, Enesco, Lazar and Mihalovici. The Sonatine for oboe and piano, of the last-named, made the best impression, and won the best critical comment. Barring the fact that Stravinsky's voice is heard in the second movement of this composition, it is good original writing. It discloses a thorough mastery of means, an ability to get the most out of a musical idea once it has been created, and a generous fund of what the French call "sensibilite."

The Paris Opera, Wednesday evening, gave an exceptional performance of Boris Godunoff, of Moussorgsky. The Czar was impersonated by M. Zaleski, who came to the Paris Opera only a short time ago. M. Zaleski gave the large audience a genuine thrill. His is a histrionic and vocal method that allows hardly any relevant point to escape and which makes every detail in the delineation of the haughty ruler something that is distinctly Slavic. He is mighty in temporal pride, exquisitely tender yet firm with those he loves, heart-sickening in his self-pity and fear of retribution, dreadful in the insanity that destroyed him, pitiable in death.

A New Gilda at the Opera

Friday evening a new Gilda was heard at the Paris Opera, in the person of Mme. Eide Norena, a singer who hails from Norway. She was successful in the role of Rigoletto's love-stricken daughter, and displayed a voice of ample range and power and of pleasing quality. Her vocalization is not always impeccable and her high tones not always so clear as they might be, but these faults are offset by musicianly style.

Frank Bishop was heard in recital Saturday evening. Of the young American pianists now before the public and who are bound to go far, he is one. He was much admired in the Bach-Busoni Prelude and Fugue in D minor. Here he presented his subjects in good light and did not force them into the foreground. His Bach is natural and unaffected. Mr. Bishop has an adequate technical equipment and is sensitive to color.

The Gluck Melody and Mozart's Pastorale Variee suffered because the pianist's use of the pedals was not discreet, and because, as one chronicler remarked, "He has yet to learn how to make the piano sing a purely vocal melody."

A new Chopin specialist appeared on the scene this week-end. It was Mlle. Madeleine de Valmalete. She played Chopin with womanly charm but did not make him weak and effeminate. In her playing she covers a broad range of emotional dynamics and sentiment, but she is never sentimental. Her filigree work is beautiful and she shows an unusual realization of the emotional power of a fine pianissimo. IRVING SCHWERKE.

Will Broadcast Parsifal

Berlin.—Richard Wagner's Parsifal, conducted by Max von Schillings of the State Opera, will be broadcasted on Good Friday.

MME. BERTA MORENA
Made Her Reappearance at the Metpolitan in Goetterdaemmerung on Friday Evening After an Interval of Many Seasons.

Amsterdam Will Have Own Opera

Amsterdam.—With the support of the Wagner Society and the Concertgebouw a movement is on foot here for the organization of an Amsterdam opera company. So far the city has had to be content with the productions of visiting companies.

Stravinsky Heard in Leipzig

Leipzig.—Igor Stravinsky, returned from America played his Piano Concerto with the Gewandhaus Orchestra not long ago. The reception of the piece was not too hearty, although the composer's personal appearance aroused interest.

Queens Hall Orchestra May Tour

London.—According to the Musical News and Herald the Queen's Hall Orchestra may start next fall a sixth month's tour of the British Empire. With Sir Henry Wood conducting it is said that the organization may give concerts in New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and Canada.

Library to Put Music Records in Circulation

London.

An interesting experiment has been instituted by the University of London's library, which has hitherto always included a fair collection of music. Both phonograph records and player-piano rolls are now to be added to the circulating material of the institution.

This step was announced in the press as follows: "At the last meeting of the Senate, it was decided that the University Library, which already possesses a good but small collection of music scores and books on music, should be extended by a liberal provision of scores, gramophone records, and pianola rolls as a method of enabling members of the University to become acquainted with classical and modern musical works in the easiest way."

Mr. Scholes remarks in the Observer apropos of this new service that "these facilities have long been enjoyed by the undergraduates and other members of many American universities, but I believe that London is the first British university to undertake the provision of so complete a mechanical equipment for making acquaintance with the literature of music."

Mr. Legge, in the Telegraph, is a little pessimistic as to the practicability of the scheme. "The more or less annual recrudescence of the idea that a library of gramophone records is for the public good," he writes, "is apt to raise a smile on the old gramophone lover, who knows the extraordinary difficulty that is ever present in preserving records from wear and tear even when treated with the utmost care.

"If, as I believe, the life of a record is no longer than approximately seventy performances even when the greatest care is exercised in its use, in the choice of needles, and so forth, how will the students fare to whom falls the lot of playing it when 100 or so performances of it have previously been given?" P. L.

Coming Operas at La Scala

Milan.—Wolf-Ferrari's Le Donne Curiose will have its season premiere at La Scala soon under the direction of Maestro Gui. In the past it has been heard only under the leadership of Tullio Serafin. Two other operas shortly to be heard are La Wally, directed by Panizza, and Gluck's Orpheus, conducted by Toscanini.

New Music Paper Established

Warsaw.—A new monthly music magazine, Music, has started publication here. The editor is Mateusz Glinski. The periodical will pay especial attention to modern music, for it is being sponsored by the International Society for Contempoary Music.

Edinburgh Hears Paderewski

Edinburgh. — Paderewski played here in a piano recital at the end of February. This was his first appearance in Edinburgh in a decade.

MARJORIE MEYER
SOPRANO
Management: Standard Booking Office, 17 East 42d St., New York

Mme. Marie Gabrielle LESCHETIZKY
WILL CONDUCT MASTER CLASSES THIS SUMMER IN PARIS AT ECOLE LESCHETIZKY, 76, AVENUE MALAKOFF
RECITAL TOUR 1925-26 NOW BOOKING
Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, 250 West 57th St., New York

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: CHARLES L. WAGNER D. F. McSWEENEY
5' Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

WEEKLY students' recitals of the Curtis Institute of Music, which take place Wednesday afternoons in the concert room of the Conservatory Department building, were given on March 11 by students under Perley Dunn Aldrich, of the voice faculty, and Austin Conradi of the piano faculty; students under George F. Boyle, of the piano faculty, and Louis Svecenski, ensemble, on March 16; students under Berthe Bert, piano, and Michel Penha, violoncello, on March 18, and students under Carl Flesch, violin, on March 25.

Mme. Charles Cahier and Carl Flesch, of the Conservatory Department faculty, served as two of the judges in the bi-yearly contest of the Philadelphia Music Club, the winners to represent the State Federation of Music Clubs at the national convention to be held in Oregon in June.

May 28 is the date for the Commencement concert of the Bush Conservatory at Orchestra Hall. The program will be given by the Bush Conservatory Symphony Orchestra and the winners of the big prize contest on April 30. Graduates will receive their diplomas and degrees at that time. Richard Czerwonky is conductor of the Orchestra, which has given three public concerts this season.

The summer session of the College of Arts and Science of Rochester University is co-incident with that of the Eastman School, which makes it possible for students to pursue academic studies in connection with music study during this five week period. This gives public school teachers opportunity to enter courses in education, psychology, English and history, as well as many other subjects correlating with their professional work. This summer session of the Eastman School opens on June 22 and closes July 25.

A recital by the students in Carl Friedberg's class at the Institute of Musical Art was given March 28. Samuel Prager, Cecile Brooks, Wyoneta Cleveland, and Anna Levitt took part.

The first annual meeting of the Intercollegiate Girls' Glee Club Association was held in Dayton, Ohio, March 20. Five clubs contested for a silver cup which was presented by Bertha Bauer, head of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, each club singing three numbers. The clubs participating were from University of Cincinnati, Denison, Wittenberg, Ohio Wesleyan, and Ohio University.

The cup was won by the Glee Club of Ohio University, under the direction of Mrs. Margaret A. Benedict of the University School of Music. The judges were J. Finley Williamson, director of the Dayton Westminster Choir, Mrs. Mary Willing Megley, conductor of the Toledo Choral Society, and A. M. Martin, head of the department of music at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.

A department of Psychology has been established in the Peabody Conservatory of Music, Baltimore. This department, which is under the supervision of Otto Ortmann, holder of the Peabody diploma in composition and a member of the faculty, also a former Hopkins student, has been investigating musical talent to learn the actual effect of the player's touch upon the tone of the piano.

The department has attempted to determine just to what extent the manner in which the piano key is depressed through variations in touch actually affects the tone of the piano. This has been done by recording the movement of the piano key while tone is being produced, and the records obtained permit the reading of differences in speed of less than one five-hundredth of a second. In order to verify the movements of the key, similar records of the movement of the piano hammer and of the vibration of the string were made.

In addition to tonal variations resulting from changes in intensity, qualitative differences were recorded, and the physical basis for such terms as "hard," "shallow," "dry," "round," and "brittle" was found. The effects of direction of key-attack, of finger, hand, wrist, and arm position, of relaxation and rigidity, and of "poetic" touch show interesting and pedagogically helpful relationships. It is interesting to note also that there is a great difference between what the player and the listener imagine they hear, and what they actually do hear as far as the sound itself is concerned. Many movements, supposedly affecting the tone, in reality have no tonal value. Instead, they are justified only on muscular grounds.

It has been found that the belief that by gradually pressing the piano-key down, the string is gradually set into motion, and hence produces a better tone, is a complete fallacy. It was found, too, that the eye plays a very great part in reading meanings into tones which would otherwise have a different significance. This accounts for the fact that in a concert hall, the left side is always more occupied than the right, for the piano key-board is not visible for the latter.

ALBERTO BIMBONI

Teacher of Singing and Composer Who Last Sunday Conducted a Performance of Trovatore for Radio Broadcasting.

Tryouts for free scholarships in the Master School of Musical Arts in California will be held in Aeolian Hall, New York, tomorrow afternoon. Two of Lazar S. Samoiloff's New York vocal pupils have already been awarded free scholarships following competitive tests. They are Laura Stastke and Gladys St. John.

The tryouts will be held in the presence of the newly founded institution's faculty, made up for the most part of musicians active in New York City. Only candidates whose talent is unquestionable will be considered, no matter the age of the candidate.

The tenth annual convention of the Washington Music Teachers' Association will be held in Wenatchee, April 13, 14, and 15.

At the students' recital given March 2 by the Department of Fine Arts at Athens College, Athens, Ala., the following pupils were heard: Theodocia Lindsay, Elizabeth Malone, Alice Witty, Robbie Cole, Sarah Orman, Louene Gibson, Mabel Ann Farrington, Hazel King, Maynette Mackey, Memorie Holt, Mary Ferrier, Robbie Redus, Mrs. Charles Beasley, Beth Tyler, Elsie Cantrelle, Ben Peck, Signa Glasgow, Lucy Binford, Ellen Harrier Church, Ann Phillips Cartwright, and Willie Mae Johnston.

Nordica Memorial Building Planned for Stony Point

Eva Gauthier has accepted the chairmanship of the committee for the Nordica Memorial Building, which is to be an important part of the music and art center of the American Operatic and Allied Arts Foundation at Stony Point-on-the-Hudson. Plans for the Memorial, which is to be a dormitory for women, have been accepted and building operations will soon be started. Similar memorials are intended for David Bispham and Enrico Caruso.

Serving on the committee with Mme. Gauthier are the following: Miss Alice de Lamar, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mrs. R. T. Wilson, Mrs. John De Witt Peltz, Mrs. John F. Lyons, Mrs. Philip Benkard, Mme. Hulda Lashanska, Mme. Marguerite d'Alvarez, Mrs. William T. Carrington, Mrs. John W. Garrett, Mrs. Lyman Kendall, Miss Geraldine Hall, Miss Esther Murphy, Mrs. Bernard M. Timm, Mrs. Ethel Cave-Cole, Mr. Carl Engel, Mrs. Hokan Steffanson, Mme. Sophie Braslau, Mrs. Simon Frankel, Mrs. Muriel Draper, Mrs. Frank Seiberling, Senora Alice Pallottelli, Mr. Emil Fuchs, Baroness K. E. Von Klener, Mrs. Stephen Pell, Mme. Kathleen Howard, Mme. Schoen-Rene, Mrs. Daniel de Menocal, Mr. John Hays Hammond, Jr., Mrs. Alfred C. Bossom, Mrs. M. Donald Spencer, Mr. Sam Endicott, Mme. Cobina Wright, Miss Bertha Bauer.

The board of directors consists of Richard Hammond, Louis T. Wiley, George P. Raymond, Deems Taylor, Walter K. Varney, George Gershwin, and William Sullivan.

The Boston Committee for the Nordica Memorial is headed by Mrs. Daniel de Menocal, as chairman, and includes Mrs. Francis Sears, vice chairman, and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Franklin Hobbs, Mrs. Edward Burlingame Hill, E. Sohier Welsh, Samuel Endicott, Miss Mourse, Mrs. Alvin T. Fuller, Henry D. Sleeper, John Hays Hammond, Jr., and Wendell Endicott.

The board of directors is meeting at lunch at the Lido Venice today to make final plans with Mme. Gauthier, who will sail the following day, on the Acquitania, for a European tour. During her stay abroad Mme. Gauthier will appear in concert in England, France, Germany and Italy, and will sing at several command performances for royalty. She will also get in touch with a number of American artists living abroad who are interested in the Nordica Memorial.

Two recitals were given March 16 by the Braun School of Music. One was given by the St. Clair branch of the school, Betty Short, director, assisted by the ensemble and expression departments, and the other by the Pottsville (Pa.) branch, assisted by the voice department.

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
11-12 Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

WILLIAM FICHANDLER
PIANO INSTRUCTION
Technic—Interpretation—Teaching Methods
604 West 115th St.
New York City
Telephone: Cathedral 6854

PIETRO CIMINI
CONDUCTOR
Chicago Civic Opera Company
5TH YEAR
PERSONAL ADDRESS: CONGRESS HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILL.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephone: Circle 10117

HILDA GRACE GELLING
VOCAL STUDIO
128 West 72nd St., N. Y. City
Telephone Endicott 1587
ASSOCIATE TEACHER WITH PERCY RECTOR STEPHENS

CHORAL conductors in search of a short cantata, not too difficult, yet effective, will be interested in Harvey B. Gaul's recent setting of Walt Whitman's I Hear America Singing, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Chautauqua Institution and inscribed to the Chautauqua Chorus. It is written for mixed chorus with four-hand piano accompaniment. There is a joyous swing to this "strong melodious song, robust, friendly."

The same composer has made a setting of Charles Mackay's Tubal Cain for treble voices which invites careful preparation by a well-trained women's chorus. There is a colorful two-hand piano accompaniment that shares interest with the voice parts.

The Gaul cantatas are published by C. C. Birchard and Co., Boston, from whom are also received choral works by Granville Bantock, Carl Venth and Frederick Converse.

Mr. Bantock's Golden Journey to Samarkand is representative of this composer's best efforts. It is written in six parts for a cappella mixed chorus. A chorus of superior ability is required to do it justice.

I Will Praise Thee, O Lord, by Mr. Converse is an anthem for mixed voices and soprano solo suitable for festival occasions. It is well within the range of the average church choir, although its scoring requires a piano and quartet of brass instruments in addition to organ.

Carl Venth's operatic pageant, Pan In America, was awarded the prize in the National Federation of Music Clubs' 1923 competition. Robert F. Allen supplied the libretto, which is written to be enacted in three scenes with prologue and epilogue. A cast of several solo voices, mixed chorus, children's chorus and dancers are required. The nature of the work does not require music that is too serious, but Mr. Venth's score is studiously written and entertaining. Parts of the libretto are left to be spoken. With adequate facilities this pageant could be given effective presentation.

Enoch and Sons have published four short piano pieces by Leff Pouishnoff which this Russian pianist featured on his programs during his brief visit to this country last winter.

The Musical Box, Quand Il Pleut, a Prelude in G minor and an arrangement of a number from Schubert's Rosamunde ballet music require more poetic treatment than technical resource. The harmonies are interesting without being unorthodox. Each is a thought briefly but entertainingly told. They are pieces to engage the interest of the advanced piano student . . . and of the concert pianist in search of new encore material.

An album of Ten Russian Piano Pieces is received from Oliver Ditson Co. Cesar Cui, Schuett, Rachmaninoff, Rebikoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Karganoff are represented. These are salon pieces of medium difficulty, carefully edited.

Louis Bailly, violist, won remarkable commendation in his recital in New York on March 28. He was formerly a member of the Flonzaley Quartet.

San Franciscans Greet Stars

San Francisco, March 25.—Mabel Garrison, with George Siemonn at the piano, gave a recital during the week in Scottish Rite Hall. The Herald writer, Mr. Elliot, found her "a thorough musician," and added that "her singing has at most times an intimacy, one might almost say, a confidential quality, which warms the heart, while her musicianship pleases the mind."

In the opinion of Mr. Brown of the Chronicle, "Miss Garrison's voice has a cool freshness, a clear transparency. In Handel's Caro Selve she showed admirable breath control in the slow legato phrasing." Mr. Mason of the Examiner expressed the opinion that "she is one of a very few prima donnas who have manifested rare gifts of simplicity and sincerity."

Ernst von Dohnanyi made his first local appearance in a recital of his own in Scottish Rite Hall to the delight of a strenuously applauding audience. Mr. Mason asserted that "Dohnanyi's playing of a great sonata, Op. 110, of Beethoven, proved one of the finest chapters in the musical experiences of a whole season." He added, "It was proof conclusive that an academic form can become romantic if the artist has poetry in him." Mr. Brown wrote that "Dohnanyi made an impression that will remain fresh for some time as a great artist and a splendid technician."

This week's symphony program was chiefly devoted to Georges Enesco, who appeared as soloist, composer, and conductor of his own E flat Symphony. The Examiner reviewer wrote, "Enesco played the Brahms Violin Concerto, and he gave a glorious reading of it." This writer went on to say of Enesco's Symphony, "It is eloquent music, unrestful, almost exasperated at times, with interspaces of sheer lyrical loveliness." In the Chronicle the report was: "Enesco wins triumph in three roles—composer, conductor and soloist. Listening to his interpretation of the concerto, one was impressed by his insight into the meaning of the work. Enesco, the conductor, seems a different personality from Enesco, the violinist. Conducting from memory, he gives the cues with imperious precision."

Chaliapin gave a recital yesterday afternoon in the Civic Auditorium. In the Chronicle, Mr. Brown wrote that "one enjoyed afresh the firm vibrancy of his clarion tones and the notable sweetness of his lyric phrasing, the dramatic potency of his interpretations, the intense vitality of his artistry and the magic of his personality." Mr. Elliot in the Herald felt that "Chaliapin is a singing actor. Everything he touches he dramatizes, makes visible as well as audible."

Mr. Mason in the Examiner was also enthusiastic. He wrote: "It is good to listen to Chaliapin. He restores one's faith in art and in the makers of art. When Chaliapin sings, it comes home to you that song is perhaps the divinist thing of which the genius of man is capable. It was a great recital, worthy of the singer." M. J. C.

LISTENING LESSONS IN MUSIC, by Agnes Moore Fryberger (published by Silver, Burdett, & Co., New York) is a guidebook in the teaching of the appreciation of music to young children. It was first published in 1916, but has been completely revised in its new edition.

The author is thoroughly aware of the problems which the teacher of music appreciation in the elementary schools is likely to meet, for she was assistant supervisor of music in the Minneapolis public schools for nine years, and followed up that position with the directorship of music in the California State Teachers' College. At present she is educational director of music of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

The contents of Listening Lessons in Music are carefully graded. The opening material is planned for elementary school children, and calls for preliminary exercises and the exposition of simple music. The second period in the study takes up folk songs, dances, songs based upon familiar poems, and the like.

By gradual stages more and more advanced subjects are treated: songs, opera, oratorio, and various kinds of instrumental music. In each case there is expository matter which is related to the fundamental distinctions and facts of importance in the definitions of the various classes, their development, and their history.

Most of the explanatory sections of the book are obviously designed not so much to be complete and exhaustive information for the pupil as to point out to the teacher what are the fundamental subjects which are to be treated and how they are to be approached. The teacher's work is outlined, in other words. Innumerable illustrations are offered in a wide range of music, and reference is made wherever possible to all types of mechanical reproducting records which may be enlisted in the cultivation of music appreciation.

It is well equipped with references, bibliography, and other appended material.

MUSIC & LETTERS

Founded 1920.

"THE BRITISH MUSICAL QUARTERLY"

100 PAGES. ANNUAL POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION, 20/-

Contents: April, 1925. Vol. VI. No. 2

Giacomo Puccini and Ferruccio Busoni.....F. Bonavia
Music for Two Flutes without Bass.....L. Fleury
Exotic Music.....A. H. Fox Strangways
Representative Books About Mozart.....C. B. Oldman
The Ear.....By a Doctor of Medicine
Musicall Proverbis at Lekingfelde Lodge.....F. W. Galpin
The Eschequier Virginal.....W. H. Grattan Flood
Old English Harmony.....Dom Anselm Hughes, O. S. B.
The Claims of Tonic Solfa
S. Whybrow: T. H. Yorke Trotter: W. G. Whittaker
Schubert.....I. Gurney
The Leit-Motif Since Wagner.....G. E. H. Abraham
Musical Illustrations: Register of Books on Music: New Reproductions.

The October, 1924, number contains a complete index to the first 20 numbers (5 vols.)
A few copies are still obtainable at 5s. 3d. post free

OFFICES: 22, ESSEX STREET, LONDON, ENG., W.C.2

SUMMY'S CORNER

HAMILTON C. MACDOUGALL, Lecturer and Composer, at the close of his review of Mr. Weidig's work, published in the "Diapason," says "—A book which will have a greater influence on the development of studious and talented young musicians than any other book of musical theory published for several generations."

Harmonic Material and Its Uses

by ADOLF WEIDIG

Price, $3.00, plus postage

Published by

Clayton F. Summy Co.

429 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

ALBERTO BIMBONI

VOCAL STUDIO

2025 Broadway New York City

Telephone Endicott 6074

IRENE WILLIAMS

SOPRANO

Available Concert, Oratorio, Recitals, After January, 1925

Brunswick Records

Personal Address: 15 West 74th St., N. Y. C.

MARIO CHAMLEE

TENOR

Metropolitan Opera Company

Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau

Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.

Brunswick Records

Composers Soloists With N.Y. Philharmonic

The Philharmonic Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg conducting, gave the last program of its Thursday-Friday series of concerts in Carnegie Hall April 2 with Germaine Tailleferre, French pianist and composer, as soloist in her own Concerto. Another composer, Samuel Gardner, played his Violin Concerto at the regular subscription concerts the previous week. The soloist at the tenth and final students' concert Wednesday evening was Yolanda Mero.

Mlle. Tailleferre's Concerto had been played here the week before by Alfred Cortot with the Philadelphia Orchestra. W. J. Henderson of the Sun thought the composer played "unaffectedly and smoothly" the "perfectly polite music." According to Olin Downes she played "clearly, brilliantly and with complete confidence and technical control." The Herald Tribune reported that Mlle. Tailleferre "proved a skillful pianist, her playing was agile, always even and polished." In the opinion of the Post reviewer, much musicianship is displayed in the orchestration of the Concerto, although it lacks "sparkle and rhythm." The World writer referred to it as a "surprisingly melodious work." The other numbers on the program were Liszt's Tasso, and Franck's D minor Symphony.

According to Deems Taylor of the World, Mr. Gardner's Concerto, which was heard in New York for the first time, "is marked by a solo part of marked fluency and violinistic appropriateness. The scoring . . . is an admirable combination of solidity and clarity, and contains individual touches of more than usual interest." Mr. Taylor thought the composer played "with much dash and vigor, revealing always a fine tone and brilliant technical command." Mr. Henderson commented that the Concerto "is a serious and closely wrought work" the development of which reveals "sound musicianship and an aspiring spirit." Mr. Gardner played it with a "virtuoso technique and both feeling and style."

The Times reported that "its cordial reception recognized freshness of tone-color and individuality of mood in music so sincerely unassuming, musicianly and admirably performed." According to the Telegram-Mail, Mr. Gardner proved a skillful player. The Post chronicler agreed and thought the work "skillfully devised" although not startlingly original or inspired. The Herald Tribune writer was of the same opinion, and added that it was "agreeable and unaffected." Mr. Mengelberg also conducted Brahms' E minor Symphony and Ravel's La Valse.

Mme. Mero was warmly applauded for her performance of Tschaikowsky's G minor piano Concerto at the last students' concert. Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail referred to the pianist's "brilliant and impetuous playing." The Times observed that "she was a twin spirit to Mr. Mengelberg in the fiery brilliance with which she attacked the opening movement; she literally swept the keys." In the Sun review, her "musicianship and brilliance" were praised, and the reviewer of the Herald Tribune also observed that she played with "vigor and brilliance" as well as "with notable fluency and fleetness of fingers," albeit with "a rather hard quality" at times. According to the Post, Mme. Mero brought out the beauties of the Concerto "with unfailing verve. Her interpretation, however, left something to be desired in the way of warmth."

Liszt's Tasso and Franck's D minor Symphony completed the program.

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfe'd
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
POLA NEGRI in
"The Charmer"
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
"A Kiss in the Dark"
With Adolphe Menjou, Lillian Rich and Aileen Pringle
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

JEAN DE RESZKE
Famous Tenor, Who Has Just Died in Nice at the Age of Seventy-five.

Jean de Reszke Dead

(Continued from page 1.)

through hardships and privation and of Jean's son, a lieutenant of chasseurs in the French army, who was killed in action near Montdidier. The singer was married to the Countess Maria de Goulaine.

Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera House, cabled de Reszke's widow and made a formal statement as follows:

"The name of Jean de Reszke will remain in the history of the lyric theatre, and particularly of the Metropolitan, as that of a supreme artist, with a true personality; a great singer, a great actor, of perfect elegance and of an uncommon versatility.

"I was on friendly terms with him and I am greatly grieved to hear of his death. I send a last tribute to his memory in my name and for all the members of the Metropolitan Opera Company."

Gleason Gives Organ Recital

Harold Gleason, head of the organ department of the Eastman School at Rochester and private organist to George Eastman, gave his first New York recital in the Wanamaker Auditorium Thursday afternoon. According to the Herald Tribune, "Mr. Gleason gave a performance suggesting a prominent place for him among American organists, with thorough command of the technical requisites and the expressive resources of his instrument."

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
ELINOR GLYN'S
"Man and Maid"
All Star Cast
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps

Lines o' News AND Chatter

A distinguished gathering was present in the New York home of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Sachs at the supper given by them in honor of Miss Germaine Tailleferre, following last Thursday evening's Philharmonic Orchestra concert, in which Willem Mengelberg made his conducting mastery felt.

* * *

It was courageous of Mme. Berta Morena to have consented to make her Metropolitan Opera reappearance as Bruennhilde in Die Goetterdaemmerung instead of as Isolde, in the performance of Tristan which originally was planned. Curt Taucher's illness caused the substitution of the one music drama for the other.

* * *

Said Mrs. Chalmers Clifton to Lines-o'-Newser, "Chalmers and I walk every morning in Central Park, for an hour. And today we heard some flickers singing. That means spring is here."

* * *

Of course those flickers (being birds) are different from the kind caused by partaking overmuch of the beverages which Geraldine Farrar appears to have had in the private car which was descended upon by curious prohibition men.

* * *

If Manager Foley had been farsighted he might have tied the bottles to the under rigging of Miss Farrar's private car. Seems as though she hadn't the complete privacy one would feel a private car affords.

* * *

A moderately musical person remarked, a few days ago—seeking to impress his hearers with the growing importance and popularity of music—that it was almost as democratic as the bathing beaches.

* * *

It appears that the lunch of Bobby Linderman and Horace Coon—Wolfsohn staff members, both, and right willing young workers—was overlooked by The Musical Digest gastronomic observer. It took place in Brown's Chop House; Bobby paid the check; and Horace hasn't yet made restitution to Bobby for his share in it.

* * *

They say Jascha Heifetz will be gone two years from these parts, but will he? After a year's absence it is probable that the digitally dexterous Jascha will be back again, fiddling away for more coin of the realm.

* * *

Another of the Metropolitan artists who will make the trip to South America to appear in the performances at the Colon Theatre in Buenos Aires is Angelo Bada. First, however, he will be heard this spring in Paris.

* * *

It was rather an expensive trip which Alessandro Bonci made to Philadelphia a week or so ago to sing with the Puccini Opera Company in L'Elisir d'Amore. A thief took from his car a small handbag, containing valuable jewelry, and a large suitcase which contained his costumes and other clothes. The property lost was reported by the police to be worth between two and three thousand dollars, although there were some jewels which are priceless for sentimental reasons.

* * *

That tea at Frederick Schlieder's studio a few afternoons ago developed into a recital of improvisations at the piano by the host . . . upon demand of the guests.

Congratulations to May Korb! She completes her record for 100 per cent reengagements when she sings at Leighton, Pa., Easton, Pa., and Newark, N. J., this month.

* * *

Lunch at the Russian Inn with Michael Press and Adolf Bolm became flavored with thrills when the violinist began relating his experiences in Russia at the outbreak of the revolution.

* * *

Eddie Johnson is the latest to heed the call: "Go East, young man." He will sail some time in May for a tour of nineteen concerts in the Orient. Three of them will be given in Tokio. Mabel Garrison will be sailing about the same time toward the same place for the same purpose.

Eddie will continue to move through India to Europe and come back for his work in the United States after having circumnavigated the globe.

* * *

The performance of the Barber of Seville in Washington on April 13 will be under the baton of Jacques Samossoud. Feodor Chaliapin will be the Basilio.

* * *

If you were to ask them, the Metropolitan Opera authorities would inform you that Claudia Muzio is not to return there next season. But regarding the season of 1926-1927—who knows?

Before leaving for Paris Claudia was the guest of Mr. Gatti-Casazza in his box to hear Elisabeth Rethberg in Andrea Chenier.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. George Liebling were the guests of Dr. and Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler at dinner at the Cooper-Carlton Hotel in Chicago on March 23. The guests included Mrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch (Clara Clemens), Mrs. Strauss, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Hageman, Mr. and Mrs. Rene Devries and others. After dinner Mr. Liebling played Liszt's Second Ballad. Renee Thornton sang two of Mr. Hageman's songs and the hostess, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, played two compositions of Schuett and Brockway.

* * *

When Curt Taucher returned to the Metropolitan to sing in Die Meistersinger after his accident, he was greeted with a gift of a silver cigar box containing a testimonial signed by many of his friends in the opera. The stage-hands of the company have attempted to make the German tenor an honorary member of their union.

* * *

At this performance, which closed the Wagner matinee cycle, Giulio Gatti-Casazza in a printed notice thanked the subscribers to the series for their numbers, their profound attention, and their enthusiastic applause during the six performances. He also had a word of thanks for the cordiality of the newspaper reviews.

* * *

Opera singers are not monopolizing misfortune these days. On March 24 Frieda Hempel fell while taking a brisk walk in Central Park in New York. She thought nothing of her accident, attended a dinner in her honor that evening, and sang in her Carnegie Hall concert next night.

Next morning she called a physician, for her side still hurt her, and found that she had been going about her affairs with a badly bruised rib. Mme. Hempel is quite well now and has started for her concerts on the Coast.

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

The Art of Being Prepared
See Page 5

VOL. VII. NO. 26 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, APRIL 14, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

APR 18 1925

Announce Details of Third San Francisco Autumn Opera Season

Merola Arranging Series of Eight Subscription and Four Extra Performances.

ENGAGE LOCAL CHORUS

San Francisco, April 11.—The third season of grand opera will be held at the Civic Auditorium here during September and October, 1925, according to an announcement by Gaetano Merola, musical director. The season will consist of eight subscription performances, two Saturday night operas, one gala performance, and a children's matinee.

Included on the list of artists already engaged are Claudia Muzio, Elvira de Hidalgo, Rosina Torri, a soprano from La Scala who makes her first American appearance, Marguerite d'Alvarez, Irene Marlo, Tito Schipa, Fernand Ansseau, Antonio Cortis, Lodovico Oliviero, Riccardo Stracciari, Cesare Formichi, Marcel Journet, Vittorio Trevisan, and Antonio Nicolich.

Mr. Merola will be assisted in the conducting by Pietro Cimini and Giacomo Spadoni, and the orchestra, as in past seasons, will be the San Francisco Symphony. A chorus of one hundred and twenty-five voices composed entirely of local talent, has already started rehearsals under the direction of Mr. Spadoni. Natale Carossio will direct the ballet of twenty-four dancers.

An important feature of the season is the engagement of Giovanni Grandi, scenic painter from La Scala, Milan, who will come to San Francisco at the close of the season in Milan to direct the scenic department of the company.

In addition to the season here, at the request of a group of music loving citizens of Los Angeles, Mr. Merola will send his complete company to that city for five or six performances. A Los Angeles orchestra and chorus will assist at these performances. The new auditorium which is nearing completion will have a seating capacity of 5,500 which will permit of a low cost of admission.

The operas to be presented in San Francisco will be chosen from the following list: Aida, Samson et Dalila, La Traviata, Rigoletto, Manon (Massenet), Barber of Seville, Martha, L'Amore dei Tre Re, Faust, Anima Allegra which will have its first presentation in America outside the Metropolitan Opera House), La Tosca, Madama Butterfly, and Fedora.

Melchissedec, French Basso, Dies

Paris, April 10.—Melchissedec, French basso, has died here at the age of seventy-seven. He was born at Clermont-Ferrand on May 7, 1848 He made his debut at the Opera-Comique in 1866 in Cohen's Jose-Maria. He taught at the Conservatoire beginning in 1894, although he did not give up his stage appearances until later.

Willem Mengelberg, Dutch conductor, is appearing in New York this season for the last time tonight, leading the second performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Schola Cantorum. Mr. Mengelberg will return in the fall to conduct the concerts of the first half of the Philharmonic's eighty-fourth season.

Bulletins of News

Portland, Ore., April 13.—Theodore Spiering, violinist, composer, and conductor, has been engaged as the regular conductor of the Portland Symphony Orchestra for next season. The invitation to direct the Orchestra followed Mr. Spiering's recent appearance in this city as guest conductor with the orchestra. Mr. Spiering will come here from New York early in the fall to prepare for the four months season which opens in November.

The Orchestra plans not only to add to the number of home concerts next year, but to include in its itinerary Seattle, Denver, Tacoma, San Francisco, and other large Pacific Coast cities.

Rochester, April 11.—Six musical compositions by young American composers have been selected from the fifty-four submitted in the contest held by the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester. The decision was made public today by the jury consisting of Albert Coates, Ernest Bloch, and Howard Hanson.

The six works chosen for the concert on May 2 by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra are by the following composers: Aaron Copland, Mark Silver, and Bernard Rogers of New York; George F. McKay, of Lead, S. O.; William Quincy Porter, of Cleveland; and Adolph Weiss, of Rochester. In addition to the chosen numbers, the orchestra will give the first performance of a work by Donald Tweedy of the Eastman School faculty. Mr. Hanson, composer and director of the Eastman School, will conduct the program.

A concert to celebrate the eightieth birthday of Leopold Auer will be given in Carnegie Hall, New York, April 28 by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Josef Hofmann, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Jascha Heifetz, and Efrem Zimbalist.

Rochester, April 11.—Albert Coates, English conductor, has resigned as conductor of the recently organized Philharmonic Orchestra in this city. (Further details of Mr. Coates' resignation will be found on Page 7).

Gino Baldini, assistant manager of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed manager of the St. Louis Symphony. Hugo A. Koehler, chairman of the Executive Committee of the St. Louis organization, has confirmed the appointment in a telegram to Mr. Baldini. Mr. Baldini has tendered his resignation to the New York Symphony Society, and will leave to take up his new duties in about a week.

In accepting the resignation Harry Harkness Flagler, president of the Symphony Society of New York, wrote Mr. Baldini a letter in which he expressed his deep appreciation for Mr. Baldini's services and loyalty during the period in which he was assistant manager of the orchestra.

Fourteenth Ravinia Park Opera Season Will Start June 27

Metropolitan and Chicago Opera Singers Engaged; Hasselmans and Papi to Conduct.

TO GIVE NOVELTIES

Chicago, April 13.—The fourteenth annual season of ten weeks and three days of opera and concerts at Ravinia Park opens June 27. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra has been re-engaged for the season and several operas new to Ravinia, will be included in the repertoire, according to an announcement by Louis Eckstein, director of the enterprise.

The following list of artists have been engaged for the entire season:

Conductors: Louis Hasselmans and Gennaro Papi, principal conductors; Wilfred Pelletier and Giacomo Spadoni, assistant conductors; and Eric DeLamarter, concert conductor.

Sopranos: Lucrezia Bori, Helen Freund, Margery Maxwell, Graziella Pareto, Rosa Raisa, and Marie Sundelius.

Mezzo-sopranos and contraltos: Merle Alcock, Ina Bourskaya, Anna Correnti, Philine Falco, and Ada Paggi.

Tenors: Mario Chamlee, Giovanni Martinelli, Giordano Paltrinieri, Tito Schipa, and Armand Tokatyan.

Baritones: Mario Basiola, Louis d'Angelo, Giuseppe Danise, Desire Defrere, and Giacomo Rimini.

Bassos: Paolo Ananian, Virgilio Lazzari, Leon Rothier, and Vittorio Trevisan.

Mme. Bori will sing Thais and Manon Lescaut (Puccini) and Mme. Raisa will sing for the first time at Ravinia Madama Butterfly and Fedora. Mr. Martinelli will add Andrea Chenier to his repertory. The new operas on the list are Mignon, Jewels of the Madonna, Don Pasquale, Manon Lescaut, Ballo in Maschera, Crispino e la Comare, and La Juive.

Other operas, several of which are revived after two or more seasons of disuse there, are Martha, La Traviata, Cavalleria Rusticana, Rigoletto, Aida, Lucia, Tales of Hoffmann, Carmen, Pagliacci, Faust, Tosca, La Boheme, Secret of Suzanne, Manon (Massenet), Romeo et Juliette, Barber of Seville, Lakme, L'Elisir d'Amore, L'Amore dei Tre Re, La Navarraise, Lohengrin, L'Amico Fritz, Le Chemineau, Samson and Delilah, and Fra Diavolo.

The stage manager for the operatic performances will be Armando Agnini.

Musicians Quit Vienna Volksoper

After a long wrangle between the management and the employees, the Vienna Volksoper closed down April 10 for an indefinite period, according to a special despatch to the New York Times. The musicians refused to come to an agreement regarding terms of their work. The newspapers in Vienna have pointed out the connection of the strife with the municipal policy of overtaxing the theatres. They point out that the Volksoper is only one other in the succession of victims of this policy.

Minneapolis Enjoys Varied Music Fare

Henri Verbrugghen Conducts Two Orchestra Concerts; Maria Jeritza Gives Recital.

Minneapolis, March 28.—Last week's Symphony concert, Henri Verbrugghen conducting, introduced Haydn's G major Symphony here. Other numbers were Joseph Jongen's Fantasy on Two Popular Walloon Carols, and d'Indy's Symphony for orchestra and piano on a French Mountain Air. Harold Bauer, who played the piano part in this number, was the soloist in Schumann's Concerto.

Victor Nilsson of the Journal wrote that Mr. Bauer is known for "his masterly manner of crispness, vigor, and perfection of pianoforte playing, but last night his interpretations were more playing of his own self than ever before in his many appearances here." In the d'Indy number, according to James Davies he "contributed magnificently to the ensemble." This reviewer commented that the Haydn work is "in the characteristic spirit of this genial and fecund master."

Three novelties were offered by Mr. Verbrugghen on the twentieth popular program of the orchestra last Sunday. These were Mortimer Wilson's New Orleans Overture which proved Mr. Wilson "both gifted and skillful," according to Mr. Nilsson; the orchestration of Two Sketches by the local composer, James A. Bliss, which Mr. Davies thought "much more effective" in orchestral garb; and the Bax Fantasy for viola and orchestra, with Paul Lemay as soloist.

According to Mr. Davies, Mr. Lemay "revealed a smooth, facile technique, a beautiful tone and impressed, as he always does, by his dignified musicianship." Mr. Nilsson commended him and found Bax "a composer of unmistakable creativeness of mood and melody, coupled with many other fine qualities." MacDowell's E minor Suite and Weber's Invitation to the Dance completed the program.

The Verbrugghen String Quartet had the assistance of Myrtle Meggy, Australian pianist, in their concert at the second March meeting of the Symphony Club. Their rendition of the Brahms Quintet received favorable mention in the press.

The assisting artists at the last Thursday Musical were William Lindsay, Scotch pianist, Agnes Griswold Teasdale, soprano, and Ethel Paine Collins, organist. All three received commendatory notices.

Maria Jeritza, assisted by Maximilian Rose, violinist, gave a recital in Kenwood Armory recently. Mr. Nilsson wrote that "in her blonde loveliness and stateliness she made an unforgettable stage picture, while through directness and sincerity of personality and methods she won all hearts."

The William Wade Hinshaw production in English of Mozart's Marriage of Figaro was well received here. In the cast were Pavel Ludikar, Editha Fleischer, Clytie Hine, Celia Turrill, Herman Gelhausen, and Ralph Brainard.

METROPOLITAN OPERA BILL
(LAST WEEK)

WEDNESDAY

Boris Godunoff (matinee) — with Mmes. Bourskaya, Delaunois, and Dalossy, and Messrs. Chaliapin, Rothier, Errolle, and Bada; Mr. Papi conducting.

Traviata (evening)—with Mmes. Bori, Egener, and Galli; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and de Luca; Mr. Serafin conducting.

THURSDAY

Freischuetz — with Mmes. Rethberg and Dalossy; and Messrs. Taucher, Bohnen, Schuetzendorf, and Rothier; Mr. Bodanzky conducting.

FRIDAY

Aida—with Mmes. Rethberg, Branzell, and Rudolph; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Bohnen, and Mardones; Mr. Serafin conducting.

SATURDAY

Boheme (matinee)—with Mmes. Mueller and Hunter; and Messrs. Johnson, Scotti, and Didur; Mr. Papi conducting.

Trovatore (evening) — with Mmes. Easton, and Telva; and Messrs. Martinelli and Danise; Mr. Papi conducting.

Will Hold Mass Meeting To Protest Concert Ban

A mass meeting will be held in Carnegie Hall Friday as a protest against the discontinuance of the Goldman Band Concert on the Mall in Central Park this summer. At the meeting, which was inaugurated by the Citizens' Committee on Music, of which Mrs. Bella Zilberman is chairman, Edwin Franko Goldman will speak and his band will be heard. In a formal statement issued last week Mr. Goldman said:

"It has been stated that I would broadcast next Wednesday night from Station WFBH and review the entire controversy. I have no intention of opening up this subject again. I may speak over the radio, but my talk will have no bearing on the controversy.

"The series of sixty concerts was offered to the city by members of the Guggenheim families under the same conditions as last year. Because of the conditions imposed by the chamberlain it was found impossible for us to give the concerts in Central Park. We have every intention of giving the concerts if a suitable place can be found and the Guggenheims do not want to abandon the concerts.

"The committee of citizens has arranged a mass meeting of protest, to be held in Carnegie Hall on April 17, and have asked me to speak on that occasion. They also have urged me to have my band appear.

"Because of the great interest which they have taken in the concerts and in the recent controversy and because of the fact that they are rendering a truly signal service to the public and are honoring our concerts and our band, I feel that I cannot refuse either of their invitations. I will say just a few words at the meeting and will have the band present to perform."

Hanson Conducts in Los Angeles

Presents His Lux Aeterna; Elizabeth Rothwell and Germaine Schnitzer Appear With Orchestra.

Los Angeles, April 2.—An unusually interesting program was offered by Conductor Walter Henry Rothwell at last week's concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Elizabeth Rothwell was the soloist, and Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, directed his Lux Aeterna.

Bruno Davis Ussher of the Express wrote that Mrs. Rothwell's voice was "glowing with color, new richness in the middle register. Hers are tones of such beauty, given with such musicianship, that one regrets a fluctuating tremolo which also interferes with diction." The Daily News reported that her voice "is smooth and well controlled" and Carl Bronson of the Herald commented that "her top notes were glorious and she has a way of pouring them out that few of the great singers of the day have acquired."

According to Florence Lawrence of the Examiner, Mrs. Rothwell displayed "a freer tone, greater control over her vocal effects and magnificent volume." Miss Lawrence also admired her increased lyric quality. Francis Kendig of the Times observed that she sang "warmly and glowingly."

This reviewer asserted that Mr. Hanson is "deserving of the utmost encouragement and recognition from his fellow musicians." Mr. Ussher asserted that the composer is "already a musical individuality creatively, possessing remarkable technique. . . . There is a faint outside influence in orchestration, but even so they may be mere similarities, as they sound genuine, born from a deep, spiritual clairvoyance of the soul. This one feels also in Hanson's direct, informal, yet commanding use of the baton." He thought it "human drama" with "one great haunting theme."

Florence Lawrence said that the composer "attracted profound attention. With novel harmonic forms, an unusual attention to the percussion instruments and a viola obbligato, the work offers its philosophical theme with a wealth of instrumental color and verve." His "musicianly earnestness" won Mr. Bronson's praise. He wrote that his "instrumental inversions produce effects that are startling, original and before unheard, and he has accomplished this without harshness" and out of this "he suddenly unweaves a melodic thread of transparent beauty and soul warmth." The Daily News chronicler thought it abounded in "strange rhythms, but it is cacophony, and not harmony."

* * *

An all-Tschaikowsky program was played by the orchestra at the last popular concert. Germaine Schnitzer was soloist in the B flat major Piano Concerto. The Pathetique Symphony and the Nutcracker Suite completed the program.

Mme. Schnitzer's command of both power and delicacy shown in this formidable work was lauded in the Express, and the Daily News reported that the composition was rendered "in a masterly style" with "brilliant technique" and that she "completely won her audience." Francis Kendig wrote that she played it with "a completeness of musicianship that one finds only occasionally." Ralph Greene of the Examiner asserted that she "proved herself to be a brilliant technician, and a musician of thorough training and insight. . . . Her tone, though not of tremendous sonority, blended excellently with the orchestral ensemble." Mr. Bronson said that "this very glowing artist renewed our enthusiasm for her musicianship."

Engages Artists for Mass

Bethlehem, Pa., April 7.—The soloists engaged for the performance of Bach's B minor Mass on May 30 by the Bach Choir of Bethlehem under the direction of J. Fred Wolle are Mildred Faas, soprano, Mabelle C. Addison, contralto, Nicholas Douty, tenor, and Charles Trowbridge Tittmann, bass. Each of these artists has sung in this work before.

The choir has been invited to sing at the International Conference of World Fellowship Through Music, to be held in Washington, D. C., tomorrow. The Mass will be sung there. On May 29 the Christmas Oratorio will be sung by the organization at home. The Philadelphia Orchestra will accompany all its performances.

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

WALTER GOLDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
Available for accompanying in the East
Studio Address: Steinway Bldg.
109 West 57th St., New York

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

ELSA ALSEN
Famous Wagnerian Dramatic Soprano
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG 1425 Broadway, New York City

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

A New Note in Song-Recital Giving Charming Programs of Melodious Beethoven Songs—With Talks.
Management:
DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York City
FREEMANTEL

Philadelphia Greets Martinelli in Juive

First Quaker City Appearance After Illness; Mme. Larsen-Todsen Sings.

Philadelphia, April 8.—The production of La Juive here last night by the Metropolitan Opera Company was featured by Giovanni Martinelli's first appearance in Philadelphia since his illness. To quote Sidney L. Laciar of the Public Ledger, he "gave one of the outstanding operatic performances of this or of any other season in a superb delineation." The Record reported that it was one of the 'greatest personal triumphs" of the season.

This writer said Mr. Martinelli's voice "enthralled his listeners" and that he sang "with brilliant tone and great opulence of voice." He considered that the powerful and dramatic voice of Nanny Larsen-Todsen made the fervor of her singing "always impressive." Jose Mardones as the Cardinal proved himself "one of the best of singers as well as "a dignified and impressive actor." Ralph Errolle gave an "effective" impersonation of Leopold, and Charlotte Ryan's voice was "of excellent quality."

Mr. Laciar continued that Mr. Martinelli's vocal performance was "perfection" and that Mme. Larsen-Todsen's portrayal was "a vital, living and pathetic part" in voice, stage presence and action. He thought that Mr. Mardones rose at times to "great heights of vocal and dramatic power." Mr. Errolle, according to this reviewer, revealed "a voice of great beauty and fair power which, coupled with his fine stage presence, fitted him ideally for the role." Miss Ryan was praised as were the rest of the cast, including Arnold Gabor, Louis d'Angelo, and James Wolfe.

In the North American, Linton Martin wrote that Mr. Martinelli acted "with external adequacy" and was vocally "more vital" than Eleazar would be expected to be outside of opera conventions and customs. Mme. Larsen-Todsen "demonstrated her versatility;" Mr. Mardones was "sonorously impressive."

Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer commented that the tenor sang "with fine, firm voice and enacted the character with continued understanding," and that Mme. Larsen-Todsen's "remarkable voice was well suited to the music." Others in the cast he commended, and Mr. Hasselmans "made the old score sound vigorous and inspiring." Mr. Martin agreed that he conducted "sympathetically."

* * *

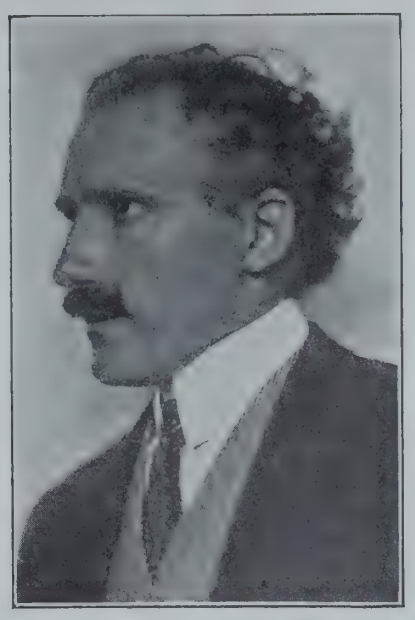
The Metropolitan Opera Company gave "a splendid production" (Stanley Muschamp in the Inquirer) of Die Meistersinger at the Academy the previous Tuesday night.

Mr. Muschamp continued that it was a performance "of remarkable evenness. Mme. Maria Mueller has the presence and voice to realize a good interpretation of the character of Eva. Her singing was of fine quality, evenly sustained and intelligently expressive." He thought that Clarence Whitehill made much of the part of Hans Sachs "vocally and histrionically." Gustav Schuetzendorf did "a fine piece of character acting and singing" and Lawrence Tibbett gave to his role "considerable distinction." Others in the cast were mentioned favorably by this reviewer.

According to Linton Martin, "Schuetzendorf's Beckmesser has gained in richness of humor and felicity of detail." Mr. Martin likewise found "fine breadth and poise" in Mr. Whitehill's work, and thought that Mme. Mueller "sang beautifully and acted winsomely."

Mr. Laciar asserted that it was "one of the finest performances of the current season" and that Rudolf Laubenthal "scored a success . . . and did some magnificent singing and acting." He considered that Mme. Mueller "showed the same magnificent poise and consummate artistry that she displayed in her earlier appearances."

The chronicler in the Record thought the performance "satisfying without being of unusual distinction" and considered Mme. Mueller made the most of her few opportunities." Mr. Laubenthal, in his opinion, "fitted well into the picture." The remainder of the cast was made up of Messrs. Bloch, Bada, Altglass, Paltrinieri, d'Angelo, Ananian, Wolf, Gustafson, and Gabor.



ARTURO TOSCANINI

NEGOTIATIONS with the conductor of La Scala in Milan have been completed, it has been announced, and he will make the first of his guest appearances with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra next season on January 14, 1926.

Between that date and February 17 Mr. Toscanini will conduct the orchestra eleven times, ten in New York and one in Brooklyn. He will be the first Italian conductor to lead the Philharmonic in the eighty-three years of its existence. Mr. Toscanini toured the United States at the head of the orchestra of La Scala in a series of symphonic concerts during the season of 1920-1921.

Duo-Pianists Assist Stokowski

Maier and Pattison Lauded in Memorial Concert; Philadelphia Recitals Few.

Philadelphia, April 7.—The program of the second of the two concerts given by Fritz Scheel twenty-five years ago which marked the inception of the present Philadelphia Orchestra was repeated last week by the orchestra under Leopold Stokowski's baton.

Guy Maier and Lee Pattison were the soloists in Hill's Jazz Scherzo and Bliss' Concerto, the two novelties on the program. Other numbers were the Eroica Symphony, the Vorspiel to Lohengrin, and Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody.

Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer said that Messrs. Maier and Pattison played these "extraordinary" compositions with "complete mastery of the technical problems offered, and doubtless with a clear insight into the meanings the composers have to convey." According to Sidney L. Laciar of the Public Ledger, "they have developed the art of playing two pianos to a point but rarely reached before in the matter of precision, in which they are almost uncanny as well as in balance of tone and perfection of rhythm." He found the Scherzo "original and generally pleasing," although it had "eccentric" moments.

In the opinion of Linton Martin of the North American "neither work can be considered epochal, but both were played with plenty of verve by Messrs. Maier and Pattison. The Scherzo is an inconsequential bit of refined jazz." The Bliss Concerto he thought "a chameleon-like composition." The Record observed that the pianists' skill "is really astonishing, interesting to observe and undoubtedly the result of some strenuous work and application. The music was great fun. Not very inspirational, perhaps, but modern in a commonplace way and given in superb fashion." The program was repeated at last night's concert.

* * *

Two recent recitalists were Reba Patton, lyric soprano, and Frank Gittelson, violinist. Miss Patton made her Philadelphia debut yesterday and, to quote Mr. Laciar, it was one of the most promising made in some time. He asserted that she displayed "a voice of extreme beauty, including that exceedingly rare element, equality in all three registers, combined with a remarkable interpretative sense, considering her years, a temperament governed by artistic feeling, and a pleasing stage presence and utter sense of manner."

Mr. Gittelson gave the twelfth of the faculty recitals at the Curtis Institute of Music. According to the Ledger he displayed "a remarkable beauty of tone . . . Of course his technique was always more than equal to the demands of the work and his interpretations were consistently artistic."

* * *

Other musical events were the last concert of the second season of the Friends of Chamber Music Society; a program of Russian music and dancing before the Philadelphia Forum; and spring concert of the Choral Art Society with Miron Poliakin as soloist.

At the first of these concerts, the artists were Harry Aleinikoff, Aaron Gorodetsky, Henri Elkan, Milton Prinz, Louis Boehse, Jules Serpentini, Frank del Negro, and Isadore Berg. The writer in the Ledger highly commended the ensemble playing shown. The Russian program was provided by Bernardo Olshansky, baritone, the Balalaika Orchestra, directed by Sunis S. Samuels, and Mr. and Mrs. Vietale, Fokine dancers. Mr. Olshansky was in "fine" voice, and the rest of the program was praised by Mr. Laciar. This writer said that Mr. Poliakin, soloist with the Choral Art Society, "showed a remarkable beauty of tone, a faultless execution and perfect artistry of interpretation." The Society sang "superbly" under the direction of H. Alexander Matthews.

Sings for Benefit of Blind

Charlotte Lund, soprano, gave a song recital on the evening of April 5 in the Princess Theatre, New York, for the benefit of a fund for a series of opera recitals for the blind. Miss Lund, accompanied by N. Val Peavey, "sang with ample volume of tone, with some passages of a somewhat hard quality, and interpretative skill, faring well in declamatory numbers," according to the Herald Tribune.

ROSA PONSELLE
Exclusive Management
NATIONAL CONCERTS, INC.
1451 Broadway—New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: CHARLES L. WAGNER
D. F. McSWEENEY
51 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

Elena GERHARDT
Management: GEORGE ENGLES—Aeolian Hall, New York City
STEINWAY PIANO

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

FLORENCE MACBETH
Leading Coloratura Soprano
Chicago Civic Opera Company

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, APRIL 14, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 26

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.; Canada, $6.00; Foreign Countries, $7.00

Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

Payment for Freight

It is usual for railroads to demand and receive payment for the freight they transport from one point to another. By that token it is equally proper to pay for whatever is regarded of sufficient value to be used for consumption—be it individual or collective.

Since the advent of the radio it has been the custom for broadcasting organizations to secure the services gratis of nearly everyone who has contributed to the entertainment of the radio-listening public, and to make use of such music as was considered desirable, also without payment to composers and publishers.

By some reasoning process peculiar to the corporations chiefly interested, the little matter of paying for what should have been paid for has been poo-poohed as of no consequence. Why bother, when "artists" susceptible to the lure of being promoted publicly have been willing to give their services without receiving a fee, and when all one had to do was to use copyrighted music . . . whether or no.

But the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting at Cincinnati, in a recent decision reverses a lower court which held that a certain broadcasting organization had no need to pay for putting a music composition "on the air."

The decision disposes nicely of a certain phase of broadcasting by emphasizing that the organzation in question is engaged in manufacturing and selling radio products for profit.

Therein lies the milk in this particular cocoanut. If there were no music and no music persons to do the broadcasting there would in all likelihood be no such purchase by the public of the vast quantity of radio apparatus as now prevails.

So it is just that the broadcasting organizations should pay the freight, and that the price therefor should be a fair price in the circumstances.

In the decision above referred to the court held: "A performance in our judgment is no less public because the listeners are unable to communicate with one another, or are not assembled within an enclosure or gathered together in some open stadium or park or other public place. Nor can a performance, in our judgment, be deemed private because each listener may be alone in the privacy of his home. Radio broadcasting is intended, and, in fact, does reach a very much larger number of the public at the moment of the rendition than any other medium of performance. The artist is constantly addressing a great and widely scattered audience and is therefore participating in a public performance."

That is, to use a pertinent phrase, "carrying freight." And it merits a just compensation.

Did someone mention a summer season of opera at the New York Metropolitan? In an age of things unexpected such a thing is not, after all, an utter impossibility.

Now that the music season is approaching its end all the long-haired masculine members of the fraternity can indulge in their annual hair-cut.

Let serious and gifted students of singing take courage. The death of Jean de Reszke does not remove from the field the one and only capable teacher resident in Europe. There are others, now living and active, as capable as he was. And there are others, in even larger numbers, quite as capable (some adjudged even more so) who are practicing their professions in this country.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

IN Germany Gustav Mahler and his symphonies are held in high honor. His music is sung and played repeatedly, and its welcome does not grow cold.

In the United States any critic of music can tell you without hearing more than a movement of Mahler what is wrong with him. The criticism is likely to be exactly what the same person might say of the music of Reger or Pfitzner or Bruckner, or what a Frenchman might say of Brahms.

It is always admitted in such criticism that these composers are serious, sincere, skilled in their craft and occasionally ingenious; but at the same time they are uninspired, pompous, long-winded, dull and oddly lacking in taste, so that although they may speak like gods on one page, on the next they may just as well be waving their arms like impotent puppets.

IN Mahler's Second Symphony, which the New York Philharmonic Orchestra played twice recently, it is both hard and easy to discover the origin of the customary Mahler criticism. It is hard for me to understand it because I believe that this symphony is one of the masterpieces of music.

The traditional unpopularity of Mahler is caused originally, I think, by his incessant seriousness, his unremitting emphasis. There is hardly a melodic idea in the Second Symphony which would not fit the direction, "Grave."

The beautiful second movement, which in the hands of another composer would probably have been treated with a light, swift touch, is controlled by Mahler with an iron hand. He warns the conductor throughout that the tempo must be restrained.

If one were to judge by the themes themselves the tempo of this movement must inevitably be faster than Mahler intended. He realized this, for his indications have unusual emphasis, such as: "Ja nicht eilen!" and "Nicht eilen. Gehalten!"

This restraint is characteristic, and at first it may be annoying. Later it becomes one of the most important elements in the undeniable attractiveness of the Andante.

The Scherzo is equally good. It, too, is carefully restrained and is predominantly in minor. The tapping of the Ruthe, where it is scored, for example, is as grave and measured as any tuba part in the repertory of an old German ship's band. Yet it is exactly this sort of instrument that invites jazz musicians to crazy hilarity of syncopation.

THE first and closing movements of the Second Symphony are in Mahler's "pompous" vein. For my part I can find no point at which the interest of the first movement lags or its power collapses From its arresting opening to its precipitous close it is moving music, always skillfully constructed and never cheap or obvious or dull.

Several instrumental parts of the heterogeneous fourth and fifth movements of the Symphony are open to criticism, although the beauty of the vocal passages is extraordinary.

There are at least two points at which Mahler can be accused strongly of having been something less than ingenious. The first of the two passages in question is the march (marked "Kraeftig," after the double bar on page 158 of the miniature score).

Taken by itself this march may be undistinguished and impotent. In its context there is justification for it, for this passage is a basis upon which Mahler builds upward towards the climax at which the chorus enters. His method is traditional. He repeats the theme and its characteristic rhythms always with new voices added, and with cumulative contrapuntal and instrumental force.

The second example of questionable material which I have in mind is the passage (at No. 22 in the score) in which trumpets, triangle, cymbals and bass drum make martial music outside, against the pensive and melodious woodwinds and strings within.

The fanfare taken by itself is theatrical and pseudo-imposing. The percussion instruments detract emphasis rather than add it. However, the force which they lend by sheer contrast to the cello and bassoon melody and to that ingeniously poignant motif in the other woodwinds, I think, justifies Mahler's material and increases its effectiveness.

FOR the most part the score is startlingly original, especially in view of the time of its composition, the late eighties and early nineties.

I do not mean to say that it is out of the line of music of the past. The whole scheme of the work is frankly another version of Beethoven's choral symphony. The Andante is obviously descended from the classical minuet. The voice of Wagner is heard on more than one page—a phrase from the Walkuere in the first movement, the song of the Rhine maidens in the trumpet in the middle part of the Scherzo, the supertonic suspension in the tonic chord, reminiscent of Tristan, in the last movement just prior to the "Wieder aufzubluehen" sung by the tenors and basses in the chorus.

The texture of the music, nevertheless, its orchestration, the development of climaxes, the general mood and sound of it, are so strongly individual that one never can have the feeling that any other composer could have done the sort of thing that Mahler did here.

MENGELBERG'S presentation of the music was quite beyond praise. The score is full of exact and often arbitrary directions for the conductor. The Philharmonic leader followed them all with a single exception. In the last movements he chose to neglect a number of "absetzen" markings and to play strictly to tempo without pause. Probably this choice was better for the effect.

The texture of the music was clear at all times, thanks both to the skill of the leader and the lucidity and economy of Mahler's scoring. The performance illustrated a sort of virtuosity which did not depend on original fancy in interpretation or showy exploitation of tone or gratuitous development of climax. I had the feeling that if Mahler's Second Symphony could stand up out of the printed page and walk about in sound dimensions it would be just about as the Philharmonic Orchestra made it.

All of which served as reminder that Willem Mengelberg has been a master conductor for nearly three decades and that, although the novelty of his presence has worn off in his five seasons in New York, he is still a master among conductors.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

The Art of Being Prepared

A Mastery of Which, According to Merle Alcock, Is Essential to Success in the Art of Song

by KAY KENNEDY

THE late afternoon sun that drifted through the open windows framed in dull wine-colored curtains brought to momentary life the shining surface of the piano and glinted on the gilt cage in which a canary chirped blithely.

A reposeful room, harmonious in the blending of many colors, it was pervaded by the personality that had created it. Suddenly the quiet was abruptly shattered by the barking of a dog.

"Jiggs, be quiet! Is that a polite way to greet our guest? Come, be introduced like a nice boy." Merle Alcock, in a graceful tea gown of rose velvet—a color repeated in the bowl of tulips on the table at the end of the divan—entered with the cause of the disturbance under her arm. A very small, white, woolly cause who, in spite of his mistress' remonstrances, still eyed the visitor suspiciously.

"I have always loved dogs—and this pocket edition is the only kind one can have in an apartment." Mrs. Alcock seated herself at the other end of the divan after Jiggs had sulkily curled up in a corner. It was quite evident that he disapproved of the intruder. "I had a lovely large collie when I was a little girl, I remember him well. Strange, isn't it, how incidents of your childhood recur at times? For instance, I have a very vivid and very distinct remembrance of my first public appearance.

"My father, you know, was a minister. He was also a veteran of the Civil War, and in the little town in Iowa where we lived soldiers' reunions were held every year. It was customary at these affairs for the gifted children of the soldiers to offer something in the way of entertainment. Daddy was very proud of my ability to 'speak pieces' so at one of these reunions when I was only seven years old, I was scheduled to recite. Through some error my name was omitted from the program but Daddy (who, as chaplain, was conducting the entertainment) was nothing daunted, and when he thought it was high time for me to appear, he merely stopped the proceedings and announced that I would speak my piece. Disappointment and then surprise had me worked up to such a state of excitement that I don't know how I ever got through those three long verses! I will never, never forget how thrilled and scared I was!

"And I have never gotten over that same feeling when I sing in public. It isn't exactly nervousness—rather an excitement, a tension that carries me through whatever I am doing. Something of a strain, of course, but not that ghastly fear of breaking down and not being able to go through with it that some people seem to have."

MERLE ALCOCK Photo by Mishkin

Mrs. Alcock rumpled her hair as she smiled reminiscently. It is black hair with surprising lights in it—as surprising as the vivid blueness of her eyes.

"I think the reason I don't have that fear is that I am always prepared for what I have to do. In fact 'being prepared' is quite a hobby of mine. It is my theory that the only way to seize every opportunity for progress that may offer itself is to be prepared for it. Opportunities are only too fleeting and you must be ready to seize them with no hesitation. I realize how difficult it is to keep the fires of ambition burning while you are waiting. But unless you are always on the alert, your chances will slip away almost before you know that they have arrived!"

Patting the now reconciled Jiggs, the singer went on to recount some of the anecdotes of her busy career. She told of how she got her first church position in New York by singing the Habanera from Carmen! And she spoke of her experiences in church and oratorio work.

"If I ever teach, I will try to impress on my pupils the importance of singing for the joy of it—of singing because they love it. I would also try to teach them to perfect an ideal and then concentrate on it, and not to confuse confidence with conceit. Confidence is necessary to success while conceit is more than likely to spoil it.

"But primarily, I would want them to learn the art of singing for love of singing. It has always been a joy for me to sing. Whenever I am depressed or unhappy if I can sit down at my piano and sing, it brings me out of the depths more quickly than anything. Young singers should be made to realize that it is necessary to love what you're doing, to feel actual happiness in its accomplishment before you can get it over to an audience. It is just that you must throw yourself completely and joyously into every song and every role."

In a serious tone, she continued:

"There is one thing that I would like the public to know and that is that I feel that during the two years that I have been with the Metropolitan Opera Company I have learned more about singing and about music than in all the rest of the time I've studied.

"I have thought about this a great deal lately, and I attribute it to two things. First, of course, is the fact that by the time I went with the Metropolitan I was technically ready to grasp what there was to learn. But the other thing, and it has impressed me greatly, is the spirit of camaraderie and helpful good fellowship that prevails among the artists at the opera. In place of the petty jealousies that you might expect in such a large institution, there is a kindly willingness to help one another out. Why, if you sing a new role, every artist on the stage with you watches to give you your cues and help you along! Everyone seems anxious to help push you to the top, and nothing is left undone by the management to help you to succeed."

Gotham Sees Dancer in Return

Albertina Rasch gave her second New York dance recital at Carnegie Hall last Tuesday, assisted by Jacques Cartier, Agnes Roy, Mary Parsons, Natali Harasti, and Marcelo Fernandez. To quote the Herald Tribune, "as usual, graceful, sinuous, agile and able to indicate a variety of moods in motion and gesture, Miss Rasch was the central figure of these well-staged episodes and seemed matched in ability by the leading male dancer of her ensemble, Jacques Cartier."

Samaroff

SEASON 1925-1926 NOW BOOKING
under the Management of
WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU, INC.
250 West 57th Street, New York City
VICTOR RED SEAL RECORDS STEINWAY PIANO

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1921
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

The concert proved a triumph for

RETHBERG

READERS of the MUSICAL DIGEST have read of Mme. Elisabeth Rethberg's striking artistic success as a recital singer in the issues of March 31 and April 7. Herewith are presented proofs of Mme. Rethberg's unusual drawing power, written by trained observers, the music critics of New York.

"The concert proved a triumph for an artist whose modesty matches her accomplishments. Miss Rethberg's enviable reputation in opera had preceded her. The hall was packed; many stood back of the rail on the floor; many more were seated on the stage. The singer could readily have engaged a larger auditorium." (Olin Downes, Times)

"The customarily peaceful lobby of Aeolian Hall was thrown into a state of turmoil between 2.30 and 3.30 p. m. yesterday. Elisabeth Rethberg, a soprano of the Metropolitan, was about to burst into song recital and all these people were battling with one another to get into the hall to hear her." (W. J. Henderson, Sun)

"Evidently Elisabeth Rethberg's concert management had underestimated the affection of New York for this gifted member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, for the mob of enthusiasts that gathered to hear her song recital yesterday afternoon quite paralyzed the staff of Aeolian Hall, and it was not until half an hour after the scheduled time that enough chairs could be placed on the platform to accommodate the overflow and allow Mme. Rethberg to begin." (Deems Taylor, World)

"Yesterday she gave delight to an audience that filled Aeolian to its limit, the stage occupied by many chairs for scores of last minute ticket-buyers, and all the standees that fire laws would allow. It was a response that testified to the popular appeal of one of the most satisfying members of the local colony of foreign singers." (Grena Bennett, American)

"Monday afternoon is not, as a rule, a period for large audiences, but 3 o'clock yesterday found all the regular seats sold and, until the actual start, twenty-five minutes later, a gradual accumulation of seats on the stage." (F. D. Perkins, Herald-Tribune)

"One might have gathered from the thronged and palpitating condition of Aeolian Hall (the crowd filled the stage as well as the audience room), from the joyful noises and the profuse and resplendent blooms that the Metropolitan soprano was a recital favorite of long and settled standing." (H. F. Peyser, Telegram-Mail)

"So great was the jam outside the hall that the concert was delayed half an hour, and when it finally began every nook and cranny of the auditorium was filled, with as many people on the stage as could be accommodated." (Evening Post)

"A quite unprecedented thing occurred yesterday afternoon in the usually decorous matinee hours of Aeolian Hall. A crowd of excited, determined song lovers gathered about the doors, crowded all seats and a large portion of available stage room to hear Elisabeth Rethberg make her New York debut as a lieder singer." (Edward Cushing, Brooklyn Daily Eagle)

Concert Appearances for the Season 1925-1926 Now Booking

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON

Fisk Building
New York

Packard Building
Philadelphia

CERTIFIED THE MUSICAL DIGEST

STEINWAY PIANO

BRUNSWICK RECORDS

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

ROCHESTER, N. Y., continues on its music way, accomplishing every now and again something to attract attention. The latest mark to its credit came from the concert given recently by what is known as the Rochester Junior Orchestra, consisting of sixty-five children of the public schools, of the Eastman School of Music Orchestra, and the Hochstein Memorial Music School.

The personnel is made up of boys and girls, and was put together by Albert Coates. An account of the concert, which is said to have been remarkable for the quality of the playing—and the conducting by members of Mr. Coates' student conductors—appeared in the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle. Part of it is as follows:

"Harold Gleason conducted the Tannhauser Overture; Warren Gehrken, the first movement from Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Robert Barclay, Glinka's Russian Overture; Adolph Weiss, the Nimrod variation from Elgar's Enigma Variations; Vittorio Giannini, Berlioz's Rakoczy March; Wendell Hoss, the Meistersinger Overture; Nicolas Slonimsky, Borodin's In the Steppes; David Mattern, the third movement of Brahms' Fourth Symphony; Harold Smith, the Tristan and Isolde Liebestod; Herman Rudin, Liszt's Les Preludes; Sherman Clute, the William Tell Overture.

"The list of conductors is worth noting and there is plenty that might be written of their individual methods and the results they got. But the general interest is in the fact that here was a group of competent musicians who conducted orchestral compositions, each with an individual interpretation and plain capacity to secure that interpretation from the players. Mr. Gleason, Mr. Smith and Mr. Gehrken are well known organists; Mr. Hoss, Mr. Weiss and Mr. Rudin are members of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra; Mr. Clute, Mr. Mattern and Mr. Barclay are Rochester public school music men; Mr. Slonimsky is accompanist of the Eastman School opera department and was last week's Eastman Theatre soloist; Mr. Giannini is Mr. Coates' secretary and brother of Dusolina Giannini."

MRS. GIOVANNI MARTINELLI makes a strange confession. During the thirteen years her husband has been a leading tenor at the New York Metropolitan Opera House she has never heard him sing there. She declared a few days ago to an inquiring newspaper reporter:

"On two occasions I went to the opera when he didn't know about it," she said, "and sat for awhile in a box with a friend, but when his time came to sing I could not endure it. I got up, went outside into the corridor and stuffed my ears in real alarm, so I could not hear him, until they told me he had finished and begged me to listen to the applause.

"Why was this? Because I suffered so much from the fancy of a possible failure. I feared to hear him sing publicly in case he should not be at his best. I was afraid I should go distracted with disappointment. I have not been at the opera since. I have yet to hear Giovanni sing there."

BULLETIN NO. 2, issued by Concert Management Arthur Judson, contains an article headed "The Artist Pays." It is intended as an arithmetical diagram of why the fee of a certain class of music attractions cannot well be lowered—at present, at least, in the set of circumstances which prevail. Here is the managerial argument:

"When the cost of concert giving comes before the house for discussion, the expenses of at least one factor generally are overlooked. That factor is the artist, whose fee by no means is 'so much velvet.'

"Let us consider the $500 artist, who is the mainstay of most courses. He is a musician of merits, a good craftsman. His reputation may be confined chiefly to musical circles or to specific localities. He is not a sure-fire box-office attraction. Generally, he is a relatively new artist with a fine future before him or an established musician who, by the very nature of his gifts, cannot be expected to draw a huge public.

"The $500 artist usually has a season of from fifteen to thirty paid engagements. When it is possible to book him for more than thirty appearances he probably is worth more money. It is safe to say that a good average $500 artist can do about $10,000 worth of gross business in a year. If this sum were clear profit, there would be no more to say on the subject. We might wonder why the artist did not lower his fee per concert and increase the number of his appearances to fifty or more. That, however, is another question and is not at issue here.

"MOST ARTISTS cannot sit in their studios and wait for engagements to drift in. Every date obtained for an artist in the $500 class represents an expense to the artist of about $100—the manager's commission. Some artists pay 15 per cent commission to their agents and others pay as much as 25 per cent, but the majority hold contracts calling for 20 per cent.

"Does this seem like an exorbitant commission? Let us analyze the work which brings to the manager his $100 on a $500 engagement. The booking representative who arranges the engagement may be working on salary or commission. In most cases he receives approximately 10 per cent of the fee paid to the artist, the manager having to pay his office rent, staff salaries and general overhead out of the remaining 10 per cent. If the manager is a good economist, he can show a profit of 5 per cent—or $25 on each $500 engagement. The commission, therefore, is not an unfair charge against the artist.

"Five hundred dollar artists invariably supply their own printing and make their own advertising contracts with musical trade publications. Unless a phonograph company supplies individual circulars for the artist, the artist must pay for the printing of these necessary accessories to a concert. Local managers generally order about 5,000 circulars, for which the artist must pay. Conservatively, these circulars represent an expense of $25 to the artist. Window cards add $5 to $10 more, and three-sheets may be estimated at several dollars, depending on the nature of the printing. Printing, therefore, consumes at least $30 of the artist's fee.

"RAILROAD FARES are an important item. If there are no extraordinary jumps, $25 may be figured as the cost of transportation to a concert engagement. Hotel bills and meals call for another $25. We now have an expense of about $180 which must come out of the artist's $500 fee.

"Then there is the question of musical journal advertising. One page in each of the four publications most generally used costs about $1,000 for the four journals. Prorating this against the twenty concerts, we must add another $50 to the expense. Here the total comes to $230, leaving the artist $270, or a yearly income of about $5,400, out of which must come not only living expenses, but coaching and other professional expenses, such as stage clothes, which cannot be charged against the concerts.

"We have been assuming that the artist is a pianist, for no account has been taken of payments to accompanists. Good accompanists cannot be engaged for less than $50 and expenses except in instances where a first-rate local accompanist is available. However, most artists prefer to bring a pianist to whom they are accustomed. The cost per concert of the accompanist may be set at $75 (railroads included) and it probably is more. The profit on the concert now is reduced to $195.

"Summarizing the expenses of the $500 artist, we may note that the cost of booking the engagement and filling it is less than half of the fee. The profit cannot be considered compensation for one concert. The concert is merely the culmination of months of effort on the part of the artist's manager and years of training and study on the part of the artist.

"'NOW,' someone will say, 'if the $500 artist, appearing twenty times yearly, makes a profit of almost $5,000 on his engagements, how great a profiteer is the $1,000 or $1,500 artist?'

"The answer to this is that the more expensive artist is capable of earning a higher return for the manager who engages him for a concert. Artists who get $1,000 or more are 'names,' or should be. But the greater the 'name,' the more costly it is to maintain it. The manager finds the market limited, for many cities cannot support concerts which employ expensive artists, and the booking expenses rise proportionately. A $1,000 artist usually spends from $4,000 to $6,000 on his trade advertising. His concerts are events which call for heavy printing requisitions. His accompanist is likely to be high-priced. There is a maid or a secretary required on tour. Personal press agents come into the picture. Without making another analysis of the cost per concert, we may say again that the artist's net return is about 50 per cent of the fee. He makes $500 out of the concert—and the local manager ought to make at least that amount. A well-managed concert should bring a return of no less than 50 per cent on the artist's fee."

ALBERT COATES has just tendered to George Eastman his resignation as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. That the eminent conductor is leaving his post with the kindliest feelings for the orchestra and its backer is evidenced by the following excerpt from his letter of resignation tendered to Mr. Eastman:

"I am writing to ask you in all friendship to accept my resignation. After our talk last week, in which you sketched out to me the future policy of the orchestra concerts, I feel that it would not be possible for me to work according to the plans you designated. Every man, I feel sure you will agree, must, in order to do good work, have the conviction that the plan on which he is working is the right one, and this is where I cannot, I am afraid, see eye to eye with you. I do not mean by this to intimate that I criticize your plans. You know the town much better than I do, and I am, therefore, quite willing to accept your judgment in the matter of future policy for Rochester. I, however, personally would not work along those lines. I cannot act against my convictions and you cannot act against yours and I, therefore, feel that it is better I should leave."

MR. COATES has, in a sense, been the music father of the Rochester Philharmonic, having led the young orchestra during the greater part of its life since its inception two years ago. In addition, Mr. Coates has done pioneer work in Rochester, having organized the conductors' class, the Rochester junior orchestra, and the concerts intime in Kilbourne Hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Coates are sailing for England on the Berengaria on April 15 and his immediate plans include appearances in England and an opera season at the Paris Grand Opera, where Chaliapin will appear at the same time. Next fall Mr. Coates will conduct the Leeds festival, perhaps the largest musical event of its kind in England, and immediately thereafter will go to Barcelona for his annual opera season during which he will supervise the production of his new opera Ashurbanipal, which is being considered also for other European productions.

NOW COMES New York's City Music League, with a plan to expand that organization into one of country-wide proportions . . . to be called the National Music League. Its purposes, briefly, are set forth as follows:

1. To enlarge the musical public of the United States, at present estimated to be only about 2 per cent of the population.

2. To provide an outlet for young artists—to bridge the gap which now exists between the time when the young artist is pronounced ready by his teachers for the public platform and the time when he can become self-supporting and self-respecting. At present this gap can be crossed only by the expenditure of large sums of money and by charging fees for the young artists which their experience and present ability do not justify.

3. To provide a clearing house for information of all kinds in regard to musical affairs, serving the music-lover, the student, the manager and the artist.

Miss Marie C. Kieckhoefer, who has done so much in years past for young music folk, is the prime mover in the project of which Harold V. Milligan is director. The cooperation of the General Federation of Women's Clubs has been pledged, and with the backing of representative men and women nationally prominent there is felt for this new enterprise widespread encouragement.

Every important club in the country, it is stated, is being urged to give at least one concert with a singer, violinist, pianist, or other instrumentalist who, being artistically deserving, has not yet "arrived."

THE CRITICAL SCALES

Miss Lucie Stern

An eleven year old pianist, Lucie Stern, who has already been heard in Europe, made her New York debut last Tuesday in Town Hall. In the words of the Times reviewer, "her present performance augurs a brilliant future." He thought she "displayed a remarkably solid technique," although "she sometimes missed the idealism of her compositions."

The Herald Tribune writer noted that she "seemed well versed in the technical side of her art, her playing was fluent and accurate, with more firmness and color than that of most pianists of her age who venture recitals. Though there was shading and expression, it seemed applied with a rather apprentice hand, with comparatively little difference of atmosphere between one composer and another. The net impression, however, was one of promise."

According to the Post, Miss Stern proved herself "able technically," and there was "warmth of understanding and tone in her passages that provided excellent entertainment." The World reviewer remarked on her "amazing technical facility," and added that she tackled the Bach-Tausig Toccata and Fugue, the Beethoven C sharp minor Sonata, the Schumann G minor Sonata, and Liszt's Polonaise, Gnomenreigen, and La Campanella, "and polished them off with a brisk and devastating accuracy." Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail found little musicianship in her work.

Elshuco Trio

The final concert of the cycle of Brahms chamber music given by the Elshuco Trio and the Festival Quartet of South Mountain took place in Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 3. To quote the Times "the performances were of superlative quality. . . . The success of the Brahms cycle of this season invites a continuation of such activities."

The Post found displayed in the concert "all the warmth of appreciative understanding." According to the Sun, "the admirable ensemble of these able organizations was revealed again to a rapt audience." The Herald Tribune reported that a good sized audience "warmly applauded the closing concert of this highly commendable series." It has been announced that the two organizations will give a series of the chamber music of Schubert next year.

Kortschak Soloist in New Haven.

New Haven, April 4.—Hugo Kortschak, violinist, was the assisting artist with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, David Stanley Smith, conductor, on Sunday. The program of the concert, which was the fifth of the orchestra's thirty-first season, was made up of Wagner's Overture and Bacchanale from Tannhaeuser, the Forest Murmurings from Siegfried, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. Mr. Kortschak played Walther's Prize Song from Die Meistersinger.

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. Telephone
New York City Circle 8815

Friends of Music

Carl Flesch was the assisting artist at the concert of the Society of the Friends of Music, Artur Bodanzky conductor, in Town Hall, New York, on April 5. According to the Times, Mr. Bodanzky conducted with "clearness and rhythmic precision." Other writers commended both him and his orchestra.

Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail wrote that Mr. Flesch's "exquisite" playing of Mozart's A major violin Concerto was worthy of highest praise. The writer in the Herald Tribune commented that his tone "had a fluent mellowness, a delightful fineness and evenness of texture, and flowed in unchecked volume through the display passages as the soloist exhibited his unobtrusively brilliant technique."

The Sun reviewer thought his playing "seemingly above reproach, so fine was the musicianship and style." In the opinion of the writer in the Times, Mr. Flesch played the Mozart "with classic refinement and continence of style, but not academically, not in a dry or routine manner. The refinement and expressiveness of his performance connoted the earnest feeling as well as the reverence for the music possessed by the performer."

Faust

Feodor Chaliapin returned to the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last Wednesday afternoon as Mephistopheles in Faust. Mr. Bamboschek conducted, and others in the cast were Mmes. Mario, Dalossy and Wakefield, and Messrs. Tokatyan, de Luca and d'Angelo.

A large matinee audience welcomed the bass, who has been absent from New York for some months on a concert tour and with the Chicago Civic Opera Company. According to the Herald Tribune, he was "a humorous Mephistopheles with a wealth of meaning in each gesture. He sang vigorously, though not without an occasional impression of effort." This writer said that Miss Mario was "an agreeably demure, ingenuous Marguerite, singing the part creditably."

Karolik Gives Second Recital

On his reappearance in recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on the evening of March 6, Maxim Karolik, Russian operatic tenor, "gave much the same impression as before" (Herald Tribune) was the consensus of the reviews. This writer described the voice as having "satisfactory volume, smoothness of tone when not exerted to its utmost—when so exerted, a certain sense of effort, and occasionally a slightly metallic timbre." The other reviewers thought that Mr. Karolik "did not reveal a great deal of interesting vocal material," as the Sun put it.

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production. Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

Pietro Yon

Pietro Yon, honorary organist at the Vatican, Rome, gave his only New York organ recital of the season in Aeolian Hall on April 4. On his program were Pagelia's Second Sonata, Russolo's Chimes of St. Mark, some of Mr. Yon's compositions, three works by Bossi, and the Fantasy and Fugue in G minor by J. S. Bach.

According to the Sun, the Bach composition "was an achievement of the afternoon for Mr. Yon played it with deep insight and a noble wealth of majestic color." The Herald Tribune reviewer wrote that the organist played "with his familiar thorough command of his instrument, both from the technical and the interpretative aspect, with ability to express a variety of moods." Other newspapers did not report the concert analytically.

Carmen

The production of Carmen at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on April 4 had Jeanne Gordon in the title role, Armand Tokatyan as Don Jose, and Ellen Dalossy as Micaela. In other respects the cast was the same as in earlier productions. Mr. Hasselmans conducted.

According to the Post, Mme. Gordon sang the role well and "dressed the part with distinction, but frequently was a far too stately beauty." The writer in the World agreed that she was "handsome and wore some striking costumes." The Herald Tribune remarked that "looking the part well, she played with ample action and vivacity and sang with volume, though with one or two departures from smoothness." Miss Dalossy's "creditable work" received commendation in this paper. Other newspapers did not carry analytical reports of the performance.

Gives Concert for Children

In a recital of songs for children at the Princess Theatre, New York, on the afternoon of April 5, Frances Newsom "had much success with her audience," reported the Sun. She sang songs for children by about two dozen composers, accompanied sometimes by player piano, and sometimes by Florence Barber. The Sun writer said further, "Miss Newsom looked charming and sang with taste and clear diction. Her fresh light voice was pleasing to hear, but she could improve the emission of her upper tones."

Williams Chapel Choir

The Chapel Choir of Williams College, conducted by Charles L. Safford, gave its first New York concert in Town Hall on Wednesday night. Laura Tappen Safford was soloist in a group of contralto songs and of cello numbers.

The Herald Tribune reported the choir "seemed to be on the way to becoming an excellent male chorus," giving out a tone of "ample volume and fullness, not without some rougher spots, moments of a slightly hard quality of tone in the upper voices, but, in general, satisfactory, with very commendable unity, a performance suggesting that Mr. Safford had accomplished much in his work at Williams. A notable feature of the performance was the depth and sonority of the basses in the closing measures of Palestrina's Tenebrae Factae Sunt."

This reviewer said that Mrs. Safford displayed a voice of "mellow quality, not without a slight vibrato and expressive skill." According to the Times, the choir, "if they left something to be desired in precision of attack and body of tone, yet gave ample evidence of enthusiasm for serious musical culture." The Post thought they displayed "mellow volume, for the most part fine tone, especially among the masses, and satisfactory voicing among the choristers.

Florence Stern Heard Third Time

A large audience was present at the third New York recital of Florence Stern, young American violinist, in Town Hall on the evening of April 4. The Times reported, "Miss Stern in a comprehensive program once more demonstrated her possession of an excellent technic, joined to an emotional and imaginative temperament. She has decision and power, plays with youthful fervor and has a great deal of attraction. Her climaxes and finales are worthy of special notice." Josef Adler was the assisting pianist in the program, which included the Grieg Sonata and Wieniawski's D minor Concerto.

Angelo Parravicini Dies

Milan, April 7.—Angelo Parravicini, theatrical and operatic scene painter, died here today. His work was known in all parts of the world, for at various times he painted scenery for La Scala, the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, and the Colon Theatre in Buenos Aires.

FRANZ
KNEISEL
will accept a limited number of students for Virtuoso Violin Playing and Chamber Music
at Blue Hill, Maine
From July 1st to August 29th, 1925
For terms of tuition and particulars for living accommodations, etc., apply to the Secretary of Franz Kneisel, 329 West 84th Street, New York, until June 1st (thereafter Blue Hill, Me.)

RUTH ST. DENIS with TED SHAWN and the Denishawn Dancers
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Now Touring the Pacific Coast
Exclusive Management DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York
STEINWAY PIANO

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

Mme. Morena as Bruennhilde

Berta Morena returned to the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House April 3 as a guest artist after an absence of twelve years. Because of the indisposition of Curt Taucher, the only available Tristan at the Metropolitan, Tristan und Isolde could not be presented and instead Mme. Morena sang Bruennhilde in Goetterdaemmerung.

The Sun reported that Mme. Morena proved that she is still "an interesting and capable artist . . . her impersonation held its place well in the ensemble." Deems Taylor wrote in the Sun that "her voice shows signs of usage; its quality is impaired and its intonation is by no means flawless. It remains, notwithstanding, a voice of great volume and eloquence. Her acting of the role had breadth, grace and tragic force."

According to the Post reviewer, Mme. Morena "made a majestic and imposing Bruennhilde, and histrionically her performance was memorable," although "vocally, the difficult part proved a strain upon her." Olin Downes wrote in the Times that she "strove to present her conception of Bruennhilde as effectively as she might at a few hours' notice." Both Lawrence Gilman of the Herald Tribune and Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail commented that her singing showed strain, but Mr. Sanborn found her "a graceful and majestic figure."

Other new members of the cast were Carl Schlegel "whose conscientious and capable art was expended without stint on the vitalizing of brother Gunther" (Mr. Sanborn), and Charlotte Ryan as Gutrune.

Richard Byk

Richard Byk, Polish pianist, made his debut at Aeolian Hall last Tuesday. His program included Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, Chopin, Liapounoff, Moussorgsky, Suk, Percy Grainger, John Powell, and Debussy.

According to Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail, he revealed himself as "a player of refinement and poetic feeling. He has an especially agreeable touch and is an adept at delicate shading. He phrases with musicianly skill." Deems Taylor wrote in the World that "his dynamic range is not extensive and he sometimes verges upon sentimentality . . . But he has a good technique, a pleasant, cool touch and a sensitive feeling for the music he elects to play."

The Times writer commented that Mr. Byk "is not only the possessor of a brilliant technique but he can call upon a great diversity of moods." The Sun reported that he "revealed a sensitive touch of great clarity. Technically he was well equipped" . . . although "his talents were varied and of uneven merit. There was little balance to his range of dynamics; he tended to reduce them to the monotonous level of a tender pianissimo, and his forte passages did not make up in brilliance or color for these deficiencies in varied phrasing and nuance."

STELLA de METTE
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Formerly with Metropolitan Opera
Touring with San Carlo Opera Co.
Exclusive Management of
ANTHONY BAGAROZY
Aeolian Hall New York

Holland Vocal Trio

"A new and meritorious group," the reviewer of the Herald Tribune called the Holland Vocal Trio, which made its debut in Town Hall, New York, on the afternoon of April 6. Josephine Kirpal, soprano, Else Letting, mezzo-soprano, and Mary Bennett, contralto, are the members of the group, whom Coenraad V. Bos accompanied.

The program consisted of trios, some of them unaccompanied, and of duets between Miss Kirpal and Miss Letting. Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Elgar, Hassler, Hasse, and Martini were among the composers on the program.

The Herald Tribune reported, "Their combined tone was thoroughly blended, with fresh, fluent quality, and an unexpected variety of coloring." He said further that hardness of tone was absent from their combined singing and that "they sang with commendable unity."

"There was grace and charm of style in all their singing, offset by good blending of fresh voices and admirable understanding of texts," said the observer of the Sun. "Their delivery of a cappella and accompanied work was of equal merit."

Pitts Sanborn had equal praise for the Trio in his review in the Telegram-Mail: "The ladies are not gifted with extraordinary voices, but they have mastered to an unusual degree the art of ensemble singing. Unanimity, balance, and skill in phrasing and nuance were conspicuous in their performance whether in trios or in duets. Their diction was clear and their command of style and sense of expression gave further satisfaction."

Sandor Furedi

Sandor Furedi, Hungarian violinist, who gave two New York recitals last season, was heard in Aeolian Hall for the first time this year on the evening of April 5. The Sun reviewer said, "Mr. Furedi, who has been concertmaster of the Strauss Imperial Orchestra of Vienna, showed again rhythmic sense with commendable tone and spirit in solo work, though with some lack of technical polish."

This chronicler did not consider the performance of Beethoven's Sonata, with Olga Halasz as accompanist, of a high standard. The Herald Tribune report agreed, although this writer found the playing of Goldmark's Concerto better. In this work, said this review, "He seemed thoroughly at home, and his tone took on a clear, fluent quality."

The Times observer commented on the characteristic Hungarian rhythm, fire, and speed in the performance, and remarked that "the superabundance of these qualities sometimes led him to deal somewhat roughly with technical detail." The audience expressed great pleasure in Mr. Furedi's playing, according to the reviews.

Lauri-Volpi Sings in Traviata

La Traviata was repeated at the Metropolitan Opera on the evening of April 6 with Lucrezia Bori and Giacomo Lauri-Volpi in leading roles. The remainder of the cast was familiar. The Herald Tribune reported that Mme. Bori again "pleased the ear and entranced the eye," and that Mr. Lauri-Volpi "sang with increased ease in production and commendable smoothness of tone." W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun, "Miss Bori was in excellent voice last evening, and that is something that gives joy."

Miss Burnerdene Mason

Burnerdene Mason, negro contralto, made her New York debut Wednesday evening in Aeolian Hall in a program of operatic airs and negro spirituals. The Herald Tribune reported that Miss Mason "gave evidence of a voice of unusual quality, with a notably smooth and rich tone and lower notes of effective skill. Her talent seemed, however, lyric rather than dramatic, with a metallic timbre and sense of effort invading her voice if pushed too far."

The Sun writer observed that "her poise and composure were remarkable under the trying circumstances attending a first appearance. She possesses a voice of beautiful quality and good range. Her tone formation was frequently hard, however, and otherwise questionable in the lower and higher range. Her skill in taking intervals was quite remarkable, and much of her singing was commendable. She is a young singer of undoubted talent."

In the Times the reviewer wrote that Miss Mason's voice "revealed quite a range and, in the middle register, a tender and velvety quality, while at the same time articulation was clear." He suggested that further study will make a great deal out of "so much excellent material." The Telegram-Mail chronicler remarked that her recital "appeared to give considerable satisfaction to her listeners."

Repeat Verdi's Requiem

Verdi's Requiem was sung for the second time this season at the New York Metropolitan Opera House on the evening of April 5 under the direction of Tullio Serafin. The soloists were Nanny Larsen-Todsen, Merle Alcock, and Messrs. Martinelli and Mardones. The chorus and orchestra were those of the Metropolitan.

CHARLES
STRATTON
Tenor

A NOTICE !

"Absolutely a delight to hear," declared Pierre Monteux, erstwhile Boston Symphony conductor, of Charles Stratton's tenor voice. Mr. Monteux's sentiments were shared by several hundred Institute members who attended last night's recital in the music hall of the Academy of Music. Of Tennessee birth and wholly American taught, Charles Stratton is the nearest approach to John McCormack, in appearance, voice and art, that the concert world has yet afforded. Young, the possessor of an ingratiating smile and manner, perfectly at ease before his audience, his singing infused with a fullness of expression direct from the heart, Mr. Stratton captivated his listeners and held them breathless. The timbre of his voice, as aforesaid, is singularly McCormack-like, also the mastery of his vocal art and diction. More or less of a newcomer in New York, this unusually gifted singer seems destined to become a figure of national prominence in the music life of the country.

—Felix Deyo, Brooklyn Standard-Union, March 26, 1925.

Season of 1925-1926 now booking

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York
Packard Building, Philadelphia

Mme. Matzenauer and Stock Share Praise

Play Three Movements of Beethoven's Ninth; Whiteman Heard Again.

Chicago, April 7.—"The greatest concert in the annals of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra," to quote Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald Examiner, took place last Friday. Mr. Gunn added that never has Frederick Stock made "music more eloquent, with more sensitive response to its spiritual message, with keener evaluation of its logic and its beauty, with greater technical skill."

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist in the excerpts from Tristan und Isolde and the Niebelungen Ring. This writer described her as "the greatest singer of the age, in point of mere vocal power and tonal amplitude" and noted the "vast range" of her voice. Edward Moore of the Tribune asserted that "never within memory was there a voice of such volume as hers, and, since she is musician as well as singer, it is an instrument in which to take delight for its quality and its use." According to Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, Mme. Matzenauer's voice, "which has a remarkably pure, liquid quality, one which has great range and power and a mobility of tonal expression, has the musical requirement for Wagner's music." He also congratulated Mr. Stock and the orchestra. The first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Die Geschoepfe des Prometheus completed the program.

* * *

Yette Wexler, youthful pianist, was the soloist at the children's concert of the Symphony Thursday afternoon in Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante. Mr. Moore wrote that she played this work "with a swiftness and certainty that would have been commendable in a mature artist, and were bewildering in one of her years."

* * *

A new composition by Leo Sowerby, Synconata, was played by Paul Whiteman and his orchestra in the Auditorium Sunday. Edward Moore considered it showed "a little of the laboratory atmosphere about it, but is light hearted and it has spirit and color."

Glenn Dillard Gunn wrote that it is a "brilliant piece of wit and color" in which Sowerby "has shown astonishing skill" in employing the jazz orchestra. Mr. Moore found the orchestra "perky and bewitching, sprightly and witty."

LAMBERT MURPHY
Was Tenor Soloist in the Performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Last Saturday Evening by the Schola Cantorum and the New York Philharmonic Society.

Rochester Ensemble Ends Season

Rochester, April 1.—The concert given Saturday by the Rochester Little Symphony, Albert Coates conducting, brought the musical season here to a close. The assisting artists at the concert were Lucile Johnson Bigelow, harpist; Sandor Vas, pianist, and Nelson Watson, contrabass.

Two novelties on the program were Henry Eichheim's Three Oriental Sketches and Wolf-Ferrari's Chamber Symphony, scored for ten instruments and piano, with Mr. Coates at the piano. Other numbers were Handel's Concerto for double bass, Scarlatti-Tommasini's Suite from The Good-Humored Ladies, three Russian folk songs arranged by Liadoff, Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, strings, flute and clarinet; Bach's Sicilienne; Lulli's Menuet from Bourgeois Gentilhomme, and Saint-Saens' Carnival of the Animals.

M U Z I O
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

FORREST
L A M O N T
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

CECILE de HORVATH
PIANIST
Management: Clarence E. Cramer, 1102 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Baldwin Piano De Luxe Welte-Mignon Records

Musical Chicago En Courant

New Plan for Opera in English Gets Under Way; San Carlo Company Sojourns at Auditorium.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, April 7.

JUST WHAT FORM Mrs. Howard Spaulding's rumored patronage of opera in English was to take has finally come to light. And a very practical form it is to be. From present indications there is to be little conversation and much action, an agreeable departure from the usual mode of procedure when opera in the vernacular is the subject.

Mrs. Spaulding evidently believes that the way to begin is to begin, and to this practical end she has allied with herself two managers wisely versed in the ways of Lyceum and Chautauqua, Harry P. Harrison and May Valentine. According to Mr. Harrison, it has long been their custom to present tabloid scenes from operas in Chautauqua and Lyceum, always in English, and generally preceded by explanatory remarks on the story of the opera. The response has been such that they feel the time is now ripe to carry out the plan to which Mrs. Spaulding is lending her philanthropic aid.

Briefly, the plan is to recruit companies (four are the present aim, with others to follow as the demand increases) from the flood of native talent which yearly besieges the managers' offices. Casts have been selected, and two light and four grand operas prepared. The Mikado and Robin Hood are known quantities in practically every community, and will serve to pave the way for the gradually ascending scale of the Bohemian Girl, Il Trovatore, Faust and Aida.

ONE COMPANY is already in operation, having started from New Orleans, and is following the sun, Chautauqua-wise, West and North. Each company will carry a traveling orchestra of ten musicians, to be augmented in larger communities, and a chorus of twenty, with the required numbers of principals. The method of transportation is modern and interesting. Instead of placing dependence on erratic train service, singers, orchestra members and conductors will be moved from town to town via luxurious motor buses provided by Mrs. Spaulding. Baggage will be transported by trucks.

"This is not an experiment," said Mr. Harrison in outlining the plan. "It will only do more completely and comprehensively what we have been doing in Chautauqua, and Miss Valentine has long made a practice of selling to the Lyceum circuit what Fortune Gallo and the San Carlo company do and have done for fifteen years with largely imported talent.

"Everywhere we have preached opera in English and have found the smaller communities not only ready for it, but regarding it as the only logical form of lyric drama."

ONE CAN ONLY hope for the success of their plan that their companies will be able to maintain the artistic level that Mr. Gallo's San Carloites have shown us this past week at the Auditorium. Here was opera given by a company of excellent voices, smooth ensemble and assured routine. Under Mr. Guerrieri's leadership performances moved apace.

Nor were individual triumphs wanting in this "no star" organization. Tenor Salazar stopped the show after his singing of the drinking song in Cavalleria; Baritone Basiola unloosed an Auditorium full of excitement after the Pagliacci Prologue, an excitement unequaled in these parts since Ruffo's first singing of the same famous aria.

Anne Roselle and Bianca Saroya were favorites before the week was up, as were Demetrio Onofrei, who would be popular in any company, Gaetano Tommasini, Mario Valle.

THE SINGLE performance of Carmen in English, sponsored by the Federation of Women's Clubs and the American Opera Society, may be adjudged a complete success in so far as the performance and the English singing principals were concerned. The chorus sang in assorted French, but the Charles Henry Meltzer English translation was fully understandable with the clear diction of Lorna Doone Jackson, the Carmen; Charles Hart, Don Jose; and Herbert Gould, the Zuniga, in particular.

SPRING MOVING TIME would seem to have arrived for Chicago teachers. Adolf Muhlmann has already removed his opera school to quarters in the Fine Arts building. Mr. and Mrs. Vittorio Arimondi are giving up their spacious studios in that building to join Mr. Kinsey's forces of the Chicago Musical College. Burton Thatcher will transfer his teaching activities from that institution to the Gunn School when that institution removes to its new home in the Fine Arts building annex.

The musical colony of Chicago has added two more pianists to its roster. George Liebling liked Chicago so well after his three recitals here this season that he decided to settle here and carry on the tradition of his brother Emil, who pioneered pianistically in this city. Frederic Lamond has also yielded to inducements offered by Mr. Bradley and the Bush Conservatory, and announces his intention of becoming a resident pianist.

With the wedding on Tuesday last of Mildred Levy, daughter of Heniot Levy, to Alexander Kipnis of the Chicago opera basso section, one may assume that Chicago thereby acquires rights on another musical son.

THE ENGLISH Albert Coates sojourned in Chicago long enough this week to meet the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in rehearsal, and to enthuse over Rochester and his orchestra there.

The total amount realized by the Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler golden jubilee concert was $6,288.39. This has been turned over to the United Charities of Chicago to be used as a trust fund for the relief of incapacitated musicians and their families. The fund will be known as the Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler fund. Only the income is to be so used, and the main fund may be added to by charitable minded persons.

Pearl Schaaf, pretty sister of pretty Myrtle Schaaf, the Rose-Marie of the operetta of that name, plans to do some singing on her own account. She will join the Gallo San Carlo Company for roles of the Musetta nature.

Musicians Active in Chicago

Guiomar Novaes and Sophie Braslau Among Recitalists; San Carlo Company Appears.

Chicago, April 7.—The past week has been one of unusual musical activity for this part of the season. In addition to the week's engagement of the San Carlo Opera Company, there have been numerous concerts. Guiomar Novaes gave a Chopin recital on the same day that Sophie Braslau was heard in her deferred song recital. Other recitalists were Serge Borowsky, Clara Clemens, Henry Sopkin, Winnifred Erickson, Melita Krieg, and the Muenzer Trio.

Mme. Novaes' playing, according to Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald-Examiner, "had to commend it unrivalled tonal beauty, exquisite imagination," and "subtle and beautiful" rhythms. He asserted that she "remains the greatest of women pianists because she does not, as yet, consciously attempt to make music in other than feminine fashion." Edward Moore wrote in the Tribune that her recital "presented her at just about her best. She is a winsome pianist, full toned and agile, yet always feminine. One may hear more vigorous performances of the Barcarolle, but seldom one more utterly charming."

* * *

To quote Mr. Gunn's assertion, Miss Braslau "has a great voice. It has the robust and somber quality of a baritone, power enough to rise to great climaxes, and brilliance enough to achieve variety." Mr. Moore wrote that Miss Braslau "did the best singing she has ever done here. Her voice was in its former gorgeous splendor and she applied it entirely to singing."

* * *

Serge Borowsky, baritone, was heard in a recital of songs at Orchestra Hall on Friday. Mr. Moore mentioned that "his voice had quality and resonance, and his manner of singing displayed sincerity and artistic accomplishment." Maurice Rosenfeld wrote in the News that he disclosed "a taste for song literature and interpretative qualities." In the recitative and aria, Eri Tu, from Verdi's The Masked Ball, he presented "a voice that had power, a quality which brought out the dramatic depth of the music and a knowledge of operatic traditions." On the other hand, Mr. Gunn stated that "his voice is not a true lyric organ and his interpretations were without address."

* * *

Mme. Clemens gave the third of the historical programs of her series. Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Cornelius, and Franz were represented on her program. Karleton Hackett of the Post commented that "there was the same earnestness of purpose as on the previous occasions and the evidence of serious study."

* * *

The only violin recital of the week was given by Henry Sopkin in Kimball Hall on Friday. He played, to quote Mr. Moore, "with fine tone and an excellent sense of phrasing and accent." Mr. Rosenfeld referred to him as a "gifted young violinist" and added that he played the Bach Chaconne for violin alone with "such commendable musical qualities that he had to add an encore, and he played a Bourree from one of the Bach Sonatas, also without accompaniment, in which rhythmic accent, a broad, full tone and musical feeling made of this number a charming piece of music."

* * *

A joint recital was given by Winnifred Erickson, soprano, and Melita Krieg, pianist, on Thursday in the Young American Artists' series at Fine Arts Recital Hall.

Edward Moore wrote that "in both cases there was young and pleasant talent, not developed as highly as will be the case in years to come, but making no particular strain to go beyond present accomplishments." Miss Erickson sang with "an ingratiating voice and fairly good enunciation," and the pianist played Scarlatti and Haydn "lightly, appreciatively, and with considerable charm."

In Mr. Rosenfeld's opinion, Miss Krieg "played with understanding of the music, good tone and clean technique. There was not as yet interpretative force." Miss Erickson, he said, "has a soprano voice of naturally good quality but as yet immature and unsteady."

* * *

The Muenzer Trio played at Kimball Hall on the second. Karleton Hackett thought that they played "excellently" with fine balance and "flashes of individual brilliance which yet were kept in proportion." Mr. Moore also commended the technical excellence of the Trio and its sympathetic understanding of its programs.

* * *

The San Carlo Opera Company opened its season here at the Auditorium on March 31 with the presentation of Aida with Anne Roselle, Stella de Mette, Gaetano Tommasini, Mario Basiola, Pietro de Biasi, Natale Cervi, Francesco Curci, and Philine Falco. Fulgenzio Guerrieri conducted.

Miss Roselle was highly commended for her performance, and Mr. Hackett wrote that "she played the part with dramatic force and sang with understanding of the music." Mme. de Mette was praised by Maurice Rosenfeld for "vocal merits of uncommon order and of artistic worth." Mr. Gunn found Mr. Tommasini "admirable."

Tamaki Miura sang Cio-Cio-San in Madame Butterfly the next evening. Others in the cast were Mary Kent, Demetrio Onofrei, Philine Falco, Mario Valle, Francesco Curci, and Pietro de Biasi. Mme. Miura was congratulated as an artist of "rare powers" by Mr. Hackett, and Mr. Moore thought Mr. Onofrei "excellent." Mr. Guerrieri was the "star"

(Continued on page 17)

Fleta

METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

BUSH CONSERVATORY CHICAGO

KENNETH M. BRADLEY, President — EDGAR A. NELSON, Vice-President

SUMMER SCHOOL

June 29 to August 1

SIX WEEKS: June 29 to Aug. 8 — TEN WEEKS: May 25 to Aug. 1

BRILLIANT FACULTY OF 125 TEACHERS including

LAMOND

World Famous Pianist

who beside his private teaching will give

Master Repertoire Classes

OTHER FEATURES INCLUDE—

NORMAL CLASSES

(ALL DEPARTMENTS)

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC

DRAMATIC ART

EXPRESSION

STAGE CRAFT

Of special interest to School Music Directors, Supervisors and Teachers is the

CLASS PIANO METHODS COURSE

Direction of Helen Curtis

FREE SCHOLARSHIPS

Piano Voice Violin School Music

A number of Free Scholarships will be given by the artist members of the faculty, including Lamond and others. Examinations held week of June 22. Send for blanks at once. Only limited number accepted.

INTERPRETATION CLASSES — ARTIST RECITALS

STUDENT DORMITORIES

Only Conservatory in Chicago maintaining extensive dormitory accommodations for the non-resident student. Big demand for Summer Term. Make your reservation early.

For Summer or Winter catalog (Fall term opens Sept. 14) address, stating your course of study.

M. D. SCHWENKER, Secretary

839 North Dearborn Street — Chicago, Ill.

Genthe Etude

"The poet, the lyric rhapsodist of Schumann's dreams and reveries."

So writes Lawrence Gilman in the New York Herald-Tribune of

HAROLD BAUER

and his

ALL SCHUMANN

program which was greeted in New York City as the most notable event of Mr. Bauer's long and distinguished career. It was, to quote another writer, I. Weil, New York Evening Journal,

"as absorbingly beautiful a performance of piano music as we have ever heard."

According to Olin Downes in the New York Times, it was

"the most impressive example of Mr. Bauer's art that he has offered to the public in recent seasons."

CERTIFIED THE MUSICAL DIGEST

WOULD you like to read the full notices of this extraordinary recital, called by many the greatest piano concert ever given in New York? Here they are:

Pianist Gives Performance of Rare Beauty

"HAROLD BAUER'S afternoon at Aeolian Hall on Saturday was as absorbingly beautiful a performance of piano music as we believe we have ever listened to—and we have been listening to pianists not for two or three years but for twenty. He became the perfect medium through which the soul of Schumann sang its rich and wondrous song, for the afternoon had to do with nothing but that—an emotional monograph in tone. Mr. Bauer, as he gets older, plays more rarely than he used, which is a vast pity, for he is in so many ways the most generally satisfying pianist that the fastidious concertgoer can sit down before. That may sound like rather banal characterization or description of the superb thing he does at the piano, but it isn't. To satisfy thoroughly the discriminating and experienced person in the interpretation of piano music is something that very few pianists indeed can make shift to do. To achieve it requires a complete self-effacement on the part of the player, a mastery of technique that makes this merely a matter of the most unobtrusive means and never an end in itself and the transfusion of the intelligence and feeling of the pianist into the specific necessities and significance of the music before him. That viewed whole was the aspect of Mr. Bauer's art on Saturday. The pianist as we have said was occupied only with the music of Schumann — something more than half of the 'Kreisleriana,' the 'Papillons,' the toccata, the C major fantasia, and the 'Phantasiestuecke,' as well as some of the smaller pieces. There was the utmost sympathy between him and what he was doing, and the music emerged from beneath his fingers clear and beautiful in its meaning and its emotional poesy."—The New York Evening Journal, Feb. 28, 1925.

"HAROLD BAUER'S recital of piano music by Schumann yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall was one of the most impressive examples of his art that he has offered the public in recent seasons. The program reflected most of the important phases of Schumann's development as composer, from the early 'Papillons' to the 'Kreisleriana' and the great C major Fantasia. In no aspect of the music did Mr. Bauer fail his audience. He is the past master of Schumann's piano style. This is not the gift of every virtuoso, even in these days of technique run riot, days in which Schumann is an old hat and forgotten by a rising generation intent upon the Ravels and Stravinskys of the period. Schumann, nevertheless, composed for the piano in an inimitable and very personal manner. He stands apart even from his celebrated fellow-romantics, Liszt and Chopin, in the novelty and originality of his writing for the keyed instrument. And he is still aloof from the herd. Many virtuosi play his notes; not many catch his accent and inflection, the wholly subjective tone of his musical speech. Nor do they feel his color and reveal it as Mr. Bauer. He played Schumann yesterday as if he were improvising his own music and no other method of pianistic expression were comprehensible to him. With Schumann he was wistful, confiding, impulsive or nobly prophetic, and always a poet. The pianist differentiated strikingly between the Schumann of different periods. The naive, charming, yet rather callow confessions of the 'Papillons' found with him an appropriately frank, gay or sentimental expression. With the 'Kreisleriana' pieces, of which, with excellent judgment only five were played, he wove another spell. The music is almost too intimate for the concert room, but Mr. Bauer succeeded in taking his audience into his own and the composer's confidence. He established the necessary atmosphere and projected Schumann's thought. Other compositions were the Romance in B flat minor, one of the less played but wholly characteristic works of the composer; the D major Novelette, the Toccata, and for a final group the 'Fantasiestucke,' Op. 12. The Toccata, with its glint and shimmer and its fabric of brilliant counterpoint, was given a performance at once virile and poetic. The climax of the afternoon was the playing of the Fantasia. This interpretation touched the heights and depths of music and accomplished this within as perfectly proportioned a scheme of dynamics as ever we heard. It was profoundly Schumann, but Schumann relieved of what Nietzche speaks and Wagner termed 'the imposture of the grand manner.' Most pianists performing the passionate Fantasia think it necessary to lay on and spare not and present the first two movements or the greater part of them in the old 'formidable' way. Mr. Bauer often employed the emphasis of understandment. His opening theme was not a tumultuous fortissimo appeal, but a lyrical plaint which seemed so characteristic in its expression that we wondered why others had played the passage in a different way. The grand manner was left for the march piled one on another as the processional went thundering onward. The finale became at once the most subdued and absorbing movement of the three; a golden haze of tone, in which melodies floated and murmured, until the long-delayed cadence into the tonic key. The color of the last chords was notable; the sound resembled that of a rich full brass choir; and this, in view of what had preceded, seemed the one and inevitable sonority. It is a pity, in a way, that even great artists are heard before they have reached Mr. Bauer's stage of self-expression. But audiences are seldom so particular. Would Mr. Bauer be less liked today by a public that has taken rather long to appreciate him if his playing had less depth and proportion by twenty years than it had on this occasion? Yesterday at least an eager public crowded the hall to hear him and were deeply impressed by what he had to say."—Olin Downes, New York Times, Feb. 28, 1925.

"THE conjunction of Schumann and Mr. Bauer is always a happy one, for this pianist is particularly well endowed to give voice to the serene poetic eloquence of the great romanticist's best music. Mr. Bauer's keen sense of color and lyric song was granted a fertile field for display. The lyric tenderness, the fanciful humor, the sturdy qualities of fine sentiments and emotions inherent in this program were brought out with masterly skill. The recital was a delightful one, the program of a composer interpreted by an artist particularly sympathetic with his attitude and ideas."—New York Sun, Feb. 28, 1925.

"MR. BAUER is not only somewhat of a specialist in the music of Schumann, but he is one of those rare pianists who are specially equipped by the Muses to play Schumann with insight, fidelity and eloquence. Schumann must not be sentimentalized—that is fatal to him; he bears sentimentalizing less well than any composer one knows of. Yet poetic glamour and tenderness and nuance must be present in the conceptions of the interpreter or Schumann is betrayed. Above all, he must be played with an intimacy of feeling, a sincerity and integrity of attitude that are not native to every virtuoso. But they are native to Mr. Bauer, and yesterday he displayed them persuasively. He played with his usual beauty and taste in tone-color and in the sensitive adjustment of part to part. He was the poet, the lyric rhapsodist of Schumann's dreams and reveries. An audience that appeared to fill every seat in the hall listened to Mr. Bauer with rapt attention and applauded him to the echo."—Lawrence Gilman, New York Herald Tribune, Feb. 28, 1925.

Harold Bauer's Schumann program ought to be heard by every college, musical club and musical conservatory next year!

For Dates Apply to Management

METROPOLITAN MUSICAL BUREAU

Aeolian Hall, New York City

VICTOR RECORDS

MASON & HAMLIN PIANO

Bartok and Beethoven Contrasted by Reiner

Conducts Suite and Eroica Symphony; Percy Grainger Plays for Capacity Audience.

Cincinnati, April 6.—Mr. Reiner's program for the symphony concerts of last Friday and Saturday presented no soloist but included the contrast of the orchestral Suite, No. 2, by Bela Bartok, and Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, with Liszt's Mephisto Valse inserted between these extremes.

Cincinnati reviewers were enthusiastic over the beauties of line and color given by Mr. Reiner's reading of the Symphony. Mrs. Plogstedt of the Post thought the interpretation "in all respects worthy of it."

Mrs. Smith's preference for the Beethoven was marked in her Times-Star review, which noted the "Mozartean influence" emphasized in Mr. Reiner's interpretation which "returned the Eroica to its earlier period style." Mr. Nilson's opinion in the Commercial-Tribune was that "Mr. Reiner has done no finer conducting of Beethoven since having had the Cincinnati orchestra" under his direction.

The synopsis of critical opinions about the Bartok Suite was that much benefit as a mental exercise might be gained in trying to discover the Hungarian folk tunes in this amazing orchestral structure.

"Stravinskyesque" declared Mrs. Smith; "receptiveness" was found to be an "absolutely necessary quality for complete understanding" by Miss Plogstedt. "Too fragmentary to be a striking example of any school" was Mr. Goldenburg's opinion of this work.

* * *

Percy Grainger's recital, under the aegis of Miss Minnie Tracey at the Sinton ballroom Monday evening, April 6, was called a brilliant success. A capacity audience heartily approved the program, which included a Bach-Liszt Fantasia and Fugue for organ, a group by Balfour Gardiner, Chopin's Sonata in B minor, Opus 58; and a group of four Grainger compositions.

* * *

J. Herman Thuman directed a presentation of The Passion Play three nights this week. It was given with a beautiful stage setting and with choral music from St. Matthew's version by Bach, in which the St. Lawrence choir of men and boys, trained by Alfred Schehl, was heard. This choir also sang parts of the Cesar Franck Mass and other selections suitable to the Palm Sunday orchestral concert at Music Hall. B. G.

Honor Roland Hayes With Spingarn Medal

THE Spingarn Medal, awarded annually for the highest achievement by an American negro during the preceding year, was presented to Roland Hayes, tenor, last Tuesday afternoon on board the S. S. Aquitania in its pier before he was to sail on it for Europe. Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Society, made the presentation.

The presentation was delayed on account of Mr. Hayes' absence in Europe when the award was made. Since returning he has been engaged in a concert tour. Mr. Damrosch accompanied the presentation by a speech in which he praised the singing of Mr. Hayes. He was introduced by James Weldon Johnson, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which is the donor of the medal.

The committee of award consisted of Bishop John Hurst, chairman; Dr. John Hope, president of Morehouse College; Oswald Garrison Villard, Mrs. Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Dr. James H. Dillard, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, and Dr. W. E. B. du Bois. Among those who spoke was Harry T. Burleigh, composer, pianist, and singer, who once received the medal himself.

Damrosch Ends Fortieth Season

Tibbett and Rachmaninoff Assist Veteran Leader in Final Concerts of Year.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, concluded its season with a concert in Aeolian Hall on April 5 with Lawrence Tibbett as soloist. Mr. Tibbett also was the assisting artist at the final young people's concert of the orchestra on the previous day. Mr. Damrosch had returned to the conductor's stand on April 2 in Carnegie Hall with Rachmaninoff playing his Third Piano Concerto.

The Sunday concert was the orchestra's farewell to Aeolian Hall as next year these concerts will be given in Mecca Temple. At the conclusion of the program Mr. Damrosch, who is celebrating his fortieth year with the orchestra, received an ovation and was presented with two wreaths. His program included Tuolumne by Quinto Maganini, Dvorak's Carnival Overture, and Franck's D minor Symphony.

Mr. Tibbett's singing had "robust and dramatic quality," according to the World, and the Telegram-Mail reviewer asserted that he sang "without flourish, with some style and always with musicianly sense and feeling." The writer in the Herald Tribune commented that he sang with "his usual intelligence and feeling, and with beauty of tone and phrasing."

Olin Downes of the Times wrote that he sang Iago's Credo "with a fine sense of values, care for diction and phrasing, and a warm, resonant tone quality. . . . He showed the same care for the principles of musicianship and good singing in Schumann's songs." He added that "if anything he erred on the side of self-restraint and concern for technical matters where more freedom and flexibility would have been agreeable." The Post considered the Otello selection given "with a care for musicianship and a warm, resonant tone that made it a worthy program selection." In the Sun review, it was noted that "his voice was rich in color and used with skill, although his German diction was not impeccable."

Tuolumne, composed by Mr. Maganini who is solo piccolo and third flutist of the orchestra, was played for the first time by the society. According to the Herald Tribune, "it is a pleasantly fanciful piece, effectively orchestrated, but somewhat too long for its musical subject matter." Mr. Downes wrote that it is composed "with a feeling for orchestral values and with sincerity which may later develop a style more mature and cohesive. . . . Its mood and intention commend it, but it is too diffuse."

An all-Wagner program was the fare offered at the last young people's concert. Mr. Damrosch's conducting and Mr. Tibbett's singing were commended in the press.

Mr. Damrosch was the recipient of a cordial welcome upon his return to take up the baton on the previous Thursday at Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Vaughan Williams' London Symphony, Le Dryade, a new symphonic picture by Louis Aubert, and the Rachmaninoff Concerto.

Indicative of critical comment of the Concerto was Olin Downes' statement that "almost did Mr. Rachmaninoff persuade us that this was great music . . . and Mr. Rachmaninoff played like the past master of his instrument and the musical giant that he is, with profound feeling, electrical excitement and rhythm, with sensuous melancholy in the treatment of lyrical themes and a passionate achievement of climax."

The Aubert work, according to Lawrence Gilman of the Herald Tribune, is "only skimmed Debussy." Deems Taylor was of the same opinion more or less, and the Post called it "a pleasing but not particularly noteworthy production." Other writers agreed that Dryade was strongly reminiscent of both Wagner and Debussy.

Chamber Music Society

OF SAN FRANCISCO

(Founded 1916 by Elias Hecht)

Musical Direction—Louis Persinger

Distinguished American Ensemble Organization

LOUIS PERSINGER
LOUIS FORD
NATHAN FIRESTONE
WALTER FERNER
ELIAS HECHT

Now Booking 1925-26 Season

EASTERN REPRESENTATIVE—MAUD W. GIBBON
129 West 48th St., New York City

MANAGEMENT—CHAMBER MUSIC SOCIETY
708 Kohl Building, San Francisco

Myra Hess

In America ONLY in 1926

From February to April

And Thereafter Not Until 1928

A Very Few Dates Available for Season of 1926
and Books Now Open for Season of 1928

Exclusive Management ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York

STEINWAY PIANO DUO-ART RECORDS

Sensational in Opera Triumphant in Concert

Jeritza

Now Booking Season 1925-1926
Sole management Metropolitan Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall New York City
Knabe Piano Victor Records

On The Music Highway

KITTY CHEATHAM, soprano, who appears in recital at Carnegie Hall, New York, this Saturday, will be assisted by a small orchestra conducted by John Warren Erb. Her program will end with Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker Suite. In collaboration with Walter Pritchard, Eaton, Miss Cheatham adapted the original Hoffmann fairy tales which inspired Tschaikowsky to write the Suite, and she prefaces each number with its particular fairy tale.

John McCormack was heard in his final New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 5. He will sing at the Cincinnati May music festival and then start on his trip to the Orient.

May Peterson, soprano, sang at the ninth of the artists' concerts given by the Music League of Manitowoc, Wisconsin, on March 24. Herman Nott was at the piano.

George Barrere and his Little Symphony Orchestra will start on tour Thursday. They are scheduled to give concerts in Hampton, Lynchburg, Huntington, Louisville, Fort Wayne, Grinnell, and Des Moines. At Des Moines they will break up for the summer, some going to the Coast, others to various summer resorts. The next is their twelfth season.

A large audience bade farewell to Jascha Heifetz in his fourth and final New York recital in Carnegie Hall on April 5. This will be Mr. Heifetz' last New York recital for some time as he is leaving shortly for a world tour.

Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will conduct summer concerts on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts in July and August. The Hollywood Bowl Association, through its president, Mrs. Artie Mason Carter, has just completed arrangements for Mr. Reiner to open a season of concerts in that open-air auditorium with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra on July 7. Mr. Reiner will lead sixteen concerts in Hollywood.

Immediately after his Hollywood engagement, Mr. Reiner will leave for New York by transcontinental airplane to start rehearsals for seven appearances with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at the Lewisohn Stadium. This will be Mr. Reiner's second consecutive season as guest conductor of the Stadium Concerts.

Claire Dux gave a recital in Galesburg, Ill., on April 7.

Marguerite d'Alvarez, the Peruvian contralto, sang in Buffalo, N. Y., on Tuesday evening, March 31. She has just signed a contract with the Opera Association of San Francisco, to appear there next September in the roles of Amneris, Carmen, Dalila, and Azucena.

The Chamber Music Society of San Francisco, together with Ernst von Dohnanyi, Hungarian composer and pianist, gave the third concert of the Peninsula Musical Association of Palo Alto on March 12. Their program consisted of a sonata for piano and violin and a quintet for piano and string quartet by Dohnanyi, and also the Etudes Symphoniques of Schumann. Both the Society and Mr. Donhanyi received praise in the local press.

Guiomar Novaes, South American pianist, will be under the management of Arthur Judson for the season, 1925-26. Mme. Novaes will go abroad in May to play in London and Paris, returning to this country for Christmas. She will open her season in Chicago on December 29.

Frances Nash, young American pianist, will play with the Lenox String Quartet in a special program to be given for the Chopin Club of Providence, R. I., in January. In addition to a solo group, she will play in the Cesar Franck Quintet.

Monday evening, April 20, in Carnegie Hall, Ethyl Hayden will give her only New York recital of the season. She will have the assistance of Edward Harris, composer, at the piano, in a program of Italian, French, German and English songs. On this occasion Miss Hayden will sing two of Mr. Harris' most recent songs which he has dedicated to her—Fairy Lullaby, and The Cynical Cuckoo. Both songs are settings of Shakespeare lyrics, taken from Midsummer Night's Dream, and Love's Labour's Lost.

Royal Dadmun will give a recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, the evening of April 28.

A new club has been organized in Oklahoma City, known as the Helen Norfleet Club. Mrs. Florence F. Dinkley is director and Katherine Harner the president. The course of study for the club will be the one recently published by Miss Norfleet, pianist of the Norfleet Trio.

Anthony Pesci, young American tenor, will appear at the Westchester Women's Auditorium on April 23. Mr. Pesci has been heard at several Board of Education concerts this season.

E. Robert Schmitz was heard in Madison, Wis., March 13, and in Chicago March 22. He will also give a recital and four lecture-recitals in Birmingham, Ala. Next season Mr. Schmitz will open his recital tour in New York late in October. A cross-country itinerary will take him to the Pacific Coast in January.

Sylvia Lent, violinist, and Sophie Braslau, contralto, will be heard in a joint recital in Paterson, N. J., on April 20, under local management of Chrystal Brown.

George Engles, manager of the New York Symphony Society, has announced that sixty-one concerts will be given in this city next year by the New York Symphony Orchestra. This will be the largest number ever given locally by the society.

Twenty Sunday afternoon concerts will be held in the new Mecca Auditorium. These will be in two series of ten each, given on alternate Sundays. Series A will be held November 1, 15 and 29, December 20, January 3 and 17, February 7 and 21, and March 7 and 21. Series B is scheduled for November 8 and 22, December 6 and 27, January 10 and 24, February 14 and 28, and March 14 and 28. Subscribers may buy seats for either series.

The dates of the twelve Thursday afternoon concerts are November 5 and 19; December 3 and 17; January 7, 14 and 28; February 4, 18 and 25; March 11 and 25. The Friday evening series falls on October 30, November 6 and 20, December 4 and 18, January 8, 15 and 29, February 5 and 26, March 12 and 26.

There will be six Saturday afternoon concerts for young people on November 7, December 5, December 26, January 23, February 13, February 27. Five Saturday morning concerts for children will be held on October 31, November 14, November 28, December 12 and January 2. The Brooklyn series of six Saturday afternoon programs is scheduled for November 21, December 19, January 16, February 6, March 6 and March 27.

Ernest Hutcheson will make his eleventh New York appearance in five months in the Percy Grainger concert which the Australian composer is giving in the Little Theatre on April 26. On this occasion Mr. Hutcheson, together with Ralph Leopold and Percy Grainger, will play in the six-hand arrangement for two pianos of Grainger's English Dance.

Mme. Maria Carreras arranged an unusual program for her appearance with the Indianapolis Maennerchor on April 5.

She chose for her opening number Respighi's transcriptions for piano of old dances and arias of unknown composers of the sixteenth century. These were followed by an organ concerto of W. F. Bach, transcribed for piano by M. von Zadora, and dedicated to Mme. Carreras. Figuring also on the program were La Danse d'Olaf by Pick-Mangiagalli and a Navarra by Albeniz. Pieces by Beethoven, Chopin and Liszt completed the program scheme.

The Students' Concerts of the Philharmonic Society will be increased from ten to twelve performances next season and transferred to Saturday night, according to an announcement made by Clarernce H. Mackay, chairman of the board of directors. These concerts will be conducted by Willem Mengelberg and Wilhelm Furtwaengler. The prices will range from twenty-five cents to $1.

Forty members of the Glee Club of the University of North Carolina, under the direction of Paul J. Weaver, started on a Western trip the first of April. They have sung in Kansas City, St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Cincinnati, Nashville, and Asheville. This is the first time any Southern glee club has taken a trip of such magnitude. Jerome Swinford accompanied the club as soloist.

The club took a similar trip during January.

During April, Caryl Bensel is appearing at the opening of a new theatre in Arverne, L. I.; at the Newark Athletic Club, Newark, N. J., on the fifteenth; in the concert ballroom of the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., on the twentieth; and on April 30 in Nutley, N. J.

Nearly nine hundred men, representing fifteen glee clubs in the metropolitan district, sang under the direction of thirteen directors in the second joint concert arranged by the Associated Glee Clubs of America at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on March 31. Reinald Werrenrath was the assisting artist.

Walter Damrosch made a brief address, outlining the choral development in England and America and commending the activities of the Associated Glee Clubs.

J. HENRI BOVE
FLUTE SOLOIST
Joint Recitals and Musicales
191 Claremont Ave. New York

"A voice full of vibrant warmth and passion"

ROSE ARMANDIE

French Soprano

Prize Winner of Paris Conservatory

Second American and Canadian Tour
October-November, 1925

NOW BOOKING

Boston Transcript—"Exquisite lyric quality * * * excellent musicianship * * * fine intelligence."

Quebec Chronicle—"Rose Armandie, winner of the Grand Prix of the Paris Conservatoire, possesses a beautiful, clear voice with which she soars over the ordinary octave without the slightest difficulty."

BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MANAGEMENT
130 West 42nd Street, New York

Jazz—A Gesture

Ashley Pettis Makes a Plea for the Consideration of the Serious American Composer.

"JAZZ IS only a gesture. There is no permanency of feeling in jazz music—it is nothing more or less than a mannerism." Ashley Pettis rose from the piano stool. He had just played one of his new songs, a setting to one of Sidney Lanier's poems.

Standing by the open window of his New York studio, he spoke of the subject which interests him most—American music. Mr. Pettis is a young American of straight Puritan ancestry and consequently a musician with traditions deeply rooted in the life of this country. He resents the widespread adherence to the belief that jazz is the only native American music, and that it is truly indicative of American life.

"Of course jazz has its place in this country's music, but that place is in the cabaret and dance hall, not in the concert auditorium. I don't object to jazz itself, but rather to the prevailing tendency to magnify its importance." The young pianist's eyes bespoke his earnestness. "These jazz men are primarily parodists. They seize upon material offered in fine music and then distort it into graceless and obvious forms. After all, their aim is to make Broadway shuffle its feet and shake its shoulders, not to create music of permanent value which will have the same appeal fifty or a hundred years from now that it has today.

"To me, the most telling point against the artistic worth of jazz is the fact that no one wants to hear the jazz of yesterday. In a sentimental moment a dance orchestra may play Alexander's Ragtime Band but the crowd is eager to hear the new pieces. I don't know what the average life of one of these compositions is, but I don't imagine it is over a few months or a year at the very longest. As I said before, jazz has its place in life—but then, so has synthetic gin."

Mr. Pettis not only composes, but on his concert programs he always includes at least one American group. At the biennial of the National Federation of Music Clubs to be held in Portland, Oregon, in June, he is going to give a joint recital with Katherine Meisle and his program will be all-American.

It is not that he thinks that there is any such thing as "good American music," but he does believe, and emphatically believe, that there is such a thing as good music written in America. In spite of his knowledge that real art is in its very nature international, he feels that it is only fair to encourage serious American composers and to foster the development of good music in this country. In this way, according to Mr. Pettis, we may create a music which is distinctly American and which will truly be an expression of our national life.

"As a nation we are still in a transitional period, but the music produced now should be representative of the serious trend of our artistic growth. No lasting school of music can be built upon such a shaky foundation as that offered by jazz. It is in its very nature too ephemeral. It seems a shame that so many people are taking it so seriously and thus sanctifying it with the halo of importance. If people would take it for what it is so obviously worth as an amusing caricature, a posturing clown, it would be relegated to its rightful habitat, the dance hall. The movement is a menace to our aesthetic growth only so long as people continue to make excessive claims for something of such momentary value and to try to force the American stamp upon it." K. K.

From a Sketch by Jack Fiske

ASHLEY PETTIS

New Works in Playhouse Repertory

The Neighborhood Playhouse of New York recently added two new works by Americans to its repertory, A Legend of the Dance, described as a "medieval interlude" by Agnes Morgan, with music by Lily Hyland; and Sooner and Later, a dance satire by Irene Lewisohn, with music by Emerson Whithorne.

Thirteen Soloists Picked For Ann Arbor Festival

Ann Arbor, Mich., April 7.—Completed plans for the Ann Arbor Festival, to take place on May 20 to 23, include the appearance of thirteen soloists, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock, and the University Choral Union under Earl V. Moore. There will be concerts on the evenings of Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and matinee programs on the latter two days.

At the first concert Ossip Gabrilowitsch will assist the Orchestra in Tschaikowsky's B flat minor Piano Concerto, the program to include Schumann's First Symphony, Strauss' Don Juan, and Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture. Next evening Moussorgsky's Night on a Bald Mountain and Rachmaninoff's The Bells will be given, the latter with chorus and orchestra and Emily Stokes Hagar, soprano, Rhys Morgan, tenor, and Charles Tittmann, bass.

In the third concert the Children's Festival Chorus, under J. E. Maddy, will sing a program with the assistance of Loretta Degnan, contralto. That evening Lawrence Tibbett, baritone, will be soloist with the Orchestra, singing several arias. Brahms' Third Symphony and Taylor's Through the Looking Glass will be heard.

Mischa Elman will be soloist in Saint-Saens' Third Violin Concerto at the next concert, and Mr. Stock will conduct also Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and a Bach Suite. The Sixth and last program will be a concert performance of La Gioconda, with the Chorus and Orchestra, and with Frances Peralta, soprano, Augusta Lenska, mezzo-soprano, Kathryn Meisle, contralto, Mario Chamlee, tenor, Vicente Ballester, baritone, and Henri Scott, bass.

CECILE DE HORVATH

"Master of piano and crowd."—Manhattan, Kansas, Morning Chronicle, Nov. 14, 1924

MIDDLE WEST

"Memories of Carreno, Zeisler, were suggested by her intensely dramatic, temperamental performance. . . . Electrified and astonished her spellbound audience."

—Elgin, Ill., Daily News, Jan. 6, 1925.

"One may have heard the Paganini-Liszt Etude played by some six foot masculine pianist, but they never heard an interpretation of greater strength and beauty than that of last evening."

—Webster City, Iowa, Daily News, Dec. 18, 1924.

SOUTH

"No pianist has ever visited Henderson-Brown College who has so thoroughly inspired and impressed her audience as Mme. de Horvath."

—Siftings Herald, Arkadelphia, Ark., Jan. 19, 1925.

"DELIGHTS AUDIENCE OF 1500. . . . Gives a performance that ranks her as the foremost of our women pianists and shoulder to shoulder with the opposite sex."

—Park City Daily News, Bowling Green Ky., Nov. 11, 1924.

FAR WEST

"CECILE DE HORVATH SCORES TRIUMPH WITH PIANO NUMBERS."

(Headline in Denver Times, Nov. 21, 1924)

" . . . that was undoubtedly the best concert ever given in Gunnison."

—Gunnison, Colo., News-Champion, Nov. 28, 1924.

BALDWIN PIANO

WELTE-MIGNON RECORDS

Management:

Clarence E. Cramer

1102-03 Auditorium Theatre Bldg.

Chicago, Ill.

NEW YORK

"Miss de Horvath's audience was of unflagging enthusiasm and applauded warmly her performance of the Glazounoff Sonata in B flat Minor. . . . Miss de Horvath demonstrated in it her admirable command of piano pyrotechniques, feeling of emotional content and fluid pianistic speech. . . . Chopin's Polonaise in B flat was an exceptional bit of playing from the standpoint of virtuosity."

—New York Sun, Jan. 21, 1925.

"A pianist of considerable attainment, Miss Cecile de Horvath, gave an interesting recital. . . . The first group gave the test of her powers and found her at her best. She differentiated her composers intelligently. The Liszt Ballade with which she started, was played in good form, an effervescent, brilliant technique joined to a sense of its poetical moments; a Bourree of Bach was given neatly and with cheerful expressiveness; a Gluck Melody was found charming, while a Sonata by Glazounoff had the rich emotional style of the Russian composer."

—New York Times, Jan. 21, 1925.

"As before Mme. de Horvath played as a skilled, thoroughly competent pianist, at home in rapid passages and where technical difficulties were most rampant, playing with spirit and expressive ability."

—New York Herald-Tribune, Jan. 21, 1925.

"The Conclusion Brought the Audience to Her Feet with a Unified OVATION."

—Los Angeles Herald.

"Seldom Does Portland Tender Such Sincere and Enthusiastic OVATIONS."

—Portland, Ore., News.

ADDITIONAL TRIBUTES TO

ERNA RUBINSTEIN

From the Pacific Coast

"A very few number of famous violinists might be mentioned who can equal her genius. She is the possessor of a distinct and magnificent gift."—Portland News, Feb. 3, 1925.

"Erna Rubinstein has been compared to Kreisler, but she is more like a reappearance in the World of Paganini himself. Amazing, stupendous, astounding technique, that sets one marveling. The maturity of the whole performance was unbelievable.—Portland Oregonian, Feb. 3, 1925.

"Miss Rubinstein has a tremendous equipment, her virility is outstanding. Her tone and phrasing in the andante was exquisite and the last movement she did at an electric tempo."—Los Angeles Times, Jan. 30, 1925.

"Erna Rubinstein has rare talent and remarkable technical equipment, spontaneity and a good, sure tone."—Los Angeles Record, Jan. 30, 1925.

"Such mature splendid tone does not come our way every day—and to find it at the command of a slip of a girl seems sheer magic. We can only hope that we shall have the great good fortune to hear her again soon; her genius is of a rare order."—San Francisco Bulletin, Jan. 24, 1925.

"Miss Rubinstein played magnificently with lustrous tones and perfect mastery making the remarkable arpeggios and cadenzas thrilling."—San Francisco Call and Post, Jan. 24, 1925.

AVAILABLE SEASON 1925 - 1926
ONLY FROM JANUARY 1st TO MARCH 15th

CERTIFIED BY THE MUSICAL DIGEST

Exclusive Management:
DANIEL MAYER
Aeolian Hall, New York

STEINWAY PIANO

Joint Recital Feature in Boston

Zimbalist and Thomas Appear Together; Myra Hess, Macmillen, and Coleman Play.

Boston, April 7.—A joint recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon by Efrem Zimbalist and John Charles Thomas was one of the features of recent music here. Other important events on the musical calendar of the past week were the concerts given by Myra Hess, pianist, Francis Macmillen and Joseph Coleman, violinists, and William Richardson, baritone.

According to the Monitor, Mr. Zimbalist "again gave evidence of those superior qualities as violinist and musician which have so long distinguished him from many of his contemporaries." Mr. Smith commented that "only praise may be written" of the violinist's performances . . . "again his finespun, silken tone charmed the ear and once more his virtuosity, as should be the case with any performer, proved the handmaid of his musicianship." He was praised by other writers.

The Transcript chronicler reported that Mr. Thomas "has a voice of excellent quality, ample sonority, full resonance except in some of the softer works; intelligent understanding of his songs, except in some of the subtler things." In the opinion of the Monitor reviewer, he did "by far the best singing we have heard from him here recently." The Globe commentator mentioned that he brought "warmth and glow to his portion of the program. He has one of the most beautiful baritone voices that may be heard."

In the Herald was the assertion that the two artists "supplement each other, both musically and in person: the rapturous strides of John Charles Thomas, and the reserve of Zimbalist; the exquisite refinement, the intellectual bent of the violinist, and the dramatic warmth and operatic gesture of the singer."

* * *

The request program played by Myra Hess at her piano recital here April 5 was warmly applauded by a large audience. To quote Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald, "such concerts as Myra Hess gave yesterday afternoon are rare and cherished occasions . . . For in her playing there is a strange and beautiful poise, a spaciousness, a philosophy that tempers and invigorates . . . Here was playing that absolutely defied criticism."

Stuart Mason commented that "again did she prove herself a mistress of the instrument, fully cognizant of its limitations and never overstepping them . . . Again she proved herself to be a sensitive and intelligent interpreter of music of widely differing styles. No period, no school is beyond her sympathetic understanding." The Transcript writer wrote in an equally enthusiastic vein.

* * *

Francis Macmillen, violinist, was again heard here in recital on April 1 in Jordan Hall. He was assisted by Richard Hageman at the piano. To quote the Transcript, Mr. Macmillen's assets are "a tone that is warm, rich, full; a telling delivery in slow, sustained, melodic movements" and his liabilities are "a lack of a strong sense of rhythm" and an occasional clouding or muddying of tone." In the Glazounow Meditations, the artist "once more showed his aptness with a pure, direct lyric," added this writer and Paul Juon's Berceuse was played "charmingly and expressively."

The other violin recital of the week was that given by Joseph Coleman, who played in Jordan Hall on April 2. According to the Transcript he "shows the results of good training and a natural aptitude for the violin. His technique is fluid; his bow, flexible. He produces neither blurs nor scratches. His tone has genuine beauty, in short, he is a perfectly schooled young violinist." This writer thought, however, that his playing lacked the stamp of his own personality as yet. The Herald writer remarked that "an excellent violinist and musician he may well be" but "as a virtuoso he cannot as yet be given high rank."

* * *

An enthusiastic audience applauded William Richardson's song recital in Jordan Hall March 31. Miss Gerstein wrote that he "has a beautiful voice, a baritone that is large and resonant, deeply timbred, vibrant. And with this he has acquired an admirable diction" in English as well as in foreign tongues.

Courboin Plays Organ Symphony

Charles M. Courboin, Belgian organist, played Widor's Sixth Symphony on March 27 with the American Orchestral Society, conducted by Chalmers Clifton, in the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York.

MISS RATA PRESENT

Pianist, Who After Tours of the Middle West and South Is Again in New York Filling Engagements in This Section Until the End of May.

Columbia Gives Music Awards

Among the fellowship awards announced by Columbia University last week were two in the department of music. Edward H. Margetson of New York was given the Baier Fellowship, amounting to about $1,000, which provides for one year's study in choral music. Edward Robinson, also of New York, a senior in Columbia College, was awarded the Mosenthal Fellowship in music criticism. This amounts to about $750 to aid the student in one year's study of music, aesthetics, languages, and kindred subjects. The Mosenthal Fellowship is awarded biennially.

San Carlo Company Gives Opera Season in Chicago

(Continued from page 11)

of the evening, according to Mr. Gunn.

On Wednesday afternoon Carmen was sung in English by Lorna Doone Jackson, Herbert Gould, Olga Kargau, Charles Hart, and Joseph Interrante. The cast received commendation, as did Conductor van Grove. The English diction was in general good, according to the press. That evening La Traviata was given with Tina Paggi and Messrs. Onofrei and Basiola. All three received laudatory notices. The following night the double bill consisted of Cavalleria and Pagliacci. Gladys Axman, to quote Mr. Moore, "did some fine singing and impressive acting" in the former. Mmes. Kent and Falco and Messrs. Salazar and Interrante completed the cast. In Pagliacci the following appeared: Mme. Roselle and Messrs. Tommasini, Basiola, Cehanovsky, and Curci.

La Boheme was sung on Friday night by Mmes. Roselle and Kargau and Messrs. Onofrei, Valle, de Biasi, Interrante and Cervi. Bianca Saroya made her first appearance in the final opera of the engagement—Faust. Mr. Moore commended both her presence and voice.

Music Week Competitions Progress

With the announcement of the first of the Borough winners by Isabel Lowden, director of the New York Music Week Association, came also the announcement that the children who attain the finals in the Interborough music contests will this year be given their final hearings in Carnegie and Town Halls. The number of contestants this year, including the school choruses, will number close to ten thousand.

Gerald MAAS

Distinguished Cellist

Appearance with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra

The Detroit News—"Gerald Maas is a first class performer who accomplishes a rich tone of the greatest beauty. He presented the melody in all its beauty. He was received with great enthusiasm and made such an excellent impression that Detroit's latch-string is permanently out to him."

The New York American—Like Casals, Maas is a highly musical player, sincere, undemonstrative and bent on the musical business in hand, which he delivers with unfailing sense of style, polished technique and a tone of refined and appealing quality.—Leonard Liebling.

Available for solo, joint recitals and orchestral engagements

For Terms and Dates Address:

MANAGEMENT OF GERALD MAAS

75 Meigs Street Rochester, N. Y.

THE CURTIS INSTITUTE OF MUSIC

FOUNDED BY MARY LOUISE CURTIS BOK

MR. JOSEF HOFMANN

WILL GIVE

PERSONAL AUDITIONS

on

Monday - - - April 27, 1925
Tuesday - - - April 28, 1925
Wednesday - - April 29, 1925
Thursday - - April 30, 1925
Friday - - - May 1, 1925

to students who wish to join

HIS PERSONAL PIANO CLASS

which will begin November next

Audition Fee $25

{Deducted from first term's tuition fee, and refunded to winners of scholarships.}

The auditions will be held at

THE CURTIS INSTITUTE OF MUSIC

Rittenhouse Square Philadelphia

Steinway Pianos Used

Telephone Locust 5130

Two Pianists With Koussevitzky

Cortot Plays Two Concertos With Boston Symphony; Myra Hess in Beethoven; Leginska as Conductor.

Boston, April 7. — Two novelties were heard at last week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Alfred Cortot, soloist, played Germaine Tailleferre's Piano Concerto, and Henry Eichheim conducted his Chinese Legend. Schumann's Concerto in A minor was also played by Mr. Cortot, and Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra and Ravel's La Valse completed the program.

Philip Hale wrote in the Herald that Mr. Cortot's playing of the Schumann was "unsurpassable, never to be forgotten." H. T. Parker of the Transcript asserted that "under his hands the piano became an instrument of sustained and limpid song." On the other hand, the Globe reviewer was more impressed by his "well schooled musicianship than by his virtuosity." Other writers agreed that his performance of both concertos was excellent.

In Mr. Parker's opinion, Mlle. Tailleferre's music is marked by "fresh melody, sprightly rhythms, happy turns of modulation and counter-point, flowing interplay of the two voices . . . the ear almost forgets the spare, apt means; the free, direct expression; the transparent coloring; the light, sure workmanship." The writer in the Globe wrote that she has "all the necessary gifts and knowledge except the talent of inventing or borrowing significant musical ideas." He thought the work "hopelessly dull." Mr. Hale thought it "short, melodious, entertaining." Warren Storey Smith (Post) did not find the Concerto significant, and Stuart Mason of the Christian Science Monitor commented that Mr. Cortot "contrived to work wonders with its ungrateful and uninteresting measures."

The Eichheim Legend received general commendation. According to Mr. Mason, the composer conducted "unostentatiously, but none the less effectively." He thought the work "powerfully dramatic," and Mr. Smith referred to it as "uncommonly stimulating. . . . Both symphonically and dramatically this Legend is a notable achievement." Equally enthusiastic was Mr. Hale.

* * *

Myra Hess was soloist at the fourth concert of the Monday evening series of the orchestra. The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture, Mendelssohn's Scherzo from A Midsummer Night's Dream, Wagner's Lohengrin Prelude and Strauss' Dance of Salome.

In Beethoven's G major Concerto, Miss Hess' playing, to quote the Transcript, "was perfection, artistic perfection, raised to the nth power. . . . Technique with Miss Hess has been transcended long, long ago by matchless beauty of tone, perfect limpidity, an imagination that makes necessary all the passage work, more, that endows it with vital importance." The Monitor reviewer observed that she is "one of those rare pianists whose dominion of the keyboard is so complete that the listener is hardly aware of it."

The last in the series of Young People's concerts of the orchestra was conducted by Richard Burgin. Each number was prefaced with explanatory remarks by Mr. Surette.

* * *

Ethel Leginska appeared with the People's Symphony Orchestra April 5 as guest conductor, and Greta Torpadie was the assisting artist in Miss Leginska's Six Nursery Rhymes for chamber orchestra and soprano. On the program were Weber's Oberon overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and a Bach Piano Concerto in F minor, with Miss Leginska as soloist and conductor.

The guest conductor "made an excellent impression" on the Monitor reviewer, and H. T. Parker commented that she "added a discerning, an imaginative touch of her own" to the works she led. Mr. Smith thought her an "able orchestral leader," who "by her own ardor and enthusiasm, enkindled the men before her . . . her beat and her gestures were resourceful, expressive, authoritative and graceful to see." The Herald writer observed that "a keen ear she has, too, for orchestral color, and pure taste in the moulding of a phrase."

This writer thought her at her best in the Concerto as a pianist "with her crisp, bright tone." Mr. Smith agreed that she was "her usual excellent self," but the Monitor did not think her playing benefited by her effort to do two things at once.

Miss Torpadie was commended by this reviewer for the appropriateness with which she sang the Nursery Rhymes. Mr. Parker said she sang the words in "exactly the mood of the music," and Mr. Smith commented that she "acquitted herself admirably." The chronicler in the Herald found she has lost none of "her knack at singing odd music with understanding and apparent ease."

* * *

The Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra, Raffaele Martino conductor, gave its spring candle-light concert at Jordan Hall the afternoon of the fifth appropriately garbed in the wigs, ruffles, and silks of the period. A Sonata for flute and piano by Bigaglia, Handel's Organ Concerto, and a Suite, Dolorosa by Scheidt were marked first time in Boston. Both Mr. Martino and the players received laudatory notices.

JOHN COATES

English Tenor, Who Has Been Heard in All Parts of Europe, Will Make His First Appearance in the United States on the Evening of April 23 in Town Hall, New York.

Fabini Symphonic Poem Conducted by Shavitch

Syracuse, April 6.—Campo, a symphonic poem by Eduardo Fabini, young South American composer, had its American premiere Saturday at the last of the season's popular concerts given by the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra, Vladimir Shavitch conducting. Gerard Hekking, cellist, was soloist in Haydn's Concerto.

According to George Smith of the Herald Mr. Hekking proved himself "an artist of outstanding ability and poetic qualities. His tone was beautiful and his technique much more than adequate. Also he was subtle in his ensemble with the orchestra . . . A masterly performance."

The Fabini poem, to further quote Mr. Smith, showed "much variety of rhythm and excellent color." Louis Crabtree of the American thought it "a picturesque work, with a leading theme of weird and sombre beauty, and elaborations of the most artistic character intended to portray both the melancholy and vivacity of the people of Uruguay. Mr. Shavitch gave the composition a poetic and masterly reading." The rest of the program consisted of Weber's Freischuetz Overture, a march from Berlioz's Faust, and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody.

Three Win Music Scholarships

From more than a score of candidates heard in auditions last Wednesday afternoon in Aeolian Hall, New York, a pianist, violinist, and harpist were awarded scholarships in the new California School of Musical Arts. The violinist is Paul Rabinow, sixteen years old, of New York; the pianist, Dorys Levene, of New York; and the harpist, Florence R. Jackson, of Newark, N. J. The judges were members of the faculty of the school.

RATA PRESENT

Pianiste of Re-Engagements

Management of Rata Present: Hotel Ansonia, New York City

AMPICO RECORDS

MARYON VADIE (LYRIC DANCER)

OTA GYGI (VIOLINIST)

with

The Maryon Vadie Dancers and Mary Izant, pianist

Management EVELYN HOPPER

Aeolian Hall New York City

EASTMAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC

of

THE UNIVERSITY OF ROCHESTER

Summer Session

JUNE 22 — JULY 25, 1925

All Regular Departments in Session With Complete Faculties

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC

Faculty of Nationally Known Experts Offer Courses in

METHODS, INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC

(Woodwinds, Brasses, Strings)

PIANO CLASS TEACHING, APPRECIATION, VOCAL CLASS TEACHING, HARMONY

NORMAL AND REPERTORY CLASSES FOR PIANO TEACHERS

Organ Accompaniment of Motion Pictures

Academic Work in University in Conjunction with Music Study

For Information Address Director of Summer Session

EASTMAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

London Music Activity Revives

Piccaver in Recital; American Indian Sings; Instrumental Music and Three Symphony Concerts Heard.

London.

Although it is still mid-Lent, musical activity in London is begining to pick up, and there are more concerts to report during the past ten days or so than has been the case for some weeks. The coldness of the weather—it has snowed here lately—may have something to do with the increased interest in indoor music affairs.

Alfred Piccaver's Albert Hall recital attracted great notice. "Having won a very genuine success by his few appearances last season at Covent Garden," said the Telegraph writer of it, he "was only fulfilling the natural destiny of such voices as his by appearing at the Albert Hall. All great voices—and some of them have greatness thrust upon them by misguided paragraphists—gravitate here sooner or later, since it seems that only in the vanquishing of these vast and unfriendly spaces can the final seal be put on reputation. Of the great popular success won by Mr. Piccaver there was no doubt whatsoever, and, on the whole, the triumphant progress, accompanied by innumerable encores, was no more than the merit of his performances deserved.

"Seldom, indeed, among English artists—Mr. Piccaver hails from Lincolnshire—can one be found to earn, however remotely, the title of 'the English Caruso.' The comparison may not be of the happiest, but it does give some idea of the robust quality and carrying power of this English tenor."

The writer doubted only the evenness of the artist's voice throughout its range, especially in the lower notes, but conceded that a judgment in this matter is not advisable after a concert given among the echoes and reverberations of the Albert Hall. Other notices of this concert were not available at time of writing.

Os-ke-non-ton Sings

Another artist more familiar to the United States than to England who made an appearance in the week ending March 22 was the Mohawk Indian Os-ke-non-ton, a baritone, who sang in the full panoply of his tribe both art songs on Indian themes and chants, sacred and profane, from the native repertory. The Sunday Times writer thought his voice "naturally good, with apparently just enough training to fit it for concert use, but not enough to spoil it." Both this writer and Mr. Scholes in the Observer rejoiced in the opportunity to hear actual Indian music, but deplored the inclusion of what the latter called "mock Mohawk." Mr. Scholes continued: "In a few cases one fancies one hears the authentic Red-man note, disguised under a conventional harmonic treatment; in others one hears nothing but the romantic Redman of the commercial music publisher."

This was not the only exotic recital of the week. A few days before the appearance of Os-ke-non-ton, Mme. Kennedy-Fraser, Patuffa Kennedy-Fraser, Margaret Kennedy, and Hugh Mackay gave one of their customary afternoons of Hebridean folk-songs to a well filled Queen's Hall. Although far from denying the interest of this music, the Telegraph critic went so far as to say that a whole program of it—some thirty pieces—must tend towards monotony.

Present Modern Sonatas

Two instrumental recitals were of some importance. In one, the violinist Albert Sammons collaborated with William Murdoch at the piano in a program of modern sonatas. A new one by Herbert Howells (No. 3, in E minor) received, according to the Telegraph, a performance "of the kind composers dream about but very seldom succeed in hearing."

The other was a "repeat" at the hands of Walter Rummel, the pianist. Again reviews differed as to the artist's line and interpretation in Bach, Beethoven, and Chopin, but agreed in thinking Mr. Rummel's art worth full discussion.

Symphony concerts numbered three. Two were conducted by Felix Weingartner, a London Symphony program and a Philharmonic. The other was part of the Queen's Hall Orchestra series, under Sir Henry J. Wood. At the first named, Elgar's Enigma Variations had a performance which won both conductor and orchestra plaudits from the audience and generally from the reviewers. At the other of the Viennese leader's concerts commendation was more reserved, but still hearty. It was felt that Mr. Weingartner again showed himself less at home in impressionistic music (L'Apres-midi) than in severer works.

Of the Queen's Hall concert, the Telegraph reviewer began: "In some ways Miss Jelly d'Aranyi's playing of the Mozart Concerto in D was the most notable event." Reference has frequently been made in this correspondence to the art of this violinist. The critical commendation which it has in the past evoked was no whit tempered after the concert of the 21st. P. L.

Salzburg Will Have Its Own Festival This Summer

SALZBURG will have a music festival this summer in spite of the fact that the International Society of Contemporary Music has deserted this city for Prague and Vienna. The president of the local committee is Vice Burgomaster Hildmann who has announced that the winter riding school in the archiepiscopal stud will be reconstructed for the festival according to plans made by Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Max Reinhardt, and Richard Strauss.

Dr. Karl Muck, Max Reinhardt, Franz Schalk, and Bruno Walter will be in charge of the artistic direction of the festival. Vollmoller's Miracle and three orchestral concerts by the Vienna Philharmonic Society will be given in the new hall; Mozart's Don Juan and Figaro, and Donizetti's Don Pasquale will be produced at the Municipal Theatre; and three chamber music concerts will take place in the Mozart House.

Schneevoight Leads In Augusteum Concert

Rome.

Georg Schneevoight, the Finnish conductor, led the orchestra of the Augusteum on March 15. He directed in the same hall in three concerts in 1909. The program of the recent concert consisted of Brahms' First Symphony, Ravel's La Valse, and Strauss' Death and Transfiguration.

Schneevoight's success at his reappearance was unequivocal, according to Matteo Incagliati, reviewer of the Giornale d'Italia. This writer found remarkable in Schneevoight the balance of his orchestra, the eloquence of his expression, and the strictness of his rhythm. "He is not," Signor Alealona reported in Il Mondo, "wooden and mechanical in his beat, but his rallentandi and accelerandi have an evenness and progressive and cumulative force that carry the audience with him in his interpretations.

According to Signor Gasco in La Tribuna Schneevoight used rather more violence in his motions than was necessary. He pointed to Mahler, Nikisch, and Mottl, who, parsimonious with their gestures, nevertheless did wonders with their orchestras. This chronicler was quite willing to admit that Schneevoight's achievements, despite his excessive energy, were considerable.

Of La Valse Signor Alealona wrote, "This work, which perhaps would be more effective with choreographic setting, as it is said originally to have been conceived, has qualities of obscurity, hardness, and gruesomeness, but nevertheless it manages to attain at the same time a marked degree of grace and delicacy in certain of its parts." F. C.

Cara Ginn Sings Again

Nice, April 1.—Cara Ginn, American soprano, appeared here in a joint recital with Nina Propopovitch, violinist, last week. She was heard the previous week at the Casino Municipal in her fifth performance as Elvira in Don Giovanni.

GUIOMAR NOVAES

LATEST TRIUMPH: BOSTON

"DISCREETLY Mme. Guiomar Novaes adjusts her visits to Boston. She does not return so rarely that the public has well nigh forgotten its pleasure in her as pianist. Nor does she come so often that her merits and graces begin to wear a cloak of sameness. Reappearing at Jordan Hall last Saturday afternoon, she seemed in new bloom both freshened and ripened."

"In her own Latin America, she has taken also a year of semi-holiday from the strenuous concert-giving of this Nordic continent. In the interval, conscious or sub-conscious process has clarified and intensified her attributes as pianist, her traits as musician. In the first flush of maturity she now plays alert and abundant, warmed, deepened, more than ever in the vein by this new fruition of living."

"Throughout the concert, the roundness and the richness of her tone went unclouded and undiminished. The surface took shape and color from the music in hand; within were body, heat and light."

"Such a pianist has Mme. Novaes now become; while as musician she has gained not less in free and ardent play of mood and spirit.

"Not only in scope of imagination and sweep of tone, but in fancy and finesse has Mme. Novaes also ripened. The shapeliness, the transparency, the light-fingered modulation of Beethoven's Sonata made it anew a gracious, almost a playful music. Crisp was the motion; bright and changeful the pianist's tone."
—Transcript, March 16, 1925.

Season 1925-1926 Now Booking

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON

Fisk Building
New York

STEINWAY PIANO
VICTOR RECORDS
DUO-ART RECORDS

Packard Building
Philadelphia

OLD-WORLD HIGHLIGHTS

Honegger Composition Is Rapped in Berlin

Berlin.

The recent performance of Honegger's Pacific 231 in Bluthner Hall gave Dr. Leopold Schmidt, reviewer of the Berliner Tageblatt, another opportunity to attack this representative of the moderns rather sharply.

He wrote: "We had been promised a sensation in this symphonic poem of Honegger. At its first performance in Geneva the opponents and adherents of the composer quarreled violently.

"Here in Berlin everything went off quietly enough. One might have listened to this music with amusement, but certainly there was nothing to become excited about. It is a sad misuse of the art of sounds when one attempts with it to create the impression of an engine standing, starting and rushing ahead. It does not speak well for the taste of the composer when he compares in his preface to the score his love for locomotive engines with that for women and horses.

"The whole idea loses its danger, however, because the music is poorly constructed, and it is not at all what it might be or ought to be to drive home its point. My idea of how a real artist can put into music aural and visual impressions is illustrated very well in Liszt's Mazeppa.

"At any rate," concluded Dr. Schmidt, "Honegger has not even the talent of Stravinsky." If that were true it would leave very little ability at all for the young French composer, for, according to Dr. Schmidt's estimate, Stravinsky has no great quantity of genius.

Young Artists Draw Attention

Two young girl pianists attracted exceptional notice by the pianistic talents which they displayed, Harriet Cohen, an English artist, and a charming blonde young lady from the Ukraine, Lubka Kolessa.

Miss Cohen received warm tribute in the Tageblatt, whose report said: "A highly talented young English lady, Harriet Cohen, stepped to the fore with two concerts, and must be put on the list of those from whom much may be expected in the future. Surety of fingers and a strong musical vitality are, first of all, the characteristics of her pianistic make-up. On both evenings she paid most attention to English composers, older masters of the sixteenth century, like Byrd, Morley, Gibbons, Bull, and Clark, and new personalities, like John Ireland, Eugene Goossens and Arnold Bax."

With only a week between her two recitals, Miss Cohen managed to attract an audience at the second which was ten times as large as that which had heard her previously.

Miss Kolessa appeared as soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. She played Chopin's First Concerto. Dr. Urban characterized her as a "truly feminine player, one not inflamed with the ardor of a Carreno, but still one not too weak and retiring.

"There is a certain girlish quality in her style. Over the first number she poured the splendor of her glittering technique. The romanza dissolved into quiet delicacy, but the rondo she colored in wanton sharp rhythms. The eye of the listener says, 'I like you,' and the ear adds, 'You charm me.'

"Not often does one experience such combined pleasure in an original personality, delicacy of touch and virtuosity of technique."

This reviewer, commenting on the great applause which Miss Kolessa received, predicted that in a few years she will be known all over Europe.

ARTHUR KURSCHNER.

MISS ANNA ROBENNE

Russian Dancer Who Will Appear To morrow Evening Assisted by the Barrere Little Symphony in the Manhattan Opera House, New York.

Play Unpublished Bellini Music

Catania, Sicily, April 7.—An unpublished work of Bellini, a sacred composition entitled Passio, was performed here yesterday at the Teatro Massimo. The choral piece was found not long ago by a local lawyer named Patane in the archives of his family. It is dedicated to the Abbe Bartolo. Passio will be sung again soon here.

Monteux Appointed by Concertgebouw

Amsterdam. — Pierre Monteux has been appointed principal conductor of the Concertgebouw Orchestra during the absence of Willem Mengelberg in America during the early part of next season.

Gui Opens Milan Symphony Season

Failoni Conducts Second Concert; Le Donne Curiose and Puccini's Manon at La Scala.

Milan.

The first two of the series of symphonic programs by the Milan Concert Corporation took place on March 14 and 21. Vittorio Gui was the conductor at the opening concert, leading a program which consisted of Brahms' Fourth Symphony, the Overture to The Secret of Suzanne, excerpts from Schubert's Rosamunde, the Prelude and Love-Death from Tristan, and Respighi's I Pini di Roma.

The young conductor Sergio Failoni directed at the second appearance of the orchestra in the Salone Gallignani. He made his debut with considerable success some seasons ago at the Augusteum in Rome. His program included the Overture to the Marriage of Figaro, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade, the Funeral March from Goetterdaemmerung, and the Overture to William Tell.

Maestro Gui is one of the most popular of Italian conductors. He has for over a year been at the head of this symphonic organization, which is formed of elements entirely separate from those comprising the orchestra of La Scala. The orchestra has been recently refreshed with various new members. At its first performance of the season the group displayed an ability which last year it had only in prospect. The applause of a large audience was insistent and enthusiastic, and Maestro Gui had to take his bow many times from the podium.

Respighi Piece New to Milan

I Pini di Roma, of Respighi, was heard at this concert for the first time in Milan. It recently was played at one of the Augusteum concerts in Rome. The novelty was surprisingly well received by the Milanese public and by the critics.

Maestro Failoni displayed competent control of the orchestra in his concert, and complete knowledge of the music on his desk. The orchestra brought out his tasteful interpretations skillfully, for—thanks largely to the efforts which Maestro Gui has in the last two seasons expended on it—the organization has acquired that dynamic and rhythmic smoothness and ease which it showed only signs of at its earliest concerts.

The symphony was played with rather more regard for instinct than for cultivated taste in respect to the interpretation, but it was convincing, and the Beethoven mood existed at least to a large extent. The Scheherazade Suite was fittingly imbued with more life and color. It will be recalled that some seasons ago La Scala put on this composition as a ballet.

The Wagner excerpt was taken at a deliberate pace which robbed it of some of its solemnity. There was some of its rugged heroic power lacking.

Le Donne Curiose Revived

After twelve years La Scala put on once more Wolf-Ferrari's Le Donne Curiose on March 22. It enjoyed great success. Maestro Gui presented the music with a delightful rhythmic crispness. He sensed perfectly the classical quality of the score, its Mozartean character, and accordingly did not overstress a point. At the same time he molded all the elements of the production into a splendid unity and coordination of detail. Needless to say it is exactly this light and swift-moving manner which is required for scores of this type.

All the precious qualities of Le Donne Curiose, no matter how much immersed in the mass of detail were brought out clearly under Maestro Gui's baton. He was rewarded by the applause of the audience which was sufficient for him to be forced to take several curtain calls together with the principal singers of the production.

Those who had the leading roles were Signora Ferraris (as Colombina), Signora Briganti (as Rosaura), Signora Torri (as Eleonora), Signora Agozzino (as Beatrice), the basso Righetti (as Ottavio), the tenor Salvati (as Florindo), the baritone Gubiani (as Arlecchino), and the baritone Paci (as Lelio).

Signora Briganti was new to Milanese opera goers. She is regularly connected with the Costanzi Theatre in Rome, but came to La Scala for Le Donne Curiose, and perhaps to sing as Micaela in Carmen. She has a voice of beautiful quality and firm pitch.

The scenery was adequate, but not much more can be said for it.

An American Singer

A singer with American blood in her veins has attracted notice by her work in Zandonai's I Cavalieri di Ekebu—Maria Luisa Fanelli, who takes the role of Anna. Her voice is clear in tone and even through her whole range. It has ease and grace of emission, and is secure in intonation. She is a pupil of Maestro Binetti, the general secretary of La Scala.

FEDERICO CANDIDA.

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON 1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

Anton BILOTTI Pianist
Management: Lionel Powell & Holt, London, England
Steinway Piano Welte-Mignon Records Exclusively

ABBY MORRISON
SOPRANO SAN CARLO GRAND OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: H. J. ANDERSEN, 67 East 55th Street, New York City
Telephone Plaza 7147

Ethyl HAYDEN
Lyric Soprano
Management: Loudon Charlton—Carnegie Hall, New York

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

Play Five Saint-Saens Concertos

Paris Hears Young Pianists With Lamoureux; American Singer Makes Opera Debut; Varied Concerts.

Paris.

An outburst of piano virtuosity began the last week in March when the five piano concertos of Saint-Saens were performed in a concert given Monday evening, March 23, in the Salle Erard. The First Concerto in D major (1858) was played by Mme. Madeleine Peletier-Brodin; the Second, in G minor (1868), was played by Mlle. Ida Perin; the Third, in E flat major (1869), by Mlle. Jeanne-Marie Darre; the Fourth, in C minor (1875), by Mlle. Maria Antonia de Castro; and the Fifth, in F major (1896), by Mlle. Marcelle Herrenschmidt. The orchestra was the Lamoureux, conducted by Paul Paray.

Each one of the soloists is a lady of tender years, and commenting upon their performance in general the music reviewer of the Chicago Tribune, Paris Edition, said: "It is almost illegal for persons so youthful to play the piano so flawlessly." Like everybody else who heard the concert, he was astonished because "everything was so unpretentiousy delivered, was so fine in abandon, so minus any sense of effort; everything was so clear, so cleanly pedalled, so glittering, so neat in detail." Paul Le Flem, writing in Comoedia, found the cause of his astonishment to be "the impeccable, supple technic" of the pianists in question, "their amazing authority, fire, finesse, power, phrasing, elegance of style, taste, and highly colored tone!"

Artists Give Joint Recital

The concert of violin-piano sonatas given by Andre Capet (violinist) and Paul Loyonnet (pianist) attracted much attention. The appearances of these artists are considered an "event" in Paris. Stan Golestan, writing in Le Figaro, attributed their popularity to their "incomparable ensemble" and their "exceptional musicianship." He found their reading of the Cesar Franck, the Kreutzer of Beethoven, and the Debussy sonatas, "profound, noble, and beautiful and moving," and added that "it is impossible to reveal with more simplicity and grandeur, the intimate and sublime meaning of music." The Comoedia reviewer said that their "interpretation is exemplary, simple, without searchings for peculiar effects," while the Chicago Tribune, after commenting upon "the unity of thought and feeling" that exists between these two artists, observed that moments of their playing were dull because they "yielded too much to expository analysis."

An American soprano, Hallie Stiles, sang at the Theatre du Trianon-Lyrique on March 26. This was her Paris operatic debut. Miss Stiles undertook the role of Helperinde, in Maurice Fouret's four-act opera La Belle de Haguenau. She was quite successful, and it is said that after she terminates her engagement at the Trianon-Lyrique she is to step to the Opera-Comique, where the roles of Mimi and Manon await her. Jean Gandrey-Rety, who covered Miss Stiles' debut for Comoedia, after complimenting the singer's "extremely agreeable appearance," said that "she is gifted with an ample soprano," which is "clear in the upper register, but a bit dark in the medium."

French diction is the bugbear of all foreign artists who sing here, and M. Gandrey-Rety praised Miss Stiles "for speaking our language the way she does," although he advised her to "greatly improve her pronunciation in order to render more clearly the text confided to her."

The Chicago Tribune said that in the role of Helperinde Miss Stiles' "singing was of a purer quality than it was when we heard her in concert some months ago," and that "her impersonation proved her to be a scenic artist of fine fibre and worthy of high admiration."

Double Bass as Solo Instrument

This season the Paris orchestras have been reluctant to play new music. A few new things have been brought out, but not in the quantity of other years. Deploring this fact, Emile Vuillermoz, music critic of Excelsior, greeted with praise M. Pierne's conducting with the Colonne Orchestra of an unknown composition of Birckenstock. "This young composer died, it is said, in 1735," wrote M. Vuillermoz. "In less than two hundred years therefore, he has succeeded in having his music played in Paris. It is a beautiful result for Birckenstock; which should encourage his successors to be patient." The composition of Birckenstock which was performed was a Suite for double bass.

"It is exceptional," wrote M. Vuillermoz, "for one of these elephants of the orchestra to leave his companions and disport himself near the footlights," but this was "the surprising spectacle that M. Joseph Prunner, remarkable contrabassist, allowed us to contemplate." M. Prunner's ideal is to make the listener take the contrebasse for the violoncello, and he succeeds so admirably that, if he closes his eyes a good-willed listener has every possibility sometimes of deceiving himself.

Discussing the composition, Adolphe Boschot in l'Echo de Paris, remarked that it is "pleasing music, with a lovely slow movement that is particularly admirable in the first measures, and with fast movements that one is willing to listen to if one thinks of something else! For after all, do not be fooled by anything, not even that which is ancient; all the portraits of the 18th century are not masterpieces, and it is misunderstanding and offending the true masters to mix them with the others." M. Vuillermoz found a practical interest in the performance of such music, for, he says "flutists are proud to imitate thunder, so why should not the contrabassists adore to counterfeit little birds?"

Offers Debussy Program

Boiled down, all the reviewers were in accord that Francois Gaillard's recital of music of Debussy disclosed a pianist "for whom this music would seem to have been composed," so thoroughly did he "know all of its strength and weaknesses," so well "does he know where to interpret and where not to interpret." Special comment was made upon his reading of Clair de Lune, in which "his loudest tone was what is ordinarily considered a pianissimo." Played in this way and with a proper feeling for its sentiment, "this much abused and misapprehended composition, has a powerful emotional effect."

IRVING SCHWERKE.

Honolulu Hears American Opera

Honolulu.—The Temple Dancer, an opera by John Adam Hugo, American composer, was recently performed here for the first time. The work had its premiere at the New York Metropolitan, and the American Opera Society of Chicago gave it five times in 1922-1923 with Peggy Anderson in the leading role. She was the protagonist in the performance here too.

Observe Centennial of Ninth

Frankfurt.—In celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the first performance of Beethoven's Ninth Sympony, which took place here on April 1, 1825, the Frankfurter Orchesterverein, under the director of Professor Ernst Wendel, gave two performances of the Symphony in the Saalbau on March 31 and April 1.

GRADOVA

"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist
Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer Flutist
Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records
Mason & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

RAYMOND HAVENS Pianist
Solist with BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 8 performances
Soloist with CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 2 performances
Soloist with MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 3 performances
For Dates and Terms Address:
EVELYN LIGHT, Sec. 87 Pinckney St., Boston, Mass.

Of Paramount Interest to All Singers and Vocal Teachers

SINGING
A Treatise for Teachers and Students
By HERBERT WITHERSPOON

WITH authoritative writings pertaining to modern voice development and the vocal art in general all too scarce, this book by such a master of singing as Mr. Witherspoon is of unusual importance.

The work is divided into two parts. Part I contains a series of essays or articles dealing in a general and especially comprehensive manner with various subjects relating to the singing art. In Part II, the author illustrates completely his method of teaching, setting forth with the utmost clarity the different facts and principles upon which his entire art is based. As an additional feature, the book concludes with a cross-reference index designed to act as a guide for the finding of any desired information for special study or particular ends.

We recommend this unquestionably valuable book to every student of the voice as a text-book which it will pay him to have constantly at his elbow for ready reference.

Price, net, $2.00

G. SCHIRMER, INC., NEW YORK

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

THE seventh concert of the Horatio Parker Choir of New Haven was given recently under the auspices of the Yale School of Music. David Stanley Smith conducted and H. Frank Bozyan was the accompanist.

Eunice Waugh, member of the piano faculty of the Wisconsin College of music was heard in recital at the Congregational Church, Wauwatosa, on March 20. Miss Waugh was assister by Mrs. Howard L. Zetteler, reader, and Chester Nalbert, violinist.

A large reservation for the Lamond Master Repertoire Class at the Bush Conservatory Summer School has been received by the management, and many applications have been made for the scholarship which Mr. Lamond offers for the summer term. Mr. Lammond will give a recital the first week of the term. The Orchestral School of the Conservatory, besides the symphony orchestra, also fosters a Junior Orchestra under the direction of Ebba Sundstrom. The Juniors will make their initial bow at a concert to be given on April 22 at Lincoln Hall for the benefit of Uhlig's Orphan Home. Jennie Peterson, soprano, Ebba Sundstrom, violinist, and Mrs. Eddy, pianist, will give solos in addition to the numbers of the orchestra.

Mildred Seeba, a pupil of Herbert Witherspoon, was the soloist for the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, at the Matinee Musical Club, Montreal, on March 18. The Chaminade Club of Hackensack, N. J., has recently heard two of Mr. Witherspoon's pupils. Rose Dirmann, soprano, was soloist with the club, and Walter Leary, baritone, sang his third re-engagement there yesterday. Mr. Leary will also give a recital at the International House, New York, today and will be heard in concert in Milford, Mass., on April 26.

Ernesto Berumen, pianist and teacher, played at Aeolian Hall on Friday noon, March 27. He will give his first Carnegie Hall recital next season.

On April 5 Mr. Berumen appeared in a benefit concert for the French Tubercular Orphan Children at the Hotel Brevoort, under the auspices of the French Consulate of New York City.

Emilie Goetze, a young pianist, was one of the soloists at the La Forge-Berumen noonday recital in Aeolian Hall on March 27. Miss Goetze is an artist pupil of Ernesto Berumen.

E. Robert Schmitz announces that he will again conduct a Summer Master class in this country. The class will be held from July 30 to September 5 in Boulder, Colo.

Mr. Schmitz's session will consist of two sections, a Technic Class and an Interpretation Class. Private lessons will also be available for such pupils as Mr. Schmitz believes sufficiently advanced to use them advantageously.

Mr. Schmitz's teaching lays particular stress on the fact that all theories of piano technic today must be evolved from the full resources of the modern piano and not hampered by traditions established in the past by masters who were considering pianos of lesser powers and sensitiveness. The outstanding feature of the technic class is the extensive use of natural laws, the science of which is analyzed and expounded. Mr. Schmitz believes that working by principle instead of conforming to a given method allows the student an individual freedom of application and enlarged vision of the possibilities in musical compositions regardless of their period.

In the Interpretation Class many of the conflicting traditions established by the various pedagogical lineages will be eliminated, to be replaced by an analytical study of the means of expression used by the composer, and their relative significance to epoch and schools. A logical discussion of the melodic, harmonic and rhythmic elements, as well as the opacity or transparency of the work, will afford the pupil genuine and direct contact with the composer's concept.

A piano recital by the pupils of Augusta Tollefsen assisted by Bernhard Knudsen, violinist, and a string quartet was given at the Apollo Studios, Brooklyn, on March 27. Those appearing were Laura Schneider, Maren Aalbue, Elva Pohlmeyer, Anne Seaman, Hugh Higgins, Bella Risikoff, Clara Markowitz, Ogden Dingwall, Lillie Moore, Isabel Gould Monzert, and Edith Pomeranz.

At the annual New York concert of the Harvard Glee Club on Saturday evening, at Carnegie Hall, the club, consisting of one hundred voices, will be conducted by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, of the Harvard Music Department.

WALTER GOLDE
Who Will Remain in New York This Summer With His Class of Voice Students, and Conduct a Course of Instruction for Teachers of Singing.

Edwin Hughes will again conduct a master class for pianists in New York this summer. This will be Mr. Hughes' eighth consecutive summer session.

Announcement has just been made by The Ithaca Conservatory of Music of the engagement of Doris Nichols Holmes who will join the faculty as teacher of piano, and coach for accompanists and singers.

Mrs. Holmes recently returned from Paris, where she had been engaged in extensive study and professional accompanying. She is a graduate of the Conservatory, and was a member of the faculty for six years.

The following students have been selected from the senior class by the faculty of the Conservatory of Music and its affiliated school as honor students. From the Conservatory of Music, Arnold Putnam of Duluth, Minn.; Williams School of Expression and Dramatic Art, Lulu Garnett of Decatur, Ala.; Ithaca School of Physical Education, Gertrude Witzler of Perrysburg, O.; Institute of Public School Music, Dorothy Kerner of Ghent, N. Y.; Chautauqua and Lyceum Arts School, Bernice Ashburn of Gibbon, Neb.; Conway Band School, George Howard of Reamstown, Pa.; Martin Institute for Speech Correction, William Martin, Saltsburg, Pa.

Plans for the erection of the Lillian Nordica Memorial Building at Stony Point-on-the-Hudson, where the American Operatic and Allied Arts Foundation is erecting a music and art center, were furthered at a luncheon given Tuesday, April 7, at the Lido Venice, New York, by Eva Gauthier, chairman of the Nordica Memorial Committee. Substantial money donations were announced at this meeting and in addition announcement was made that Mme. Schoen-Rene and Mrs. William T. Carrington will each furnish a room in the Memorial building.

Cobina Wright pledged herself to the formation of a committee at Newport, where she will spend the summer, and Marguerite d'Alvarez suggested that all artists interested in the project should make an announcement of its aims from concert platforms this coming season.

The luncheon guests included, besides those already mentioned, Geraldine Hall, Mrs. Alfred C. Bossom, George P. Raymond, Walter K. Varney, and Havrah Hubbard. Telegrams were received from Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mme. Olive Fremstead, who were unable to be present but wished to pledge their support.

On April 8 Mme. Gauthier sailed on the Aquitania for a European tour in the course of which she will enlist the support of American artists, now living abroad, in the Nordica Memorial.

An annual spring concert was given in Town Hall on the evening of April 7 by the Music School Settlement. Under the direction of Melzar Chaffee, the program was provided by pupils of the school.

On the program were the junior orchestra, led by Fannie Levine; the senior orchestra; the Choral Club, led by Edmund Jahn; Louis Polansky; William Chosnyk; Anna Drittel, Emanuel Hirsch, and Stella Leff. An Adagio and Fugue for violin and viola written by Gertrude Price, a pupil, was played.

Pupils of William Fichandler were heard in a piano recital at Chickering Hall, New York, on April 5.

The sixth annual North Carolina Music Contest for High Schools will be held in the auditorium of the North Carolina College for Women in Greensboro, N. C., on April 23-24. In addition to the various contests, there will be a concert on the twenty-third by the Letz String Quartet and Arthur Shattuck.

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
11-12 Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

V. TREVISAN
VOCAL STUDIO
Chicago Civic Opera Association
74 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

ARTHUR J. HUBBARD — VINCENT V. HUBBARD
Teachers of Singing in All Its Branches
246 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, MASS.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephone: Circle 10117

HILDA GRACE GELLING
VOCAL STUDIO
128 West 72nd St., N. Y. City
Telephone Endicott 1587
ASSOCIATE TEACHER WITH PERCY RECTOR STEPHENS

TRANSCRIPTIONS which will be of interest to concert players as well as to students and teachers are included in the recent output of Carl Fischer, New York.

Mischa Elman, Bronislaw Huberman and Felix Winternitz are the editors of three arrangements for solo violin with piano accompaniment. Mr. Elman has edited an Etude Caprice of Rode, and the result of his work is a violin composition which combines pleasing musical content with potentiality as a vehicle for display of violinistic skill. It is a staccato scherzo, well rhythmed and melodically interesting. The piece is clearly and fully equipped with indications as to style, interpretation and dynamics.

Mr. Huberman's transcription is that of Chopin's G major Waltz, Opus 70, No. 1. He has played it often in his recitals. It is material for the skilled player. In the middle section the theme in thirds is played by the solo instrument, with the piano giving simply the rhythmic and harmonic outline.

A Minuet of Bach has been the subject of Mr. Winternitz' arrangement. It has grace of melody and simplicity. Mr. Winternitz has not embroidered upon the pure classic style. His piano accompaniment is in keeping with the spirit of the violin solo. Players of moderate ability have here a piece that will interest them, and be well within their powers, while the style of the work holds out problems for the advanced violinist.

J. Curwen & Sons, the English publishing house, have now an American branch under the title of Curwen, Inc. It is located at 1701 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. Among its varied issues Curwen promises shortly full scores of Carl Ruggles' Angels, songs of Henry Cowell, and Edgar Varese's Ameriques.

For school choruses G. Schirmer, New York, has published lately Eduardo Marzo's Starlight, a unison song, with second part ad lib.; A. Mary R. Dobson's What the Nightingale Sang, a two part canon for equal voices; and Louise Adolphe Coerne's In October, a four part chorus. All these issues are provided with piano accompaniment.

Schirmer publishes also the Second Chorus Book for Boys, compiled by Ella M. Probst and J. Victor Bergquist. The volume consists of over a hundred traditional favorites among American songs, arranged for four part chorus a cappella. It is good material for the elementary school singing class.

Intermezzo Sung in Prague

Prague.—Richard Strauss' opera, Intermezzo, had its first presentation here last month in the German Theatre with Anna Wolf-Ortnar and Joseph Hagen in the leading roles. According to one paper, "there could scarcely be a more perfect example of musical and dramatic combination."

JOSEF ADLER
Teacher of Piano
ACCOMPANIST
137 West 86th St. New York
Phone Schuyler 3580

Oratorio Society Sings Franck's Beatitudes

The Oratorio Society, assisted by an orchestra from the New York Symphony Society, presented Cesar Franck's Beatitudes in Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening under the direction of Albert Stoessel. The soloists were Ruth Rodgers, Esther Dale, Edna Indermaur, John Barclay, Martin Richardson, and Charles Trowbridge Tittman. The organist and accompanist was Hugh Porter.

Lawrence Gilman wrote in the Herald Tribune that The Beatitudes "is very nearly Franck at his worst." He found it music "of saccharine religiosity, tepid, tedious, lukewarm, conventional." According to Deems Taylor of the World "there are occasional passages of eloquence and great beauty, and the whole score radiates sincerity and fervor," but he did not feel that Franck had succeeded in his task.

The Sun writer observed that "it does not sound as impressive now as it did ten years ago." Olin Downes stated in the Times that "what is true and profound in this touching, uneven and sometimes noble work, what is undisguisedly Franck, shines like a halo above the unconscious derivations from the works of lesser men." On the other hand, Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) commented that the Franckian part of the score sounded yesterday much like "sentimental religiosity."

This reviewer remarked that the soloists "were eminently earnest in their contribution." Mr. Downes felt that Mr. Barclay was the best in regard to diction and eloquence of expression, and Lawrence Gilman said he distinguished himself by "his beautifully sensitive" delivery. Mr. Taylor agreed that he alone sang "with any great distinction or expressiveness." The Sun writer was of the same opinion, and he added that "the soloists were generally equal to their tasks." Mr. Downes said that Miss Rodgers gave a "conscientious interpretation" and that Miss Dale again proved herself an artist "of intelligence and authority."

Mr. Gilman wrote that the chorus "sang lustily and with devotion to the work in hand" and that Mr. Stoessel conducted "with his usual mastery and fullness of musical understanding." According to the Sun, "the chorus sang with much excellence of tone, good diction and proper phrasing" and the conductor "presided over the performance with skill." Deems Taylor wrote that "the chorus sang with fervor and generally accurate attack and intonation, although the tone quality of most sections left a good deal to be desired."

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

THOMAS DENYS,
Dutch Baritone, Who Made His American Debut as Soloist at the Performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion by the New York Philharmonic Society and the Schola Cantorum Saturday Evening.

Music of the Movies

The Easter week musical program at the Capitol Theatre this week includes a tableau and song, Come See The Place Where Jesus Lay, sung by William Robyn, Douglas Stanbury, and the Capitol singers. Mr. Rothafel introduces a new artist, Lottice Howell, coloratura soprano. The Capitol Orchestra is playing the Intermezzo from Cavalleria Rusticana.

Ponchielli's Dance of the Hours heads the orchestral program at the Rivoli Theatre. Miriam Lax, soprano, and Adrian da Silva, tenor are singing.

Another of the Famous Music Master series showing the important events in the life of Georg Friedrich Handel is being shown at the Rialto this week. Selections from his most noted compositions are played as accompaniment to the film by the Rialto Orchestra, directed by Hugo Riesenfeld and Willy Stahl. Gaston Dubois, cellist, plays Schravesande's Elegie.

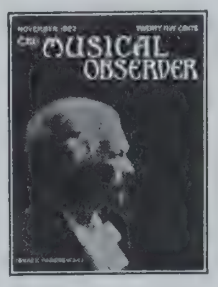
THERE may be question as to whether The Story of Irving Berlin, by Alexander Woollcott (published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York) is a book of musical interest, but there can be no question as to its reading interest.

There are two reasons for the fascination which it holds out to the reader who seeks sheer self-absorption in a book. The first is the intrinsic interest in the material itself. The story of a little foreign born boy serving drinks and entertaining in the back room of a Bowery saloon and then almost within a dozen years building a theatre and planning a venture whose initial cost ran nearly to a million dollars is irresistible.

That was the career of Irving Berlin. As a child he sold newspapers, crying his wares in the accent of a disreputable foreign dialect. As a youth (he is still nearer thirty than forty) his name is known all over the world, and his music is more widely circulated within a few months after its creation than Wagner's is yet.

Strictly speaking Berlin is not a musician. He is a minstrel, a popular entertainer whose voice modern wonders of communication can broadcast over the whole world in a few moments. His music is the music of popular monologue. It catches the fancy and it dies. But first it earns money. Its composer still cannot write down what he conceives.

The second reason for the fascination of The Story of Irving Berlin is the telling of the tale. The interest never lags. Mr. Woollcott, despite the paucity of his material—for the climax of Berlin's story comes too soon for a well constructed tale writes in a swiftly moving style which reflects his own wonder and enthusiasm in his subject. At times he is sentimental,—but then the book had first to run in a popular magazine.



This Coupon Is Worth 25c

LET'S GET ACQUAINTED!

If you are interested in a Music Magazine full of good, practical, interesting, novel reading matter and carefully selected musical compositions, mail this coupon with 25 cents and let us send you two issues of the MUSICAL OBSERVER.

THE MUSICAL OBSERVER CO.
62 COOPER SQUARE, N. Y. CITY

NAME .....ADDRESS .....
CITY .....STATE .....

The Cleveland Institute of Music
ERNEST BLOCH, Director
SIX WEEKS SUMMER SCHOOL JUNE 22—AUGUST 1
Complete courses in all branches of music under regular faculty
Master Class under ERNEST BLOCH
in Pedagogy, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form and Fugue
Master classes in piano, violin and cello under Beryl Rubinstein, Andre de Ribaupierre and Victor de Gomez
For Summer Catalogue write: Registrar, 2827 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Soprano Sings With Detroit Orchestra

Florence Easton Soloist With Gabrilowitsch; Bloch Novelty Offered.

Detroit, April 6.—Florence Easton sang Weber's Ocean Thou Mighty Monster and the aria of Fiordiligi from Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte as soloist at last week's pair of concerts of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting.

According to Charlotte M. Tarsney of the Free Press, with her voice of "brilliant quality and glorious volume" the singer "merited the splendid ovation accorded her." This writer went on to say that Mme. Easton "has practically every asset a singing artist could desire. She has a most engaging personality. Her stage presence is commanding. There is remarkable range and extremely lovely texture to her voice. Her diction is noteworthy and her enunciation so perfect that every word of her two big numbers could be most clearly understood."

Ralph Holmes wrote in the Times that she gave "a great exhibition of operatic bravura singing, revealing upper reaches that were amazing in their power and compelling in their shrill assertiveness." In the opinion of Cyril Arthur Player of the News, "her voice is remarkably fresh and unspoiled, and her art is fully developed." He commented, too, that Mme. Easton has "some of the sweetest middle tones to be heard anywhere," and concluded that, "however one may quarrel with the color of some of her tones, her range and brilliance of utterance remain startling enough."

Ernest Bloch's Three Jewish Poems and Tschaikowsky's The Tempest were the novelties of the occasion. Mr. Player found the former "interesting and instructive works without commanding any very deep inquisition of the soul." Charlotte Tarsney liked the distinctive "exotic touch" and oriental color of the poems as well as "the profundity of inspiration" which they show. She added that "they are numbers which impress through their sincerity, unique inspiration and thorough workmanship." Mr. Holmes wrote that the instrumentation is modern, but the outline formal.

This reviewer did not think The Tempest was Tschaikowsky at his best, lacking, as it does, his characteristic musical spontaneity. On the other hand, Mr. Player was greatly impressed with "the spontaneity of utterance" manifested in the composition as well as the "richness of contrasts and conciseness of ideas." Miss Tarsney commented on the color and rhythm of the work.

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
"Code of the West"
With TOM MOORE and PAULINE STARK
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
JACK LONDON'S
"ADVENTURE"
With TOM MOORE and PAULINE STARK
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

Hadley Re-engaged as Associate Conductor

HENRY HADLEY has been re-engaged as associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for next season, Clarence H. Mackay, chairman of the Philharmonic Society's board of directors, announced at the annual meeting of the Society held in the Chapter Hall of Carnegie Hall, April 6.

At the same meeting Charles Triller, Charles H. Sabin and Arthur Judson, the Philharmonic's manager, were elected directors of the Society for five years, and Frederick A. Juilliard, Nelson S. Spencer, Charles Triller, Clarence H. Mackay and Otto H. Kahn were elected trustees for one year.

New York Reviewers Find Scriabin's Prometheus Poor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first of its two final New York concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening. Scriabin's Prometheus was given with the assistance of the Cecilia Society of Boston and Alexander Lang Steinert, pianist.

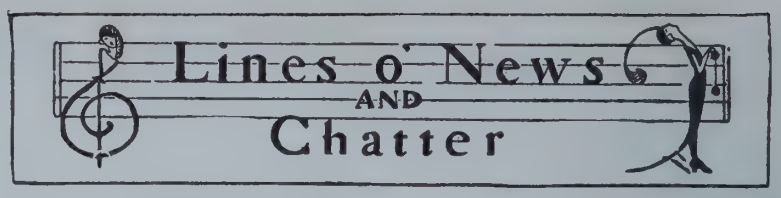
Deems Taylor of the World considered the poem "essentially flabby, almost effeminate music." He admired Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, the "amazing" playing of the trumpet solos by Mr. Mager and the "smoothness and skill" with which the choristers sang.

According to Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail), the conductor "lavished his famed vivacity and magnetism" on the work which was characterized by "poverty and an astonishing ugliness of musical material." Mr. Sanborn commended Mr. Steinert's "competence in the prominent and tricky music allotted to the piano." W. J. Henderson of the Sun agreed that the work "was admirably performed." He also found the music only "a curious muddle of unenlightened phrases and harmonic sequences."

The Post reviewer asserted that "conductor, orchestra and chorus gave a conscientious, intelligent and skillful performance of the composition," although he found the musical material unworthy of their efforts. Mr. Steinert, in his opinion, "performed his part with musicianly art and spirit." F. D. Perkins (Herald Tribune) wrote that there were "impressive" passages and periods "of considerable beauty," but "the substance seemed too small for the framework." Olin Downes of the Times lauded Mr. Steinert and the orchestra, but he added that Prometheus "is one of the poorest orchestral compositions that Scriabin produced."

Mr. Koussevitzky also conducted Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, the Brahms Variations on the Chorale St. Anthony and Borodin's Prince Igor Dances, in which the chorus again assisted.

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
"PROUD FLESH"
With ELEANOR BOARDMAN, TOM MOORE and PAULINE STARK
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps



Now comes a Chicago firm of managers of a loop theatre which believes that engaging Mme. Galli-Curci to appear there twice daily for one week would help business. No doubt. It just happened that Managers Evans and Salter had made previous arrangements for their prima donna, which made it somewhat difficult to consider the Chicago proposition.

* * *

A hoop skirt and an American singer, enacting Carmen at the Metropolitan, might make an interesting theme for a one minute skit. Voila!

* * *

What ho! Seems that Elias Hecht, of the San Francisco Chamber Music Society, can cook as well as make music. His guests at a recent Hecht informal evening testify to this.

* * *

Back home, aboard the Aquitania, came Boss Samuel Insull of the Chicago Opera, and all smiles.

* * *

Bobby Slack, the urbane Denver impresario, has been round New York town arranging for his 1925-26 attractions.

* * *

And Miss Margaret Rice, of Milwaukee, has been here and departed. But she'll be back soon.

* * *

Well, well; Freddie Schang, of the Metropolitan Musical Bureau, has discovered another New York Italian restaurant. "You should eat their green noodles," he declares, "a 'concussion' of cream of wheat and spinach." Information in detail will be furnished by Freddie on request.

* * *

The Hard Boiled Eggs' Club, consisting of some sixty-five newspapermen, were guests of Charles E. Davis and Harry Becker in an excursion to Hoboken Sunday morning. They left the Metropolitan Opera House at midnight on Saturday, and that's about all most of them remember. They were back in town in time to lead the Easter Parade on Fifth Avenue.

Almost the same group, this time with their respective wives, were at Mme. Elisabeth Rethberg's for tea Sunday afternoon.

* * *

For signs of spring read the daily sailing lists of ships going out of New York. Recent musical departees have been Mr. and Mrs. Pablo Casals, Cecilia Hansen and her husband and accompanist, Boris Zakharoff, Bruno Walter, and Michael Zacharewitsch, violinist.

* * *

Howard Hanson's symphonic poem, Lux Aeterna, was so well received in Los Angeles where the Philharmonic Orchestra played it under the direction of the composer, that Mr. Hanson has been asked to conduct there all his larger orchestral works, including Lux Aeterna, North and West, and the Nordic Symphony.

There's a boost for American music.

* * *

The Blue Ribbon Cafe is another place where musicians gather to eat and greet. Saluted there a week ago were Wanda Landowska, Pavel Ludikar, Riccardo Martin, Alexander Smallens, Leopold Godowsky, Henri Scott, Berthold Neuer and Andreas Dippel.

* * *

Three thousand persons paid $11,000 to hear Mme. Galli-Curci at Town Hall, Sydney, Australia . . . so cables Jack Salter to Larry Evans.

Somebody whispered to Lines-O'-Newser that Michael Bohnen, the Metropolitan Opera basso, received a letter of thanks from a well known beauty-clay concern for having unconsciously advertised its product by using it so conspicuously in his make-up as Mephistopheles in the recent performance of Faust. Bohnen's face was grey clayed to match the artist's costume.

* * *

The sartorial king of local impresarii, Robert Haynes Tarrant, of New Orleans, is now advocating crepe de chine handkerchiefs.

* * *

From Detroit last Thursday came Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, happy in his season's achievements and hopeful over the year to come.

* * *

Albert Coates was another visitor, pausing momentarily in New York before his Europewards journey . . . accompanied by Mrs. Coates. Although Mr. Coates is not to return next season to Rochester, he had some highly complimentary things to say of what has been achieved there orchestrally.

* * *

Congratulations have been pouring in upon William Andrews Clark, Jr., founder and president of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, on the occasion of his recent birthday anniversary.

* * *

Mrs. H. E. Talbott, Dayton's busiest person and envoy extraordinary of that city's Westminster Choir, was a recent New York visitor. She reports that organization is thriving and growing artistically in the ways it should.

* * *

El Paso has just said "How do you do?" to Mme. Frieda Hempel, who is en route to the Pacific coast to fill concert engagements.

* * *

And Saturday night next the Metropolitan's "Atlanta Special" will receive the opera company's artists who are to make the southern journey. Gioconda, with Mmes. Ponselle, Telva, and Gordon, and MM. Lauri-Volpi, Danise, Mardones and Maestro Serafin conducting, will open the season next Monday night.

* * *

Rufus Dewey, publicity representative, is back in New York after completing special work in Cleveland, Chicago and Detroit for the Chicago Opera Company and for the San Carlo organization.

* * *

Now that Easter Sunday is passed, there will be renewed activities in many quarters . . . to continue until the close of the current season.

* * *

One of the interested listeners and spectators in the Metropolitan's Good Friday representation of Parsifal was Tullio Serafin. He occupied a seat in the fourth row of the orchestra. After the final curtain he had some glowing words of commendation for Maestro Bodanzky and the members of the cast. Serafin will conduct Parsifal at Cleveland with the Metropolitan Opera and again at the Colon in Buenos Aires in July, with his wife, Mme. Elena Rakowska, appearing as Kundry.

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

The Love of Three Things
See Page 5

VOL. VII. NO. 27 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, APRIL 21, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

From a Sketch by Albert Steiner

Artur Bodanzky has been awarded for his conducting a great share of the credit for the success of the pretentious German opera schedule at the New York Metropolitan this season, including the first presentation of the entire Wagner Ring cycle there since the war.

Bulletins of News

Cincinnati, April 18.—The Cincinnati Orchestra, Fritz Reiner conductor, has been booked for three appearances with the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir, on March 11, 12 and 13, at the Toronto Festival next season. The orchestra will also be heard in Buffalo on this trip on March 10.

Detroit, April 18.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch has been re-engaged as conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra by unanimous vote of the executive board of the society. Victor Kolar has also been re-engaged and, on Mr. Gabrilowitsch's suggestion, his title has been changed from assistant conductor to associate conductor.

Next season Mr. Gabrilowitsch will conduct all but one pair of subscription concerts, one Sunday concert and all choral concerts; and Mr. Kolar will lead all but one of the Sunday concerts, one pair of subscription concerts, and the public school programs.

The Rubinstein Club of Washington, D. C., has announced that Louis Victor Saar of the Chicago Musical College, Chicago, Ill., has been awarded the prize for $100 offered by the Rubinstein Club for the best original composition written for female voices. The prize song will be included in the program of the Rubinstein Club for the final concert of the season on May 12.

Minneapolis, April 20.—The Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen conductor, left here last night for its seventeenth annual spring tour. Marie Tiffany, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has been engaged as soloist for the entire tour, and Gustave Tinlot, concertmaster, and Henry J. Williams, harpist, will be featured as soloists at many of the concerts.

Ernest Schelling, pianist-composer, and Arthur Train, author-lawyer, have disclosed that they are collaborating on an opera based on one of Mr. Train's stories, The Lost Gospel. Mr. Train sailed for Havre on the France Saturday and will be joined in Paris in a week by Mr. Schelling. Together they will travel through the Balkans, the Near East and parts of Egypt to get atmosphere for their opera.

The Management of the Metropolitan Opera Company yesterday confirmed the report that Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink will return to the Metropolitan stage next year where she made her American debut during the Spanish War. After nearly half a century on the public stage, the contralto will return to the opera to sing a few performances of some of her old favorite roles.

Munich Festival Set for August 1 to September 9

MUNICH, April 18.—(By Cable)—The Munich Festival, devoted to performances of operas of Wagner and Mozart, will commence on August 1 and end on Sept. 9.

Hans Knappertsbusch is the general director of the Festival. Assisting him in the conducting will be Richard Strauss, Robert Heger, and Karl Boehm. The performances will be divided between the Prince Regent Theatre, for the Wagner works, and the Residenz Theatre for the Mozart.

The opening and closing presentations will be Die Meistersinger. Also two Ring Cycles are planned, and performances of Parsifal and Tristan. The Mozart repertory will consist of Zauberfloete, Don Giovanni, Cosi Fan Tutte, Le Nozze di Figaro and Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail.

2,500 in Mass Meeting Demand Park Concerts

Speakers Decry Mayor's Action; Goldman's Band Plays.

Nearly 2,500 music lovers gathered in Carnegie Hall, New York, Friday night to protest against Mayor Hylan's action in refusing to renew the permit for the free Goldman Band concerts on the Mall in Central Park for this summer. A resolution was adopted authorizing William Branford Roulstone, chairman, to appoint a committee of fifty to memorialize the Mayor to co-operate in the restoration of the concerts.

A second resolution thanked Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim and Mr. and Mrs. Murry Guggenheim, "the generous donors," and Edwin Franko Goldman, the conductor, and deplored the affront offered the Guggenheims "by the manner in which the concerts were terminated."

An ovation greeted Mr. Goldman when he appeared on the stage and his band was cheered. In his short address he made no reference to the controversy except to say that the band and its sponsors, the Guggenheims, stood ready to resume the concerts if the Mayor would give his consent. The band played several selections.

The chairman of the Citizens' Committee, Mrs. Bella Zilberman, opened the meeting. William Bradford Roulstone, the next speaker, announced that the meeting was strictly non-partisan, and that during his discussion he would deal with facts and not criticize the Mayor.

Other speakers were Mrs. Thomas Slack, former president of the New York Women's Federated Clubs; Dr. Nathan Krass, Rabbi of Temple Emmanu-El; Dr. Charles Francis Potter, of the East Side Unitarian Church; Dr. Louis E. Bisch, formerly Professor of Psychology at Columbia; Baroness Katharine von Klenner, president of the National Opera Club; Mrs. Winifred Sackville Stoner and Anthony Mulieri, president of the Musical Mutual Protective Union.

Metropolitan Opera To Give New Ballet of Carpenter Next Season

Gatti-Casazza's Official Plans for 1925-26 Confirm Musical Digest Forecast.

FOUR OTHER NOVELTIES.

An American ballet never before produced is the most important addition in Mr. Gatti-Casazza's official announcement of the Metropolitan novelties and revivals for next season to the list forecasted in the issue of March 24 of The Musical Digest. The ballet is Skyscrapers, by John Alden Carpenter.

Mr. Gatti-Casazza has also announced that he has commissioned an American composer to write an opera expressly for the Metropolitan, but that the work would not be ready until the following season. The name of the composer was not given, but it is understood in musical circles that he is Deems Taylor, who may resign his position as musical critic of the New York World at the conclusion of this season to devote his time to composition. Mr. Taylor is known for his Through the Looking Glass Suite, his cantatas and shorter works.

In addition to Skyscrapers there will be four other novelties introduced at the Metropolitan next season. These are Le Rossignol, an opera in three scenes by Igor Stravinsky, which will be sung in French; de Falla's two-act opera in Spanish, La Vida Breve; La Cena delle Beffe, a musical setting of Benelli's play, The Jest, by Umberto Giordano; and a classical opera in three acts by Gaspare Spontini, La Vestale.

Six revivals have also been announced: Ravel's L'Heure Espagnole, Massenet's Don Quixote, Wolf-Ferrari's The Jewels of the Madonna, Puccini's Gianni Schicchi, The Barber of Bagdad by Peter Cornelius, and Smetana's The Bartered Bride. The least known of these operas is The Barber of Bagdad, which is also the oldest. It received its first American performance in 1890. The Bartered Bride was first produced in 1909 at the Metropolitan under Gustav Mahler's baton, with Emmy Destinn in the title part.

Goossens All Season in Rochester

Rochester, April 18.—Eugene Goossens will conduct the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra for the entire season of 1925-26. He will be released for a series of six concerts as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra on January 3, 7, 8, 10, 14, and 15. This announcement casts some uncertainty upon the recent report that Mr. Goossens would conduct half the season of the State Symphony Orchestra of New York.

Stravinsky Conducts in Rome

Rome, April 20.—Igor Stravinsky made his first appearance in Italy yesterday when he appeared as guest conductor with the Augusteum Orchestra.

Mengelberg Conducts St. Matthew Passion

Philharmonic Ends Season With Bach Work; Schola Cantorum and Soloists Praised.

Bach's St. Matthew's Passion was performed in Carnegie Hall on April 11 by the Philharmonic Society, Willem Mengelberg conducting, with the assistance of the Schola Cantorum and a chorus of boy sopranos from the Paulist School. It was repeated last Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The assisting artists of the first evening were Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano, Mabel Beddoe, contralto, (who substituted on twenty-four hours' notice for Sophie Braslau, who was indisposed); Lambert Murphy, tenor; Thomas Denys, a Dutch baritone brought here expressly to sing the role of Jesus; John Barclay, bass; Wanda Landowska, harpsichordist; Louis Robert, organist; Scipione Guidi, violinist; Bruno Labate, oboe d'amore; Georges Apchain, oboe d'amore; and John Amans, flutist.

Mme. Rethberg's performance, to quote Olin Downes of the Times, "has the beauty of tone she is able to bring to the sometimes angular passages of Bach, and a simplicity and honesty that allowed the music to speak for itself." Mr. Downes did not think it would be possible for the passages sung by Mr. Denys to be delivered "with finer musicianship and a deeper sincerity and pathos." He thought Mme. Landowska's harpsichord "astonishingly eloquent" and commended the other instrumentalists. He expressed the critical consensus when he said that Miss Beddoe "acquitted herself creditably" under the circumstances. This reviewer considered the chorus technically adequate, with "a strong emotional character" in many places.

* * *

W. J. Henderson of the Sun thought it one of "the most impressive" performances of the work given in years. He wrote that Mr. Denys proved "an artist of sound worth and able to treat his phrases with beauty and great dignity;" that Mme. Landowska's "fine skill was an item of much value in the performance;" and that the chorus "sang extremely well."

Writing of the soloists, Lawrence Gilman of the Herald Tribune observed that Mr. Denys sang "with unforgettable gravity and expressiveness, with beautiful dignity, without a trace of sob-stuff; he gave, in short, a masterly interpretation;" that Mme. Rethberg sang "with the tonal loveliness and vocal skill which are usual with her;" that Mr. Murphy handled his role "like the artist of skill and sensibility that he is;" and that Mr. Barclay delivered "with characteristic vividness the music of four contrasted roles." Mme. Landowska also received his praise, and the chorus, in his opinion, showed "a splendid vitality in its tone" as well as "precision and delicacy and a noble depth of color" although they lacked, at times, perfect balance.

* * *

It was one of the memorable events of the current musical season," to quote Charles Sawyer of the Post. Mr. Sawyer wrote that "for the most part, the work of choruses and soloists was excellent."

Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) mentioned that Mr. Denys "has a voice of impressive substance and power and he is complete master of this exacting music. He delivered it with a dignity, a carefully considered expression, and an artistic authority whose value could scarcely be overestimated." This reviewer thought that Mr. Murphy sang "with unsparing devotion, with unflagging courage, and, on occasion, with eminently fine effect." The beauty of the "sheer sound" of Mme. Rethberg's voice, in his opinion, could hardly have been surpassed.

Mr. Sawyer asserted that Mr. Mengelberg "did his full share to bring out the beauty and the grandeur of the Bach composition," and Mr. Henderson wrote that "the high honors of the concert, however, belong to Mr. Mengelberg, whose reading of the great work was moving and beautiful." Other reviewers wrote likewise.

At the repetition of the work on last Tuesday, Mildred Faas, soprano, took the place of Mme. Rethberg, who was obliged by the opera schedule to go to Philadelphia. Miss Faas showed herself a substitute "of immediate and ingratiating competence," according to Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail, and the Times reported that she sang the role competently. The Sun writer agreed, and the commentator of the Herald Tribune said that she sang with "ample expression, a tone of satisfactory volume and a generally clear, often soaring quality."

These were the final Philharmonic concerts of the season.

Metropolitan Opera Record for 1924-1925

FORTY-FOUR different operas and one ballet were on the schedule of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company this season.

The company opened its stay in Atlanta, Georgia, the first stop on its tour, last night. It is giving seven performances there. Then it will proceed to Cleveland, Ohio, to give ten performances and one special concert. The third and last city of the tour will be Rochester, N. Y., where two performances will be given.

The single ballet given this season was Petrouchka, a Russian work. The forty-four operas were divided as follows: Twenty-three in Italian, nine in French, and twelve in German.

There were 176 programs in all.

Fourteen double bills were given, and two benefit performances consisting of four acts from four separate operas.

Brooklyn performances during the season numbered ten.
Philadelphia performances during the season numbered eighteen.

On the 176 programs the performances were distributed as follows:

OPERAS IN ITALIAN

VERDI

Aida	5
Traviata	4
Trovatore	1
Falstaff	6
Rigoletto	6
	25

PUCCINI

Boheme	7
Madama Butterfly	5
Tosca	5
	17

DONIZETTI

Lucia di Lammermoor	5

LEONCAVALLO

Pagliacci	8

MASCAGNI

Cavalleria Rusticana	6

ROSSINI

Barbiere di Siviglia	3

MONTEMEZZI

Giovanni Gallurese	4

MOZART

Cosi Fan Tutte	2

LEONI

Oracolo	2

BOITO

Mefistofele	3

GIORDANO

Andrea Chenier	6
Fedora	5
	11

PONCHIELLI

Gioconda	7

MEYERBEER

Africana	4
Dinorah	2

FLOTOW

Marta	2

MOUSSORGSKY

Boris Godunoff	4

OPERAS IN FRENCH

GOUNOD

Faust	4
Romeo et Juliette	3

MASSENET

Thais	3

HALEVY

Juive	3

OFFENBACH

Contes d'Hoffmann	5

SAINT-SAENS

Samson et Dalila	3

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF

Coq d'Or	5

BIZET

Carmen	5

DEBUSSY

Pelleas et Melisande	4

OPERAS IN GERMAN

WAGNER

Meistersinger	5
Goetterdaemmerung	4
Rheingold	1
Walkuere	4
Lohengrin	6
Parsifal	3
Siegfried	2
Tannhaeuser	5
Tristan und Isolde	2
	32

JANECEK

Jenufa	5

WEBER

Freischuetz	5

STRAUSS

Rosenkavalier	2

BALLET

STRAVINSKY

Petrouchka	5

Prize Compositions Widely Representative

Six Winning Works in Rochester Competition Will Be Heard by Select Audience May 1.

Rochester, April 17.—The recently announced winning compositions in the contest held by the Eastman School of Music for young American composers are representative of widely separated parts of the United States. Aaron Copland and Bernard Rogers are from New York; George F. McKay from South Dakota; William Quincy Porter from Cleveland; and Adolph Weiss is a resident of this city.

Mr. Copland's work is a Cortege Macabre from an unnamed ballet. His Concerto for Organ and Orchestra was played this season by Nadia Boulanger with the Boston and New York Symphony Orchestras. George F. McKay, a former student of composition in the Eastman School and now a teacher in South Dakota, has named his composition (a short symphony) From the Black Hills.

The Cleveland representative, William Quincy Porter, is a teacher at the Cleveland Institute of Music and a student of Ernest Bloch. Bernard Rogers' contribution to the forthcoming program will be Soliloquy, a composition for flute and string orchestra. His Prelude to the Faithful was performed last year by the State Symphony Orchestra of New York under Josef Stransky's baton.

A tone poem, I Segreti, is the work submitted by Adolph Weiss. Mr. Weiss is first bassoon player in the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra and was a student in Albert Coates' class for orchestral conductors for two years.

The date of the concert by the Rochester Philharmonic when Howard Hanson will conduct these works has been changed from May 2 to May 1. In addition, there will be a first performance of a work by Donald Tweedy of the Eastern School faculty. Prominent music critics from various music centers of this country have been invited to attend both the concert and the five rehearsals which will precede it as guests of the Eastman School. Admission will be by invitation only.

New Russian Ballet Organized

Adolph Bolm will combine his Ballet Intime with Thamar Karsavina and her partner, Pierre Vladimiroff, it is announced. The Adolph Bolm-Thamar Karsavina company will make a transcontinental tour beginning January, 1926, under the management of the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau.

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

A New Note in Song-Recital Giving Charming Programs of Melodious Beethoven Songs—With Talks.
Management:
DANIEL MAYER, Aeolian Hall, New York City
FREEMANTEL

RUDOLF LAUBENTHAL
TENOR, METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
Haensel and Jones MANAGEMENT Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

Philadelphia Opera Series Ends

Metropolitan Bids Farewell With Aida; Easter Concert Given by Stokowski.

Philadelphia, April 17.—The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York concluded its season here at the Academy Tuesday evening with "one of the most brilliant performances of Aida that has been given here for many years," according to Sidney L. Laciar of the Public Ledger.

This reviewer added that, under "the inspiring baton of Mr. Serafin the opera moved with musical smoothness and splendid dramatic action from beginning to end." Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer, commented that Tullio Serafin conducted "with authority, and made the wonderful score pulsate with life." Other writers wrote in similar vein, and the North American reviewer reported that "everybody in the cast competed in vocal vigor and energetic acting."

Elisabeth Rethberg in the title role sang "with great beauty of tone, fine phrasing and, when needed, sufficient power to dominate the situation," to quote Mr. Muschamp. The Record commentator observed that Mme. Rethberg "has a voice that in some of its tones is velvety in quality and she is such a good artist that her acting was sufficiently fervid." The writer in the North American said that she sang "superbly, the volume and color of her voice making it one of the most notable sopranos of these times." Mr. Laciar asserted that she "possesses one of the finest voices that has appeared in this country for years" and that Oh, Patria Mia, "had such a rendition as has not been heard here within the memory of the present operatic generation. It was a veritable triumph of singing and interpretation."

The Radames was Giovanni Martinelli, who made his second appearance here since his illness. The North American writer considered him the "real conquering hero of the occasion." He was "superb" in the opinion of the Record, and his "splendid rendition" of Celeste Aida brought him a "real ovation." This writer added that "it was a stirring endeavor, brilliant in every way." Mr. Laciar did not find Mr. Martinelli in the "ultra-superb" voice of last week, but thought that he gave "a thoroughly satisfying interpretation" and did "some very beautiful singing." According to Mr. Muschamp, he again demonstrated his versatile talent.

This chronicler thought that Karin Branzell interpreted the part of Amneris "with intelligent appreciation" although her voice, "which is of remarkably fine tone quality in the upper part of her scale, gradually loses its firmness as it descends." The Record reported that she was impressive and sang "with much dramatic effectiveness." The observer in the North American thought that hers was a performance of "great cumulative power." As Mr. Laciar put it, "her magnificent voice and beautiful stately stage presence" were "ideal" for the role.

To further quote the Record review, Jose Mardones as the High Priest "was sonorous and dignified;" Paolo Ananian was "effective" as the King; Giuseppe Danise was praiseworthy; and Charlotte Ryan as the Priestess and Giordano Paltrinieri as the Messenger "added to the general merit of the performance." Mr. Mardones sang "with sonorous beauty;" in the words of the North American chronicler Mr. Danise sang "splendidly." Mr. Mardones was also lauded by Mr. Muschamp. Both Mr. Mardones and Mr. Danise, as well as the others in the cast, were highly commended by Mr. Laciar.

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra's Easter concert, conducted by Leopold Stokowski in the Academy Saturday night had on the program Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Russian Easter Overture, Rachmaninoff's The Island of the Dead, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and the Stokowski orchestration of the Bach Passascaglia in C minor.

According to the Record, it was "an eminently satisfying presentation of worthy music, admirably interpreted." Sidney Laciar considered the program "beautifully played" and thought the Bach "formed a fitting close to a well conceived and beautifully rendered program." Linton Martin of the North American also found it a "truly tremendous climax. . . . Its great, gothic architecture of tone seemed fairly to tower to the skies."

An innovation was presented at the concert by having the orchestra members all on the same level rather than in rising tiers as is customary. Mr. Martin did not think that the new arrangement enhanced the tonal quality of the orchestra, and Mr. Laciar commented that "there is a distinct gain in the ensemble effect of the orchestra by the new arrangement and a corresponding loss in brilliancy of tone." The Record reported that it "did not affect enjoyment."

Harry Farbman in Third Recital

Harry Farbman, violinist, gave his third New York recital of the season in Aeolian Hall Easter Sunday afternoon. He was accompanied by George Ashman. According to the Sun, Mr. Farbman "again showed evidence that he is one of the more talented and musicianly young men among the hosts of aspiring violinists who appeared in local concert halls this season." The Herald Tribune writer commented that he "showed a marked advance over his earlier appearances. He produced a tone of soaring quality and fullness."

Photo by Brunel

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY of the Joint Appearances of Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch Will Be Marked Next Season by a Special Tour Together of These Pianists Besides Their Solo Engagements.

Dohnanyi, Sailing, Tells Plans

Ernst von Dohnanyi, who will conduct the State Symphony Orchestra part of next season, sailed for England on the Cunard Liner, Columbus, Wednesday. After a piano recital and an appearance as soloist with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, Mr. Dohnanyi will go home in May to conduct the Budapest Philharmonic.

Arrangements have been made for guest conductors to take his place with the Budapest orchestra, which he has led for the past seven years as its president, while he is conducting the State Symphony here next season. Mr. Dohnanyi intends not only to introduce to New York Hungarian music by Bartok, Kodaly, Leo Weiner, and George Kosha, but to play many American compositions.

Will Proclaim Music Week

A series of official proclamations, both State and municipal, and possibly resulting eventually in a national proclamation, is promised on behalf of the National Music Week, May 3 to 9. For the first national observance, last May, proclamations were issued by the governors of Massachusetts, Ohio, Arkansas and Hawaii, and nearly 800 cities participated in the week's activities. It is expected that a great many more States and cities will be represented by proclamations for next May. Already the governors of Illinois and Mississippi have agreed to issue a proclamation.

Crowded Halls Greet Seattle Recitalists

Seattle, April 6.—Ernst Von Dohnanyi made an unusual impression upon the occasion of his first appearance in Seattle. He was greeted by a crowded house. The recital was held in the auditorium of Plymouth Church, and was sponsored by the Men's Club.

On the evening following the Dohnanyi recital Alfred Cortot played in the auditorium of the First Presbyterian Church, the concert being held under the auspices of the Men's Club. The large auditorium was well filled.

Fritz Kreisler's violin was heard by a thronged house. The Lalo Spanish Symphony was given the chief place on the program. The piano accompaniments were furnished by Carl Lamson.

Standing room was the word which greeted late-comers to the Roland Hayes recital. Mr. Hayes made a deep impression upon his audience at this, his first appearance in the city. Many request numbers and encores were given. Mr. William Lawrence furnished the accompaniments.

The concert was held in the Metropolitan Theatre under the management of Miss Margery Cowan.

The Music and Art Foundation Fund was responsible for the appearance of Royal Dadmun, baritone, on March 16. Mr. Dadmun was assisted by Sigfried Proger.

A newcomer, Peter Meremblum, Russian violinist, now associated with the Cornish School as head of the violin department, made his initial appearance before a large audience in the Spanish Ballroom of the Olympic Hotel on the evening of April 3. Mr. Meremblum was so well received that four more concerts are scheduled to take place in the near future.

The Seattle Musical Art Society presented the Armstrong Ensemble on the occasion of its Fourth Morning Musical. Two Brahms Sonatas and Handel's Passacaglia were given.

The Washington Federation of Music Clubs has just closed a three-day session at the Olympic Hotel. Mrs. Helen Crowe Snelling was elected president for the coming year. Mrs. Warren E. Thomas, president of the Oregon Federation was guest of honor and spoke in the interests of the biennial to be held in Portland in June.

H. G. S.

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

ALBERTO BIMBONI
VOCAL STUDIO
2025 Broadway, New York City
Telephone Endicott 6074

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

GIGLI

ROSA PONSELLE
Exclusive Management
NATIONAL CONCERTS, INC.
1451 Broadway—New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, APRIL 21, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 27

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.; Canada, $6.00; Foreign Countries, $7.00

Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

The Metropolitan Opera Season

Last Saturday's evening performance of Il Trovatore brought to its close the Metropolitan Opera Company's current New York season. Atlanta, Cleveland, and Rochester are to be visited during the next three weeks . . . as a sort of postlude. But when the curtain fell finally on the Verdi opera, and the throng streamed into Broadway, Thirty-ninth, and Fortieth streets, the brunt of the 1924-25 efforts had been borne.

The statistics published elsewhere in these columns attest to the magnitude of the Metropolitan's accomplishments during the past twenty-four consecutive weeks. That organization goes on, year after year, with its unvarying variety of repertoire, and its ceaseless activities. Eight, nine, and on occasion ten representations each seven days have been the Metropolitan's weekly quota. There has been no slackening of this killing pace, with its accompanying tension on the nerves of executives and performers—in all departments.

There is no doubt that the Metropolitan gives just a little more opera than can be given with a full measure of thorough and reasonably deliberate preparation. The artistic heads and the artists feel the pressure of haste, which is reflected in what the public hears and sees.

Recent seasons have witnessed an added responsibility shouldered by those in the foremost places in the Metropolitan organization. In order to make the two financial ends overlap (which is one of the requirements the management is forced to meet) the number of annual performances in New York has had to be increased. So, almost imperceptibly, has quantity poked its head into the scheme of things—to no good artistic advantage.

In the light of such a condition, coupled with the dearth of exceptional operas and opera principals, the task of Giulio Gatti-Casazza has been great. He has the public to please, his directors as well, and finally the professional critics. That he has achieved as much as he has is a tribute to his sagacity, his experience and his tact. Few positions are more trying than his and more thankless. No other impresario of whom we know could have disposed of that position with the skill Mr. Gatti has displayed. He has done what circumstances demanded, his best being better than the best another could have shown in his place.

If the Metropolitan were to be conducted on lines primarily artistic, and if no thought had to be given to a possible monetary deficit, a higher percentage mark could be reached. But Mr. Gatti has definite policies to maintain. He is to be congratulated for his success, holding to a necessarily charted course, in presenting so many admirable performances.

Each year the problem of opera-giving in New York becomes more difficult. There are long established standards impossible today to attain . . . with the material available and the half jaded tastes of the public to satisfy. The crest of operatic achievement was reached, so far as New York is concerned, some time ago. On that account Mr. Gatti is deserving of sympathy for his trials, and respect and praise for the way he has carried on.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

IT is said that the Philadelphia Orchestra will go abroad during 1926.

The virtuosity of the orchestra has by now become legendary in the United States, and its reputation has spread to the Continent too. It is interesting to speculate what effect its playing will have on Europeans.

I do not think its impression will be as completely favorable as we in the United States are likely to think. Its gorgeous tone, unexcelled team-work, its flexibility and balance, and the skill of its members will doubtless startle audiences abroad as they do here.

It is in the matter of the style of interpretation, as reflecting the musicianship of Leopold Stokowski, that the Philadelphia Orchestra may run foul of European traditions. In so far as they are based simply on habit these traditions have little importance, but when they are based on the composers' original scores, they are not negligible.

WE in the United States have already had various evidences of what one European attitude toward Stokowski and his orchestra may be. Serge Koussevitzky established in his concerts in London and Paris the reputation of being a sensational conductor. When he came to New York, musicians found it hard to detect the origins of this advance report. I think that the most important reason why he was not considered sensational was that we had been schooled by Stokowski particularly to a kind of sensationalism far more extreme than Europeans have yet witnessed in symphonic concerts.

In the past two seasons two visiting English reviewers have written fresh impressions of the Philadelphia Orchestra of the sort that it is likely to create abroad. After the first concert of the orchestra which he heard H. C. Colles wrote of the playing of the Rosamunde Overture of Schubert that it was brilliant, but he questioned whether it was Schubert.

This season Ernest Newman said of Stokowski's interpretation of Cesar Franck's Symphony that he had never been so dazzled by a performance of it before, but that he never had enjoyed one less.

THERE are a number of qualities of Leopold Stokowski's musicianship which give rise to such opinions. His technical skill as a leader is unsurpassed, but he often makes questionable use of it. He is apt to display the virtuosic qualities of his orchestra for their own sake. He likes to draw out of his men great and sweeping tone—beautiful tone, but too much of it—at times when restraint to an expressive mezzo-voce would much better suit the purpose of the composer.

In a sustained fortissimo chord, especially at the close of a composition, he likes to wrench his brass choir out of the ensemble, and capriciously to protrude it in a tremendous crescendo or sforzato whose only justification is his own imagination.

His choices of tempo are markedly individual. Stokowski has a bent for the brisk. His interpretations lack the repose which a moderated tempo and limited tone will give, and which music often requires. His orchestra is accustomed to play nervously, to lash itself suddenly into great climaxes, or to fade into infinitesimal pianissimos.

His rubato is unequalled among orchestral conductors in its freedom, and his phrasing has the individuality of the playing of a solo violin.

He favors rare tonal colors and the extremes of dynamics. His brasses have learned much about mutes from the better jazz orchestras. In Debussy's Fetes the muted trumpets played so quietly that they were overbalanced by the woodwinds! On the other hand the cellos, twelve in number, sit in front of the orchestra, and all the strings bow with extreme emphasis and consistently employ a full vibrato. His trumpets and trombones play with their bells high more of the time than is the case in other orchestras.

The virtue of it all is that Stokowski's orchestra is at his baton's tip. It does exactly in the minutest detail what he wants, and always it does it strikingly and well. The vice of it is perhaps dependent on taste. The playing is all of a style to which Europeans are not accustomed, and they may not receive it with the unqualified enthusiasm with which the Philadelphians are greeted at home and in New York.

CESAR FRANCK is most often among composers referred to as a mystic and religious spirit, and his Symphony is looked upon as an expression of reverence and devotion. I doubt that this would be the case if the life and personality of Franck were unknown, and if one were to judge the spirit of the Symphony, for example, simply from its text alone.

It has struck me more than once that, far from being serene music of the kind that associates itself in the mind with other worldliness; the D minor Symphony is for the most part distinctly dramatic, and in a few places even theatrical.

The religious connotation of the opening Lento is plain, but the sudden crescendo and repetition of the first motif in diminution (Allegro non troppo) are a purely dramatic device, one which aims—successfully enough—to catch the listener's breath. The four snapping wind chords in the third and fourth measures of this passage enhance the dramatic tensity. So do the chords before the repetition of the Lento, and so does also the entire repetition of the two passages a third higher than in their first version.

The third theme in the exposition of this movement, with its restless rhythm and brilliant orchestral color (dependent largely on the characteristic doubling of trumpets and strings on the main melody), are the dramatic Franck again.

On the other hand large parts of the second movement are apt to justify Franck's reputation as a mystic. The short woodwind passages which form the transition from the Allegretto to the scherzo part of the movement call for the adjective "heavenly."

With the fortissimo opening of the last movement, the persistent tremolo and the wind chords again, Franck casts aside the religious mood. His main theme here is actually jazzy, especially as it is developed to the climactic repetition, again with trumpets, strings, and woodwinds in unison and octaves on the theme, in the thirty-seventh measure of the movement. The preparation for the recapitulation (pages 135 and 136 of the Eulenberg miniature score) with its rhythmic figurations and rising sequences breathes the fire of the theatre and even of Tschaïkowsky.

All of which is no indication that Franck is likely to be loved the less for being of flesh and blood.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

The Love of Three Things

Opera, the Concert Stage, and the Home Share in the Versatile Affections of Madame Helen Stanley

FIFTY minutes from Broadway, in the hush of a semi-sylvan outpost of New York civilization, Madame Helen Stanley has her home. It is a delightful spot, where everyone enjoys in common the beauties of nature, and phonographs are separated by wide lawns. Here I found Madame Stanley in that happy interlude between engagements when she is neither prima donna nor recital artist, but just herself; and though it happened to be a day when the furnace had chosen to go out, this depressing fact could not dull the sheen of her smile.

"Home is home, be it ever so chilly," she shivered, leading me to where a log-fire burned busily on the hearth of the music-room.

Madame Stanley's smile has a way of putting one's words at ease, and leading the conversation into channels far removed from the labyrinthian regions of the prima donna complex. Although I did my best to introduce the subject of careers versus motherhood, or the husband's place in the home, Madame Stanley deftly avoided a definite statement, so that I came away without being able to tell what she thinks on these vital points.

But we did talk about opera, incidentally. Madame Stanley, it seems, loves her operatic work. She had just returned from Philadelphia where she had sung the role of Madame Butterfly with the Civic Opera Company.

"Which do I enjoy most, opera or concert? Both," was the uncompromising answer. "There is, of course, a greater artistic satisfaction in singing a recital program. You're entirely on your own then, and can't hide a shaky high C or a moribund low B beneath the din of the orchestra. No, I never want to give up my recital work. It keeps me vocally and artistically alert.

"On the other hand, I love the excitement and adventures of opera. It takes me out of the humdrum groove of myself. One evening I can play at being a princess, another time that I am a poor abandoned little Japanese wife. I can be Marguerite, Sieglinde, Mimi, Tosca, and let my soul revel in all sorts of reactions it never would know if it just lived a peaceful everyday life."

Incidentally there are thirty characters in as many operas whose trials and triumphs in four languages Madame Stanley can live at a few moments' notice.

"When I began my operatic career, it was in a stern school which paid scant respect to the untoiling lilies that did not spin. Everyone had to work constantly. My first engagement was with the Wurzburg Royal Opera Company in Germany. My impression when I signed my contract was that I was to sing lyric soprano roles, but I sang everything except bass and tenor. For instance, once when the other soprano was ill, I sang the part of Carmen, though my part is Micaela. Another time I sang the successive roles of Olympia, Giulietta, and Antonia in the Tales of Hoffmann, all in the same evening. That is what you call 'getting experience and routine.' When at last Andreas Dippel rescued me and engaged me for his Philadelphia Chicago Opera Company, I had an experience that ranged the entire scale from mezzo to lyric."

MADAME HELEN STANLEY

Opera in English will come in time, is Madame Stanley's belief. "There is really no logical excuse that has yet been given for not having opera in English. You hear people say that opera should be given in the original, but where does one ever hear all operas consistently in the original? In Germany the libretto has to be translated into German. The same holds good for the language of the country in France and Italy."

During the season between her activities as concert and operatic artist, Madame Stanley has little time to enjoy her family and her home. For instance, when I visited her she was making preparations to leave for her fourth visit to the Pacific Coast where she is to appear in the San Francisco Festival.

"And I'm a very domestic person, in spite of the fact that I love my career, too," Madame Stanley protested. "But perhaps that makes the joy of having a home all the more intense," she observed philosophically. "If you spread happiness over three hundred and sixty-five days, it won't spread so thick as when you use it all for a limited period of time."

Speaking of domesticity, the servant problem, it seems, is not actively in eruption in Madame Stanley's home, though one never can tell when it might erupt.

"The slogan of most cooks is, 'If eventually, why not now,' so I never feel like boasting too soon of my good fortune," was her remark. "The trouble with cooks is, I think, that their art has never been accorded its rightful place with the other arts. All the world's praise has been spent for a well-turned sonnet, but, save for the fair words of a few gourmets, the birth of a sauce is passed over in silence. Somehow, aesthetes regard food as a vulgar necessity, and never stop to realize that it is as capable of soothing the savage beast as is music. According to a certain doctor, it has a lot to do with religion."

"With religion?"

"Yes. He said that creeds were determined by the biliary duct, and that liver complaint engendered Calvinism, whereas if you had a good organ, you just naturally tend to be a Unitarian. Emerson quotes him in one of his essays. Personally I know I should become a confirmed agnostic on delicatessen food."

The ardor of the reformist was now burning in Madame Stanley's blue eyes. "I believe that political as well as domestic unrest is largely due to food—I mean poor food. Caesar, you remember, didn't want any lean and hungry men about him, and neither does a woman want a lean and hungry man prowling eternally about the icebox. Even life-insurance agents recognize the value of the after-lunch call. So who will not say that cooking is one of the fine arts?"

"And yet," I objected. "I'd rather be a singer than a cook. I'd rather sing to souls than to roast over a hot range for them."

"Oh, as far as that goes, the singer gets roasted sometimes. What about the critics?"

I offered a disparaging opinion about critics.

"I can't agree with you there," said Madame Stanley. "An artist often gets from the total of critical opinion a fair impression of his work, something he never could gain from his friends. Poor critics, their life is a hard one, when you stop to realize it. Imagine waking every morning to a world wherein sixty out of every hundren performers are anathematizing your name and longing to poison your morning coffee. I'm afraid the critic is as misunderstood as the cook."

The chimes of the Dresden china clock on the mantel announced the hour of tea. As if by magic a maid appeared at the door and rolled the tea-wagon to where we were sitting beside the open fire. Madame Stanley, in the role of charming hostess, dispensed cheer in shell-like cups. The blazing logs luxuriated warmth. It was that witching hour when one's soul expands in silent communion with its fellow soul. Such matchless moments are not for the inquisitorial interview—and this is an interview.

E. D.

MAY KORB
Lyric Coloratura Soprano
Exclusive Management
R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

Elisabeth Rothberg
SOPRANO
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
FISK BLDG. NEW YORK
PACKARD BLDG. PHILA., PA.
BRUNSWICK RECORDS
HARDMAN PIANO

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. New York City
Telephone Circle 8815

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

GEORGE PERKINS RAYMOND
Tenor
CONCERT—RECITAL—ORATORIO
Exclusive management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

CLARA
Clemens

Mezzo Soprano

Portrait by Maurice Goldberg.

Available for Season 1925-26

Also in joint-recitals for Young People
With Guy Mayer, Pianist

Management
DANIEL MAYER
Aeolian Hall, New York

Mason and Hamlin Piano

CHARLES
Naegele

"A Pianist of decided individuality"
(New York Telegram-Mail)

"An American pianist of outstanding ability."
—Manchester Guardian (England).

"He had a well-considered scheme of music making, . . . always musicianly in character and finished in execution. He had a large audience and there was no mistaking its admiration."
—New York American.

"Mr. Naegele has the unusual gift of individual interpretation which is still faithful to the spirit of the music."
—New York World.

"He proved himself master of the long-drawn line."
—Boston Transcript.

© Amemiya

Exclusive Management
DANIEL MAYER
Aeolian Hall, New York

Mr. Naegele Uses the Baldwin Piano

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

A CABLED DISPATCH from Paris states that Mme. Ganna Walska purposes to sue for libel the several hundred United States newspapers which published a story to the effect that she had been forbidden by the mayor of Nice to appear in further performances at the opera house there—following one endeavor which is said to have been about on a par with other Ganna Walska operatic endeavors.

According to this latest dispatch (how many come to this country touching on the affairs of the Polish celebrity?) her Paris attorney is quoted as having remarked that the articles anent Mme. Walska "undoubtedly were caused by professional prejudice against her."

That man must be the recipient of an honorable-sized fee to drop such a comment. Possibly he never heard Mme. Walska sing. If he hasn't, he should; then he may experience a change of mind about Nice's mayor's instructions . . . if indeed they ever were issued. That is the strange part about cabled dispatches to United States newspapers on matters musical. The correspondents are apt to get mixed up.

RARELY does such a correspondent know much about singers, singing, or anything else relating to music. He is inclined to "make news," and to array the facts to suit himself. When facts are a bit shy there are correspondents who are not above supplying their own. It has been a habit with them for a long time, and seems to have become a part of their tradition, to be handed on down from generation to succeeding generation. In brief: to be a good foreign correspondent you have got to mix up your dispatches on topics musical.

Pick out some fine singer and call him "great," or a fine one and term him "rotten." It doesn't particularly matter to some foreign correspondents.. They even file dispatches about "successes" that don't amount to a pinch of snuff. They always have and they always will. The situation is further aggravated by the cable editors of our daily newspapers, who are in the same class musically with the foreign correspondents, and who appear to be hypnotized by some piece of advice coming from the other side.

I don't wish to be misunderstod. I am filing no brief for Mme. Walska. The Musical Digest printed something about the mayor of Nice and Mme. Walska. This music newspaper is well aware of Mme. Walska's vocal and operatic abilities as displayed in public. The writer heard and saw her Gilda in the never-to-be-forgotten representation of Rigoletto, in Paris, when Mme. Walska enlightened an audience which packed the Paris Opera . . . hired for a benefit to which Mme. Walska contributed, it is said, several thousand dollars.

LET Mme. Walska's attorney bring his libel suits. To be libeled, as it is generally understood, a publication must hold up to ridicule and scorn, and injure the reputation, of the person libeled. Did the newspapers do this? Or was it Mme. Walska, by her strange singing and equally strange insistence on singing (publicly, be it noted—no one can dispute her right to sing in her own room if she chooses to do so)?

Mme. Walska had better avoid appearing in court in any such matter as undertaking to establish the excellence of her vocal and artistic abilities. Unless, of course, her main objective is to gain notoriety. If that is what she seeks, then by all means let the libel suits proceed. They ought to produce material for more stories about Mme. Walska, which will be welcomed by those who are fed up on the more serious matters of the day.

Many of us would like to know who Mme. Walska's attorney has in mind when he observes that there is professional prejudice against her. There is no prejudice which I can conceive of. What does exist is a feeling amongst worthy singers that they are more rightfully entitled to public appearances in serious opera representations than the wife of Harold McCormick, who commands the means for making

And just one thing more, before this bit of comment is brought to a close. Mme. Walska, it is said, is regarded abroad as an "American" singer. She is mentioned as being referred to as an "American" singer. She isn't American. She is a foreigner, a Pole it is generally understood. Her marriage to the bona fide American does not make her an American, as genuine Americans recognize that word. To be that one has to be born here; and to have spent enough years in this country to reflect the spirit and the ways of its natives.

No, Mme. Walska—whatever her legal citizenship through marriage may be—is not what we regard as an American. Europeans should not view her as that. She should not be classed with "American singers." Nor should her public appearances be labeled as "triumphs"—notwithstanding such assertions as are being made for the lady in advertisements in music journals which are willing to print them (which this journal is not).

WHAT MANNER of daily newspaper editors have we in New York? If they were to treat other important world news as they do music happenings our information would be more confusing even than it is. That was a ridiculous story printed a few days ago by the Times and the other papers that let the press agent in at the front gate.

The pith of the story concerned a young woman who was alleged to be the very last pupil accepted by the late Jean de Reszke. Several days after the death of the tenor this young woman's teacher—or the young woman herself, I don't know which—hired a press agent to send out a yarn about the teacher's despair that Jean de Reszke's death made it well nigh impossible to find in all Europe another equally able instructor of singing.

Daily newspapers which command the services of competent editors might consult them when such a story as the one in question reaches a city editor's desk. The New York teacher who has gone abroad with his pupil to seek a new master for her may hold the opinion that de Reszke was the best in his field, and that he had no equals—in Europe, at least.

There are, however, others who do not share that belief. One need not go far to discover persons capable of speaking who believe that de Reszke was a far greater singer than he was teacher. These very same persons also contend that there are in this country teachers who are his equals. Also teachers who are superior to him in guiding aright the singing voice.

THE GLAMOR of a name is often deceiving. Prestige in one line now and again covers deficiencies in another, the teaching of singing is one of them. Jean de Reszke developed some splendid singers. But he turned out, also a far larger number of poor ones.

It is true likewise of other notable singers, who, their voices failing, devoted themselves thereafter to a craft with which they were not acquainted and which they have never since learned. Why is it so easy, some folks ask, to pull the wool over the eyes of the pupils and their parents, and their friends? The answer is simple. Most of them do not know what constitutes a fine teacher of singing, and how to determine the measure of his worth.

The singing problem is a sorry one. What is quite as deplorable is that there are no signs that it soon will be corrected. We have organizations which are striving to spread enlightenment; we have, unquestionably, a considerable array of conscientious and splendidly equipped teachers—women as well as men—yet the same disputes go on as to what shall be done and how. And the same differences of opinion concerning vocal excellences and faults. Likewise, the same quantity output of mediocre singers.

Bel canto is not a lost art. Some professional singers have it; some teachers know how to impart to others their knowledge of its acquirement. Yet one thing is certain, beyond the shadow of a doubt: the capacity to recognize the teacher who possesses it, and the capacity, further, to learn to sing in the manner of those great artists of other days are pure matters of aptitude, vocal intelligence, industry, and patience. The dearth of great singers of today is due to the absence, in the majority of singing candidates, of one or more than one of the foregoing qualities.

But don't blame the teacher. He cannot do the singing for the singer. Nor can he restrain impatience, or impart perceptiveness where it dwelleth not. Neither can he make a shoemaker sing. By the same token, the finest singing talent may go all wrong in the hands of a celebrity who attracts pupils on the strength of a name won on the opera or concert platform. Most of our ablest teachers of singing did not make singing careers—and it holds true in both the United States and Europe, now as formerly.

MY FRIEND Giulio Gatti-Casazza will depart shortly for Europe, there to look about for new principal singers and a new opera or two. A few weeks of such effort and he will go to his summer home in Italy for a thoroughly earned rest.

Don Giulio is the emperor of impresarios. None other has had such a career. His wisdom is a proved thing; and long after he retires his name will be uttered admiringly, just as his achievements will be pointed out as the foremost in the art.

Under his regime the New York Metropolitan company has given the most perfect specimens of great representations which that institution has shown. Mr. Gatti did these things with fewer great principals than were available during Maurice Grau's Metropolitan directorship. He raised the standard of ensemble, of mise-en-scene. He brought here a conductor who probably will stand for years, as the greatest in his art.

Since the autumn of 1908 Mr. Gatti has bestowed upon his labors a discerning mind and the desire to have his efforts satisfy the greatest number of people he could. His post has been, and still is, filled with trials and annoyances which unsettle nerves and patience. But Don Giulio keeps on, outwardly unperturbed.

The past few years of Metropolitan opera have witnessed lapses in certain directions, chiefly amongst the leading singers. There are some, fortunately, still to be heard at the Metropolitan. A number of those are not young. The question which naturally arises is: Who will fill their places?

DON GIULIO himself cannot answer that question, for he does not know. Neither does any other man. One fact alone is patent, with the abundance of fine voices everywhere to be found there are fewer great singers available today for opera than there were a dozen years ago.

Since the backbone of opera in such an institution as the Metropolitan is its leading artists the situation is one to be regarded with alarm. It is a situation, moreover, which calls for keener efforts than ever on Mr. Gatti's part to look into thoroughly the abilities of all singers who may have abilities entitling them to a Metropolitan engagement.

Considerable criticism is to be heard about the politics said to prevail in the Metropolitan. Much of it is mere hearsay, and stories which fly about are known to be exaggerated. Yet to deny that politics does exist in the Metropolitan would not be in keeping with the truth. Every opera house has its cliques, and none, in all likelihood, ever will be free from them. They exist amongst the artists, the conductors, and other members of an opera house staff; and you will find them hanging about the edges of such a place, broken up, invariably, into groups which form a part of the smart set.

THE SEASON concluded last week at the Metropolitan was in the main of about the same artistic level of the two seasons immediately preceding. The revival of the Nibelungen Ring, the presentation of Pelleas et Melisande, the introduction of Maestro Serafin, and certain other touches here and there provided high lights which were not present in the year that went before.

Mr. Bodanzky commanded admiration for some splendidly performed tasks, and Gennaro Papi rose up now and again to make his presence felt. Messrs. von Wymetal and Thewman disclosed their qualities, Mr. Agnini labored faithfully, and those leading singers who are too well known to require mention here even succeeded in surpassing most of their previous best efforts.

But—some of the singers, a new one or two—should never have been engaged by the Metropolitan management. There may be excuses, yet I can name artists who deserve to have stood in their places.

Mr. Gatti is an able man, and he strives, I am sure, to be just. Since the problem of leading singers is undeniably the main one which now confronts the Metropolitan I should like to see an absolutely unprejudiced effort to treat impartially every singer who may be eligible for a hearing. The time has come to sweep aside any existing preference or prejudice. If the Metropolitan is to carry on it has got to search out and find the best, and then see that it has a fair chance . . . free from any interference from within the organization, once it gets inside the opera house.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

Parsifal

According to its annual custom the Metropolitan Opera Company presented a Good Friday performance of Parsifal on the afternoon of April 10. Although he was ill with a fever, Curt Taucher sang the title role. Larsen-Todsen was heard for the first time in this country, and for the first time anywhere in German, as Kundry, and Michael Bohnen was the Gurnemanz. Clarence Whitehill was Amfortas, and Mr. Didur, Klingsor. Artur Bodanzky conducted. The remainder of the cast was familiar.

"The impersonation of Kundry," according to Herbert Peyser of the Telegram-Mail, "proved to be one of Mme. Larsen-Todsen's best, and, indeed, one of the most consistent, intelligently planned, and vocally satisfying Kundrys exhibited here in a considerable time."

Considering his illness, wrote the Sun reviewer, Mr. Taucher "acquitted himself with great credit." A chorus man took the tenor's place to stand in silence during the first Grail Scene. This reviewer wrote that Mme. Larsen-Todsen "was more at home in this music than in some other that she has sung here." He found Mr. Bohnen's the "most prominent" impersonation.

Deems Taylor, writing in the World, considered Mr. Taucher's performance, "considering his weakened condition, amazingly good, both vocally and dramatically." He thought Mme. Larsen-Todsen "an unusually striking" figure in the Garden Scene, and added that she "sang with expressiveness and imagination throughout."

In the opinion of Lawrence Gilman, reviewer of the Herald Tribune, Mme. Larsen-Todsen "sang much of her music with beauty and significance," although he felt that her conception of Kundry is "still in process of elaboration." The most important figure of the afternoon, in his opinion, was Mr. Bohnen, of whose performance he said, "This is not only by all odds the finest Gurnemanz I have ever seen, but it is one of the greatest performances of a Wagner role in my experience. . . . Yesterday he was a great artist, greatly occupied."

Max Rosen

Max Rosen gave his second violin recital of the season in Carnegie Hall on the evening of April 10. Richard Wilens was his accompanist. He played Nardini's E minor Concerto and Dvorak's in A minor, together with several shorter pieces.

Mr. Rosen played well, in the words of the Herald Tribune chronicler, "especially in sustained passages, where his tone had a notable polish and full, fluent quality. The Times reported that he "successfully overcame an atmosphere unfriendly to fiddle strings." According to the Sun, his performance of the two Concertos was "of uneven merit." His tone was good in cantabile passages, wrote this reviewer, "though apt to lose body in more rapid and difficult work. His introduction was praiseworthy. His general style showed temperament, but it was not at all times finished."

De Pachmann's Farewell

Closing a concert career here of thirty-four years Vladimir de Pachmann appeared in his American farewell in an all-Chopin recital at Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening of April 13. The audience filled the house and part of the stage.

Olin Downes in the Times reported that Mr. de Pachmann's playing was irregular. He called the interpretation of the B flat minor Scherzo "balderdash," but summed up in his review as follows: "When Mr. de Pachmann is greatest the listener is under the spell of music which seems to have escaped human thralldom; music of a charmed rhythmic life; song that floats on the air with a delicious grace and waywardness past the telling."

Attention was called by W. J. Henderson (Sun) in his review to the fact that thirteen years ago also Mr. de Pachmann gave an American "farewell" concert. He added, "Whatever Mr. de Pachmann's failings in regard to the greater Chopin, the velvet quality of his tone, the extreme delicacy of his touch, and the sensitive susceptibility and clarity of technic revealed by this octogenarian remain talents to marvel at."

"In general," reported the writer of the Herald Tribune, "Mr. de Pachmann was in notable form" in his last recital, although this review raised the question as to whether the pianist's performance might not better be called lecture-recitals. This reviewer also pointed out the playful spirit in which the recitalist handled the Scherzo, although in the Preludes, Etudes, G minor Ballade, and E flat minor Polonaise, and the other numbers on the program he found all of Mr. de Pachmann's better characteristics: "His remarkable fleetness of finger, liquid runs, and polished, song-like tone."

Other newspapers did not report the concert analytically.

Miss Ruth Dale

A recital in costume was given by Ruth Dale, soprano, at Aeolian Hall, New York, Wednesday night. According to the Herald Tribune, Miss Dale "possesses a voice of good size and fluent quality, but her interpretation seemed to depend, for its expressiveness, upon costume, facial expression and gesture."

The Sun reported that she was "quite successful in this light form of entertainment, for her voice, fresh in tone and color, was used with skill and its qualities were well adapted to the program she offered." The writer in the Times asserted that she "won her audience by a sweet and tuneful voice and a certain dramatic ability." On her program were songs by Carrie Jacobs-Bond, Richard Hageman, Liza Lehman, Charles Gilbert Spross, who was her accompanist, and others.

Theodore Takaroff

A fifteen year old violinist, Theodore Takaroff, appeared in recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, April 10. The Times reported that he displayed "a steady and fluent technique. His double stopping and cadenzas were particularly good. The unaccompanied Sonata of Bach gave him some difficult moments, but he surmounted these and played the presto with spirited freedom."

His program opened with the Mozart D major Concerto and included numbers by Beethoven, Burleigh, Gluck, and Sarasate. In the first number, Jacques Malkin assisted him at the piano.

By the Sun writer Mr. Takaroff was advised to "continue his studies and eschew recital platforms for many moons" although this reviewer commended his talent. Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail was of more or less the same opinion. However, the Herald Tribune commentator mentioned that the violinist, "while somewhat handicapped by the effect of the dampness upon his strings, and the need for frequent tuning, showed talent; a well developed technique and a tone of satisfactory size, generally smooth, but with a rather drier quality in some display passages."

Washington Heights Club

The Washington Heights Musical Club gave a concert in Aeolian Hall, New York, last Tuesday evening for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H. The assisting soloists were Marjorie Meyer, soprano; Eliot Griffis, composer-pianist; and Robert Lowrey, pianist.

Miss Meyer sang a group of MacDowell songs, a set of six lyrics by Mr. Griffis, and other groups of German Lieder, old Italian airs, and American songs. Mr. Griffis played his own Sonata in A flat, and Mr. Lowrey added numbers by Chopin and Debussy.

According to the Sun, Miss Meyer sang the MacDowell songs "with much taste and charm" and "deserved much praise for her delivery of the lyrics. She brought out all their musical content and her singing of them merited the approval she won." The Herald Tribune reviewer wrote that she sang "with a voice of agreeable timbre, clearness and fluency marking her tone for the most part, though its surface was not entirely free from an occasional ruffle." Frederic Persson, as guest artist, accompanied Miss Meyer.

Friends of Music

Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice was presented in concert form at the final concert of the season given by Friends of Music, Artur Bodanzky conductor, in Town Hall on April 12. The soloists were Mmes. Charles Cahier, Marie Sundelius and Queena Mario.

According to Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail, Mme. Cahier delivered the music of Orpheus "in commendable style and with the seasoned authority of her long experience." The writer in the Herald Tribune commented that she "gave an expressive performance, bringing out a wide range of dramatic feeling. At first her singing had an occasionally vibratory tone, but these incursions of tremolo disappeared in the last act, which was marked by increased volume of tone and intensity." The Sun reviewer said she sang with "plenty of expression and commendable understanding," but he too referred to the tremolo. Olin Downes wrote in the Times that Mme. Cahier "once more showed how considerably intelligence and artistic mastery can surmount physical obstacles in performance."

The Herald Tribune reported that Mme. Sundelius' singing was marked by "clarity and steadiness of tone" and that Miss Mario's performance was "distinctly commendable." According to the Sun, Mme. Sundelius was "more than adequate as Euridice" using her voice well "although its natural quality did not display all the emotional and dramatic warmth that is desirable in the role." This commentator found Miss Mario "altogether admirable." Mr. Downes wrote that Mme. Sundelius "sang somewhat unevenly, but at her best did much for the composer by means of a good legato and unforced style."

Mr. Downes observed that "the continuity of the opera was necessarily lost yesterday on account of the cuts." The chorus "sang with precision," according to the Herald Tribune, and in the Sun it was reported that they sang "with great spirit and kept to the pitch." Mr. Bodanzky was commended for his part in the performance.

PERSIS COX
Pianist and Teacher
Address: Pierce Building, Copley Sq., Boston, Mass.; or
Dana Hall, Wellesley, Mass.
Baldwin Piano Welte-Mignon Records

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

CLARENCE ADLER
PIANIST
Instruction for Advanced Pupils
137 West 86th St. Telephone
New York Schuyler 3580

Mme. Marie Gabrielle LESCHETIZKY
WILL CONDUCT MASTER CLASSES THIS SUMMER IN PARIS AT ECOLE LESCHETIZKY, 76, AVENUE MALAKOFF
RECITAL TOUR 1925-26 NOW BOOKING
Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, 250 West 57th St., New York

ALLEN McQUHAE
TENOR
RECITALS—ORATORIOS—ORCHESTRAS
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Bldg., 57th St. & B'way, N. Y. C.
Brunswick Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1924
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

ANNA FITZIU
SOPRANO
Management: R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

Beethoven Association

In the sixth and last concert of the season of the Beethoven Association in Aeolian Hall, New York, on the evening of April 13, the assisting artists were Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, who played Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, Jascha Heifetz and Mischa Levitzki, who played Mozart's B flat Sonata for violin and piano, and Sascha Jacobsen, violinist, Nicholas Moldavan, violist, and William Willeke and Percy Such, cellists, who together with Mr. Heifetz played the Schubert String Quintet in C major.

Of the playing of Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, the Times report said, "With her poetic coloring an electrically dramatic spirit went hand in hand. She displayed astonishing technical command, a virtuoso spirit, and the white-hot temperament which has distinguished her among pianists for many years."

Mr. Henderson wrote in the Sun, "One heard again her mellow tenderness of tone, her finished clarity of enunciation, her sense of balance and proportion. And her interpretation retained much of the old time charm and imaginative quality." The Herald Tribune reviewer throught also that the veteran pianist displayed her characteristic form.

This reviewer found Messrs. Heifetz and Levitzki "an excellent team, with notable balance and laudable unity." Although he felt that the piano was not sufficiently subordinated in parts of the first movement of the Sonata Mr. Henderson found later "a performance which published unaffectedly and brilliantly the spontaneous beauty of Mozart's composition."

The Times and Post chroniclers wrote likewise, and all the reviewers were agreed that in the Schubert Quintet, "with such an array of interpreters Schubert found himself in ideal companionship" (Times). The audiences filled the hall and part of the stage.

New York Banks' Glee Club

The New York Banks' Glee Club, Bruno Huhn conductor, gave the second and last concert of its forty-sixth season in Carnegie Hall, New York, Wednesday evening. The assisting artists were Doris Doe, contralto, Marie Romaet-Rosanoff, cellist, Dr. J. Christopher Marks, organist, William J. Falk, and Carroll Hollister, accompanists.

According to the writer in the Times, Miss Doe displayed a voice "of exceptional timbre and range" and Mrs. Romaet-Rosanoff exhibited "a beautiful tone and easy command of her instrument." This reviewer thought the men's chorus of over sixty voices "gave a good account of themselves. . . . Brisk timing, clean attacks and neatly clipped endings marked the verses and as a rule the words could be clearly heard. The singers entered into the spirit of the choruses and gave them with ardent enjoyment and a palpable swing."

The Herald Tribune chronicler commented that "the singers showed their admirable choral training in many well chosen compositions."

Boston Symphony

With his tenth concert of the season in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of April 11, Serge Koussevitzky ended his first and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-ninth New York season. Scriabin's Prometheus and Borodin's Polovetskian Dances, both presented with the aid of the Cecilia Society chorus, were repeated from the program of the preceding Thursday.

The new numbers on the program were Respighi's free transcription for orchestra of four old Italian dances and airs for the lute, and the Debussy Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes.

"It was," said the Post reviewer, "one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most brilliant and most successful concerts in a somewhat uneven season."

Olin Downes, reviewer of the Times, still disliked the Scriabin, but said, "The remainder of the program was familiar but welcome . . . The patrician spirit of Italy of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is embodied in the pieces arranged by Respighi, and these pieces are admirably played by the virtuosi of Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra."

In the Herald Tribune F. D. Perkins found praise for the playing of the Debussy, and pointed out that Respighi in his arrangements neither clothed his material in the orchestration of the twentieth century, nor made it sound excessively archaic.

It was announced that two veteran musicians of the Boston Symphony, George Longy, oboist, and K. Keller, double bass player, will retire from the orchestra at the end of this season.

William Bachaus

William Bachaus played a Chopin program in Aeolian Hall, New York, the afternoon of April 11. He played the twenty-four Preludes and the twelve Etudes of Op. 25.

In the words of the Herald Tribune writer, he was "in fine form. . . . His palette of color was rich and varied, with sonorous fortissimos, fluency and song in softer passages, and technical brilliance." This reviewer found the same vigor which he displayed at his last recital, "but more equably manifested with little, if any of the hardness which had marked his fortissimos."

To quote the Sun: "Mr. Bachaus is not the ideal Chopin player, although his prestige as a master pianist is entirely secure when he interprets such mighty composers, as, for instance, Brahms or Beethoven. Much of his Chopin on Saturday was a little heavy in style and lacked something of the iridescent shimmer of colors imposed by a keenly sensitive imagination. But it was all, nevertheless, admirable piano playing and always backed by rare intellectual force and perfect technique."

Mme. Guiomar Novaes

An all-Chopin program was offered by Guiomar Novaes at her farewell New York recital in Town Hall on April 11. To quote the Sun the pianist "has rarely played better than she did in the B flat minor Sonata. Her style, touch and tone were admirable and her clear interpretation revealed all the musicianly qualities brought forth by a sensitive mind of fine and subtle understanding. There was imagination, emotional depth and a wide range of brilliant colors directed by Mme. Novaes' admirable technical equipment."

The Post reviewer remarked that she is "as impressive in the power with which she renders compositions as in her delicacy and sureness of touch." In the opinion of the Herald Tribune chronicler, her "technical mastery needs no repeated encomiums." Her playing of the Sonata referred to in the Sun was also complimented by the Times writer . . . "she played it impressively and with genuine emotional power."

Miss Anna Robenne

Anna Robenne, Russian dancer, made her New York debut at the Manhattan Opera House Wednesday evening, assisted by George Barrere and his Little Symphony Orchestra and by Arthur Loesser, pianist. In the words of the Sun reviewer, "the entertainment, as a whole, offered abundantly of admirable musical variety as well as of the dance."

This chronicler asserted that Miss Robenne's debut was successful. "Her interpretations showed the traditions of her school, based upon an admirable knowledge of classic technique. . . . Her grace was exquisite and her charm compelling. . . . Her gestures were sinuous and effective and her costumes tasteful." The Times reported that, as a tiptoe specialist, Miss Robenne possessed "a strength nothing short of remarkable. Seemingly she floated at will, with scarce a pause, over the surface of the stage. . . . The arm movements, however, were less expressive, nor were turns and pirouettes without a partner always successful."

According to the reviewer in the Herald Tribune, "her dancing seemed of the ballet rather than of the dramatic type. . . . It was pleasing and decorative, marked by ample grace and agility, animation and rhythmic sense, and aided by a prepossessing appearance."

Elman String Quartet

The third and final New York concert of the season by Mischa Elman and his string quartet took place in Town Hall Wednesday night. Mr. Elman's associates were, as before, Horace Britt, cello, Edward Bachman, second violin, and Nicholas Moldavan, viola. Their program consisted of Quartets by Haydn, Mozart, and Brahms.

W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun that in the latter "there were beauty of tone, energy and devotion, but there was a little want of emotional communication." Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail commented that "always in these concerts Mr. Elman has distinguished himself by his conscientious participation in the ensemble, as well as by the superior finesse and adroitness of his delivery of difficult passages."

The writer in the Herald Tribune thought the Quartet "gave a most commendable performance, with a well blended combined tone and mutually comprehensive team work." According to the Times, "the concert was a testimony to the careful preparation and the devotion of Mr. Elman to the task of creating a well balanced and euphonious ensemble" and it showed "a marked advance in unity of style" over the earlier concerts. The Post observed that the playing of Mr. Britt was "especially noteworthy" in the Haydn Quartet's Adagio and Minuetto movements.

Feodor Chaliapin

The usual enthusiastic audience applauded Feodor Chaliapin in his third New York recital at the Metropolitan Opera House the afternoon of April 12. He was assisted by Abraham Sopkin, violinist, and Max Rabinowitch, pianist.

Mr. Chaliapin was "in good voice and gave abundantly of his fine dramatic resources, both in coloring and inflection of tones," according to the World; he "was in excellent voice, except for brief attacks of hoarseness." On the other hand, the writer in the Post observed that he was "not in his best voice because of a troublesome cold, but he sang many songs in a variety of moods and with his usual matchless expression."

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: CHARLES L. WAGNER
D. F. McSWEENEY
5th Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

DOROTHY MILLER DUCKWITZ
AMERICAN PIANIST
Will accept a limited number of pupils
CHICKERING PIANO WELTE-MIGNON RECORDS
Management Dorothy Miller Duckwitz, 145 West 77th St., New York City

Francis Rogers
Concert Baritone and Teacher of Singing
Member American Academy of Teachers of Singing
144 East 62d St., New York City

RHYS MORGAN
THE WELSH TENOR
Management: ROGER DE BRUYN, 1639 Broadway, N. Y. C.
Tel. Circle 5500 DR. J. O. HOWELLS, Associate

VIRGINIA CARRINGTON THOMAS MUS. BAC. A. A. G. O.
AMERICAN ORGANIST AND COMPOSER
RECITALS ADDRESS: 516 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

Gliere Symphony Is Presented by Stock

Chicago Hears Easter Music; Capacity Audience Attracted by Popular Concert.

Chicago, April 14. — Reinhold Gliere's Symphony, Ilia Mourometz, was the featured number on the program offered at last week's concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor. The Easter season was reflected in the other two works, Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Russian Easter and the Good Friday music from Parsifal.

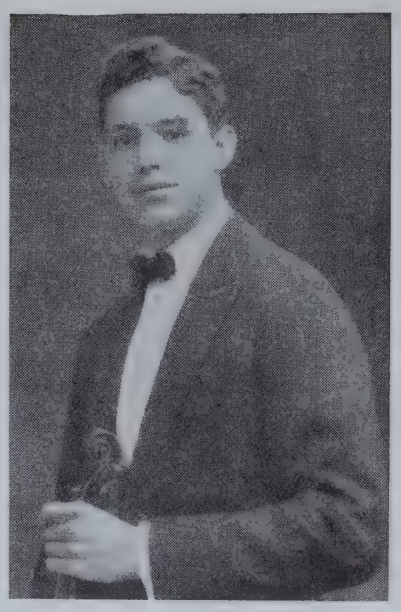
According to Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, the Gliere composition "is a monumental contribution to symphonic literature. . . . It is truly an epic poem in music." Edward Moore of the Tribune wrote in the same vein, and Glenn Dillard Gunn (Herald-Examiner) thought that "its sonorities thrilled, not merely because of the tremendous effort put forth to pr - duce them, but by reason of their incomparable brilliancy."

To quote Karleton Hackett of the Post: "It is music which grew out of a different mode of life and thought from what we know, but a vital thing, the expression of truth as the Russian knows it. Mr. Stock's imaginative force and command of the means of expression shone out through every measure. The response of the men was admirable."

In spite of the weather a capacity audience heard the popular concert played by the orchestra, under Mr. Stock's direction, Thursday. The music of the evening included Godard's Scenes Poetiques, Jarnefelt's Praeludium and Berceuse, the Weber-Weingartner Invitation to the Dance and the Polonaise from Tschaikowsky's Eugen Onegin.

Passion Music Sung a Cappella

Cincinnati, April 12.—Bach's St. Matthew's Passion was sung a cappella by the St. Lawrence Choir, directed by Alfred Schehl, at the recent production here of the Passion Play.



HARRY FARBMAN,

Young American Violinist, Whose Debut Recitals in New York, Chicago, and Boston This Season Have Displayed, According to Reviews, an Exceptional Talent.

Contest Ends May 1

Los Angeles, April 15.—May 1 is the final day for the submission of manuscripts in the contest for the prize of $1,000 offered by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra for the best symphony or symphonic poem by a California composer.

Manuscripts from American citizens resident in California are being received up until that day by Caroline E. Smith, manager of the orchestra. The works must never have been published or played. They must be in legible manuscript in ink, and must be handed in with a fictitious name or motto on the score.

First performance of the prize work is reserved by the Philharmonic Orchestra, although the score may be copyrighted by the composer. Should no manuscript of sufficient merit to justify the award be received the contest may be reopened within a year.

GRADOVA

"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

FORREST
LAMONT
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

INA BOURSKAYA
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Metropolitan Opera Company—Chicago Civic Opera Company
Concert Management: S. HUROK, INC. Aeolian Hall, New York City

MUZIO
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Musical Chicago En Courant

Ravinia Park Prospect Inviting; Easter Filled With Recitalists; Prize Offered for Madrigals.

By HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, April 14.

THOUGH the Chicago Civic Opera closed its doors for the season some weeks ago, the San Carlo company presented popular operas at popular prices for a week and went its way, and only scattered performances by amateur or semi-professional organizations remain, still opera lovers of Chicago may read with anticipatory joy Louis Eckstein's prospectus of the coming summer season of opera at Ravinia Park.

A goodly season it promises to be in length and strength. The length from the opening night, June 27, to the final Labor Day performance on September 7, figures just ten weeks and three days. The strength is manifold. Each season one wonders how the Ravinia performances could possibly be improved upon, and each season by some private alchemy Mr. Eckstein manages to do just that. An organization run with no thought of pecuniary gain, Ravinia is almost unique among opera companies.

The best available artists are culled from the rosters of the Chicago and Metropolitan opera companies, with the result that artistic performances are assured. The Chicago Symphony orchestra finds summer relaxation from the winter symphony routine in reading opera scores under Gennaro Papi and Louis Hasselmans. Lest they forget, Eric DeLamarter conducts weekly symphony and children's concerts. A great company has been assembled to present the thirty-seven operas promised.

FINDING Orchestra Hall entirely too small to accommodate all those who wished to hear John McCormack in his recital of last Wednesday night, a final overflow concert has been announced for next Sunday afternoon. This will take the form of a popular request program. Judging from the number and type of the songs requested, just anything at all will do so long as John is the one to tilt back his head and do it. Requests range from Handel to I Love You Truly, and from Il Mio Tesoro, from Don Giovanni, to Mother Machree. Letters have come as individual requests and as organizations. One hopes that some time John will yield to his own confessed suppressed desire to sing an entire program of Eric Wolff songs. As he is aided and abetted in that desire by Fritz Kreisler, what a grand impossible idea it would be to have Fritz officiate now at the piano and now on the violin!

HENRY HADLEY'S appearance in the dual guise of composer-conductor of his own Resurgam made something of an event of the Apollo Musical Club's concert at Orchestra Hall on Monday evening. There were other contributory elements to its fine performance, the text by Louise Ayres Garnett (whom Evanston claims along with Vice President Dawes as one of its celebrities), the well trained body of the Apollo singers, and the members of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, who so well obey Mr. Hadley's slightest wish in playing his score.

The first half of the program was devoted to Psalm XIII, with the Liszt setting. Edgar Nelson conducted, and at its conclusion called attention of the chorus and audience to the presence of the convalescent Harrison Wild, who has been forced through illness this winter to yield the baton to Mr. Nelson.

A MONUMENTAL program presented in a monumental way was the gift of Dr. Stock and his men for the Easter symphony pair of concerts. With only three sets of parts in America, Chicago is fortunate in having had exclusive rights to the Gliere Symphony called Ilia Mourometz. This has had four performances in seven years, and remains one of the great works in the repertoire. Ask John McCormack and Frieda Hempel, who listened to the epic program music of Gliere for the first time last Friday.

Perhaps Easter recital goers were best served by Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is still well beloved in the city she once called home. But two pianists in adjoining theatres offered continued proof by the large number of their hearers that this has been a great year for pianists. Mieczyslaw Munz broadcasted personality plus fine playing from the darkened stage of the Playhouse, while next door Clarence Eidam, pianist and pedagogue of the Cosmopolitan School of Music, showed that he, too, could play big music in a big way.

CLAIRE DUX left Chicago on Monday for a summer and fall of work and recreation in Germany and adjacent countries. One of her invitations is from the Soviet Government of Russia to sing to the working people in country, village and city, with a private car at her disposal for the engagement. An interpreter is also included.

Dr. Wilhelm Middleschulte will conduct a master class in organ, principally the works of Bach, during the months of May and June in Berlin. The engagement is under the auspices of the Prussian department of science, art and popular education.

Mme. Sturkow Ryder gave her annual recital of American compositions last Saturday afternoon at her studio in the Cable building. Dorothy Greathouse was soloist, singing a new song of Mme. Sturkow Ryder's, A Cycle of Lilies.

THE National Peasant Orchestra, a group of Polish farmer musicians, was officially received by the city of Chicago at a reception in Mayor Dever's office last week. This is the first visit of this unique organization to the United States since its formation in 1880 by Karol Namyslowski, composer, and father of the present conductor.

D. A. CLIPPINGER announces the twenty-third annual prize competition offered by the Chicago Madrigal Club. For the setting of the poem, In the Merry Month of May, the W. W. Kimball Company will pay a cash award of $100. The composer must be a resident of the United States and the setting in madrigal form for a chorus of voices singing a cappella. The composition receiving the prize becomes the property of the Chicago Madrigal Club.

Recitalists Throng Chicago

Mme. Schumann-Heink and John McCormack Head Vocalists; Instrumental Programs.

Chicago, April 16.—Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink and John McCormack headed the long list of recitalists here last week. Clara Clemens introduced some novel Scandinavian works at the fourth of her series of song recitals in Kimball Hall last Tuesday, and three pianists, a violinist, a baritone, and a soprano completed the week's roster. They were Mieczyslaw Munz, Clarence Eidam, Emmy Brady, Charles Skopp, Julius Bledsoe and Miriam C. Kornmann.

According to Edward Moore of the Tribune, Mme. Schumann-Heink "never showed herself more in the possession of the singer's art" than at her appearance in Orchestra Hall yesterday. Karleton Hackett of the Post wrote that she sang with "fine spirit" although she "was not quite in such good voice as the last time she sang here." In the opinion of Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, in the Heilstrahlender Tag and in an aria from Max Bruch's Odysseus "not only resonance, but also power and richness of vocal timbre called back the many great qualities of this fine artist."

Glenn Dillard Gunn (Herald Examiner) commented of her voice that "its luster is quite worn away . . . There remains, however, a consummate mastery of the art of projecting mood through melody." Mr. Hackett lauded Florence Hardman, assisting violinist, and Katherine Hoffmann, accompanist, was mentioned favorably in the reviews.

* * *

John McCormack's recital in Orchestral Hall Wednesday evening was as usual the subject of laudatory comment in the press. As Maurice Rosenfeld expressed it, "Sustained, smooth singing, a style denoting simplicity and reverence and a diction which is one of the chief distinctions of this singer were the outstanding artistic characteristics."

This reviewer found Mr. McCormack "well disposed" and thought his voice "came forth with purity, limpidity and clarity." Other writers were equally enthusiastic. Mr. Hackett considered that Lauri Kennedy's violoncello soli showed "appreciation for the music, tone of warmth and good technique." According to Mr. Rosenfeld, Edwin Schneider played the piano accompaniments with "sympathetic style and musicianly art."

* * *

The playing at the piano recital given by Mr. Munz at the playhouse yesterday was "of a restrained style, poetic, smooth, and refined," in the opinion of Maurice Rosenfeld. Mr. Moore observed that he "is agile of hand and brain, playing cleanly and energetically, and with a personal point of view that makes him interesting." According to Mr. Gunn, under Mr. Munz's hands the F minor Nocturne of Chopin became "a lovely thing of tenuous tone, muffled resonance, shimmering passages." Mr. Hackett asserted that he proved "an interesting pianist. He has imagination and is not afraid to express his individual viewpoint."

* * *

The other piano recital yesterday was given by Mr. Eidam in the Studebaker. Mr. Hackett stated that his reading of Beethoven "was straightforward, with appreciation for the varying moods and a genuineness that gave it character" and commended his "poetic feeling and clear thinking" as well as the richness of variety of shading in his tone. Mr. Gunn accredited him with "ample technical facility, much power, an excellent understanding of style, a direct and forceful delivery of his message."

The "enthusiasm and fire" which Mr. Eidam put into the Schumann Symphonic Etudes were lauded by Edward Moore, and Mr. Rosenfeld wrote that, in the finale of the work, he disclosed "a dashing brilliant style and a tone of considerable power."

* * *

Charles Skopp, violinist, was heard in the Paganini Concerto and Bach's Sonata in G minor in Kimball Hall yesterday. In Mr. Hackett's words, "he had understanding of the music, drew a mellow tone from his violin, and showed an excellent technique. The melodic line was well defined and the ornamentations were cleanly added."

His playing of the Bach, according to Edward Moore, showed talent but insufficient training. Mr. Rosenfeld liked his "good, round tone" and Mr. Gunn asserted that Mr. Skopp "has facility, is not always flawless in his intonation, has a good, vigorous tone and plays with an almost irresponsible freedom."

* * *

In his first Chicago recital at Kimball Hall last Thursday, Julius Bledsoe, Negro baritone, made an excellent impression on his audience.

Mr. Rosenfeld observed that "his voice is a robust, high baritone, which has attained besides considerable power a smooth legato and it is skillfully used in the rendition of music of both the romantic and dramatic kind." His distinct enunciation also was commended by this writer. Mr. Moore spoke of the "extraordinary richness an beauty" of his voice but did not think he has yet attained efficient enunciation. Mr. Hackett said the singer displayed "instinctive feeling for the music of his race and a voice of unusual quality." He admired the resonance, variety of tone coloring, the genuine feeling and "interpretative force" in his singing, but noted "a tendency to exaggeration which marred certain phrases."

* * *

A joint recital was given by Miriam C. Kornmann, soprano, and Emmy Brady, pianist, in the Young American Artists' Series at Fine Arts Recital Hall Thursday. According to Mr. Rosenfeld both disclosed talents "quite above the usual order." Mr. Kornmann's voice has "volume and carrying power" and Miss Brady showed "a brilliant technique, a gift for resonant tone and a graphic style in interpretation."

Mr. Hackett thought the singer disclosed a full, warm tone and ample volume—"She sang," he said "with appreciation for the music and in a straightforward manner." Miss Brady, he wrote, "played forcefully, if not always surely." In Mr. Moore's opinion, Miss Kornmann has a voice "of power and promising nature, hampered by a breathy and unbrilliant quality." Her clear enunciation and good musicianship received his praise.

Cincinnati Invites I. S. C. M.

At the meeting on April 1 of the American section of the International Society for Contemporary Music it was announced that the society will be invited to hold its 1926 music festival in Cincinnati, O. Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Taft of that city have volunteered to provide a fund to defray the expenses of the festival, including those of bringing the European delegates to this country.

RUDOLF
LAUBENTHAL

TENOR METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

Re-engaged for Season 1925-1926

Mr. Laubenthal sang for the first time at the Metropolitan, during season 1924-1925, the leading tenor roles of

Siegfried, Goetterdaemmerung, Jenufa

and reappeared in

Parsifal, Walkuere, Lohengrin, Tannhaeuser, Meistersinger

The Opinion of the Press

The Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle
March 16th

" . . . His Siegfried was admirably done—here is a role to which he is fitted by his youth and appearance, as well as by the fresh lyric quality of his voice."

New York Sun
March 16th

"He successfully caught the radiant exuberance of this amazing youth. He sang the music with freshness and a full fluid tone that caught more than a hint of romanticism and lyric beauty."

New York Telegram-Mail
March 16th

"He acquitted himelf with no small credit. He sang with confidence and success."

Philadelphia Record

" . . . His delightfully youthful, buoyant appearance enhanced his singing and acting and seemed to create in him the ideal combination of a character. Laubenthal received almost as many curtain calls as a reigning prima donna and seemed delighted at the warmth of his reception."

Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger

" . . . The honors of the performance were caried off by Rudolf Laubenthal as the hero, Siegfried. . . . He was ideal, the finest Siegfried that has appeared here in a great many years. . . . an unusually fine performance."

New York Post
March 16th

"Laubenthal sang and acted with rare charm."

Mr. Laubenthal has been engaged for the Spring Music Festival in San Francisco, Calif., in April and for the May Festival at Danbury, Connecticut.

—

First New York Recital:
OCTOBER, 1925

For all information concerning Mr. Laubenthal's appearances address
Exclusive Management ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City
KNABE PIANO USED

Mme. Jeritza's Recital Draws Throng on Coast

Alfred Hertz Ends Season of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

San Francisco, April 13.—Before an audience of seven thousand persons Maria Jeritza, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang in recital here at the Civic Auditorium on Sunday afternoon. Maximilian Rose, violinist, was heard on the same program.

Mr. Elliott, reviewer of the Herald, was most enthusiastic of all the chroniclers concerning Mme. Jeritza's concert. He wrote, "Two or three times in a life-time, if you are lucky, you may hear a singer who has everything, who brings to his or her music at once voice, intelligence, feeling, and those subtle but enormously important gifts of personality which by their presence or absence make unquestionable greatness or incurable mediocrity—Maria Jeritza is one of the few who has everything."

Of much the same opinion was the Chronicle writer, Ray Brown. His review said in part, "The powerful emotional quality of Jeritza's voice, with its vibrancy of tone, great beauty of phrasing, and clarity of enunciation, stamps her as an artist of first rank, and her naive smile and unusual beauty give her a combination of charm which is irresistible."

"The arias were well done, especially the Wagnerian," wrote Mr. Mason in the Examiner, but he considered that "in none of them could the singer's art be called superlatively good." He pointed out that Mme. Jeritza's personality was popular with the audience, and praised the "temperament" of Mr. Rose.

The San Francisco Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season last Friday afternoon. The program was made up of Brahms' Third Symphony, Tam o'Shanter of Goossens, Svendsen's Zorahayda, and the Meistersinger Prelude. In the entr'acte the audience gave Alfred Hertz an ovation, and the stage was banked with flowers. Mr. Woodman of the Call-Post felt that "the entire program was given in Hertz' customary style with splendid response by the orchestra."

Mr. Mason, in the Examiner, said "the fine performance of the Brahms' Third Symphony reminded us how far Alfred Hertz has brought the orchestra and the city along the road of musical development and that is a matter of hearty congratulation."

According to Mr. Brown in the Chronicle, "The Goossens novelty was in whimsical vein. Svendsen's legend Zorahayda brought the audience into another mood with its appealing love and religious themes and its pleasing part for the first violin." The Herald reviewer felt that "this last program was not, aside from emotional considerations, a very strong one to finish the season with. Except for the Symphony it contained nothing of remarkable force or freshness."

M. J. C.

Efrem Zimbalist Is Heard in Cleveland

Assists on Sokoloff Program; Ravel Novelty and Brahms' Fourth Symphony Played.

Cleveland, April 17.—Mendelssohn's E minor Concerto was the composition played by Efrem Zimbalist in his appearances as soloist at last week's pair of symphony concerts. The orchestra, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, also played the Brahms Fourth Symphony, which has not been heard here in several years, and Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe, which had its first Cleveland performance.

Wilson G. Smith of the Press wrote that Mr. Zimbalist's playing was "not only polished and refined, but he displayed a greater breadth of conception and abandon in style than on any previous occasion. . . . It was the finest exhibition of artistic virtuosity that Zimbalist has ever given us." According to Eleanor Clarage (Times), he played with "consummate" skill. "He is straightforward, unaffected, and vastly ingratiating in everything he does. . . . He is complete master of his instrument and performs in a refreshingly effortless way."

The reviewer of the News, Archie Bell, found it "big, virile music that comes from a bow in his hand, touching the strings; a beautiful tone, first-class technique and playing that has many of the other qualities of virtuosity."

The Ravel music, in Mr. Bell's opinion, "is highly colored and almost spectacular." Eleanor Clarage thought these ballet excerpts "most interesting from the standpoint of orchestration; but their honeyed cadences were just a bit cloying after the sensible and sturdy strains of Mendelssohn and Brahms." Mr. Smith was impressed with "its marked melodic character and colorful orchestration."

Five Orchestras to Visit New York During 1925-26

NEW YORK will be visited during next season by five out-of-town orchestras. The Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski and Serge Koussevitzky respectively, will continue their annual series of ten New York concerts each.

Three organizations will be heard by Gothamites in single concerts. Nikolai Sokoloff will again return with his Cleveland Orchestra, making one appearance in the concert course of the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau. The Cincinnati Symphony under Fritz Reiner and the Detroit Orchestra under Ossip Gabrilowitsch will also be heard.

Hartford Symphony in Debut

Hartford, Conn., April 10.—Under the leadership of Louis Eaton the newly organized Hartford Symphony Orchestra made its debut on March 22. The program consisted of Massenet's Phedre Overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and works by Hadley, MacDowell, and others.

Philadelphians Give Last Gotham Program of Season

A "memorable concluding concert of a brilliant series" was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting, in Carnegie Hall last Tuesday. Thus did Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail characterize the tenth and final New York concert this season of the orchestra.

The program directed by Mr. Stokowski offered neither soloist nor novelty, but, to quote Olin Downes of the Times, "it was rich in material and in judicious contrast." Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Russian Easter was followed by Rachmaninoff's Isle of Death and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, with Mr. Stokowski's orchestral transcription of Bach's Passacaglia serving as "the fitting capstone of a most brilliant season" (Olin Downes). W. J. Henderson of the Sun agreed that "the program was compact, well arranged and rich in contrast."

The Post reviewer also thought the Passacaglia "a stirring composition with a most magnificent climax." Deems Taylor (World) found it a "masterly piece of instrumentation," and added that "the program as a whole was admirably built and beautifully played."

Fleta

METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

RUTH
BRETON
VIOLINIST

"A welcome apparition on the concert stage."
(Lawrence Gilman, N. Y. Herald-Tribune)

CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York — Packard Building, Philadelphia

"GRandjany, master of harp, thrills."
Baltimore News.

"REmarkable technical ability."
Seattle Star.

"AAcclaimed outstanding harpist today."
Walla Walla Bulletin.

"NNotable musical offerings."
San Antonio Express.

"DDistinguished French artist."
Vancouver Daily Province

"JJougen or Liszt, his interpretation was an achievement."
Winnipeg Evening Tribune.

"AAlways gracious, exquisite, finished."
Saskatoon Daily Star.

"NNo equal among harpists."
Baltimore.

"YYou could ask for nothing finer."
Winnipeg Free Press.

TOUR NOVEMBER to MARCH, 1925

NOW BOOKING

BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MANAGEMENT
130 West 42nd Street, New York City

Wurlitzer Harp

Three Pianists Appear in Boston

Bachaus, Shattuck, and Rovinsky Heard; Two Baritones Sing; Mme. Farrar's Carmen.

Boston, April 14.—Three pianists who appeared here in recital last week were William Bachaus, Arthur Shattuck, and Hyman Rovinsky. Other recitalists were William Ryder and Huntingdon Rice, baritones. The musical features of the week included Geraldine Farrar's production of a modernized version of Carmen, and the performance of Hora Novissima by the Handel and Haydn Society.

The program which Mr. Bachaus played in Jordan Hall Thursday evening included Bach, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Scriabin, Brahms and Chopin. According to the Transcript, the Bach Fantasia became "a flight of the poetical imagination; warmth and color were there, phrases and periods and larger divisions well modulated, growing cumulatively and compellingly into an imposing structure, yet never departing from the poetical view of that structure." To the Schumann the pianist brought "excellent tone, delicacy of nuance, highly poetic feeling, all resulting in a delectable performance."

This reviewer asserted that he is "a master of dexterity and of complexity, but of poetry as well." On the other hand, Stuart Mason (Christian Science Monitor) thought that "he has undoubted technical skill. As an interpreter, he is matter of fact. . . . It is a good, wholesome style of playing and a clear and sane, if unimaginative, viewpoint of music."

* * *

Seventeenth century music was featured at Arthur Shattuck's piano recital in Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon. The Globe writer thought his "cleancut, smooth tone well adapted to the early music. He played these pieces intelligently, neither meltingly nor bombastically." The Monitor reported that "a fine interplay of moods, an artful emphasis of every modulating phrase, and clearest pedaling made the Chopin a real achievement." This writer, however, remarked on his tendency to play "too forcefully at times."

To quote the Transcript, "Mr. Shattuck's virtuosity has long since established itself. So also his skill, his sensibility, as a discerning expository musician."

Hyman Rovinsky, who played in the same hall on Friday, was praised by Mr. Mason for his "evident interest in novel music" and for his "unaffected but always musical playing" although at times it seemed monotonous. This defect, said this writer, was probably due to the character of his music. Philip Hale of the Herald stated that Mr. Rovinsky "has some excellent qualities; a beautiful touch in lyric measures; strength, which he at times abuses so that sound becomes noise; facility, dash and fire." Mr. Hale found also traces of "rhythmic unsteadiness" and "sentimentality."

* * *

The song recital given in this hall by William Ryder Wednesday night included old Italian songs and arias, as well as others in French, German, and English. Mr. Mason asserted that the most marked characteristic of his voice is its "musical quality. It is that of a singer who surrenders himself to his music and whose technical control of his voice is so complete that all problems of that nature are solved without conscious effort. . . . His interpretations are carefully considered, although they may seem the spontaneous creations of the moment."

The Herald reviewer wrote that his voice has "excellent quality" in its medium and upper medium reaches, "especially when he delivers himself freely." His tones often lost their vitality when he sang softly, added this chronicler, but otherwise, "technically and musically both, Mr. Ryder sings well, with an unusual neatness of attack and smoothness of legato, with phrasing very elegant." According to this writer, his powers of interpretation are not, as yet, on an equal level with his vocalism.

The reviewer in the Monitor wrote that Huntingdon Rice, who was heard in the auditorium of the Leland Powers School Friday night, possesses a voice "of velvety smoothness, of a soft, luscious quality as difficult to describe and as unusual as it is charming. A gentle, mellow richness, clearly resonant, encompasses nearly the entire range of his voice." This commentator noted that Mr. Rice also enunciates clearly but that "not all the tones are sufficiently even in texture. Breath control is far from perfect." He did not think, however, that these defects marred "the effectiveness of Mr. Rice's fine voice."

* * *

Miss Farrar presented her shortened and modernized version of Carmen in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon. Her company included Neira Riegger, Emma Noe, Luigi Pasinati, Joseph Royer, and Marcel Vision. Carlo Peroni conducted the small orchestra.

On the whole, the reviewers found the "operatic fantasie" colorful and entertaining but not of serious musical importance. The Globe writer said that, as a tabloid opera, the version "is almost wholly admirable." He found Miss Farrar's acting more noteworthy than her singing and thought that the cast "effectively seconded her efforts." The performance to him was "a coherent whole, unsurpassed in its kind."

The Transcript writer thought Miss Farrar "sang in good voice and with expression, though her tone fell short of brilliance and her phrasing was nothing extraordinary." Miss Noe disclosed "considerable power and a very delicate quality of soprano." Both this singer and Miss Riegger were commended for the refreshing quality of their voices in the Monitor. Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald agreed with the Transcript writer that Miss Farrar's conception of the role was "pictorial, objective" and "lacked subtlety."

The dancers, Ruth Laird, Mildred Leisy, Gladys Meredith, and Star Woodman, received commendation.

* * *

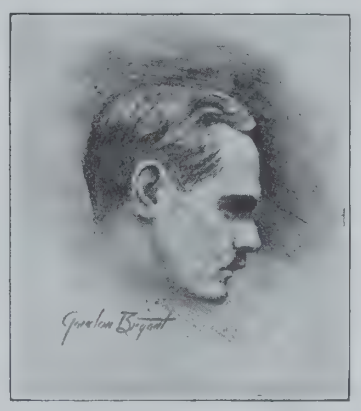
The soloists at the production of Hora Novissima by the Handel and Haydn Society, Emil Mollenhauer conductor, were Emily Stokes Hagar, Emma Roberts, George Meader, and Fred Patton. The Boston Festival Orchestra participated and John H. Crowley was the organist.

The Transcript reported that the soloists "sang with more telling effect when their part lay against a background of chorus than when singing alone" and that Mr. Patton's voice "proved peculiarly appropriate" to his music. He was also lauded by Mr. Mason. This writer did not find the performance "unqualifiedly excellent" and the Herald reviewer thought it below the usual standard of the Society.

Play for Busoni Memorial

A Ferruccio Busoni memorial concert was given by five pianists in Aeolian Hall, New York, on the afternoon of April 13, with the object of raising funds to place a bronze bust of the late Italian pianist and composer in the concert hall of the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, where Busoni was a director.

Those who appeared were Maria Carreras, who arranged the concert, Ernest Schelling, Ernest Hutcheson, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and William Bachaus. Mme. Carreras played Chopin's B flat minor Sonata and Mr. Bachaus a Chopin group. Messrs. Hutcheson and Schelling co-operated in Saint-Saens' Variations on a theme of Beethoven, for two pianos, and Mr. Gabrilowitsch was heard in Busoni's transcription of Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue. An automatic piano played a record by Busoni of his transcription of Bach's Chaconne.



WALTER

GOLDE

will remain in New York this summer to conduct a special course of instruction for

TEACHERS OF SINGING

JUNE 15 TO AUGUST 15

Mr. Golde will also continue his class of voice students during the summer, and accept a limited number of piano students in the art of accompanying.

ARTISTS WITH WHOM MR. GOLDE IS AND HAS BEEN PROFESSIONALLY ASSOCIATED

Georges Baklanoff	Lucy Gates	Kathryn Meisle
Georges Barrere	Elena Gerhardt	Lambert Murphy
Sophie Braslau	Jeanne Gordon	Colin O'More
Mme. Charles Cahier	Louis Homer	Felix Salmond
Pablo Casals	Maria Ivogun	Oscar Seagle
Richard Crooks	Maria Jeritza	Riccardo Stracciari
Marguerite D'Alvarez	Paul Kochanski	Lionel Tertis
Claire Dux	Estelle Liebling	Jacques Thibaud
Mischa Elman	Edith Mason	Clarence Whitehill

For further information and appointments address

Secretary to WALTER GOLDE

201 West 54th Street, New York City

After May 1, 1925, Mr. Golde will occupy his new studio in the new Steinway Bldg., 109 West 57th St.

EDNA RICHOLSON

SOLLITT

"In Chopin's F minor Concerto she discovered, as do too few pianists, its melodious charm. She gave abundant evidence of her choiceness of craftsmanship. Its chief beauty was a distinction indeed—a tone of the finest polish and the greatest clarity and evenness. She was very heartily received."—Eugene Stinson in Chicago Journal, December 10, 1924.

Season 1925 - 1926 Now Booking

Management: HARRY and ARTHUR CULBERTSON

4832 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Aeolian Hall, New York

Kimball Piano

Welte-Mignon Records

Women Vocal Teachers Form Guild

Organization a Secret Since December; Mme. Ziegler, President, Announces Motives at Banquet.

Following the decision of The American Academy of Singing Teachers to restrict its membership to men teachers, women vocal instructors of New York have organized The Guild of Vocal Teachers. Although the Guild was incorporated last December, public announcement of its existence and purpose was withheld until Wednesday evening of last week at a dinner given in the Hotel Bellclaire.

Mme. Anna E. Ziegler, president of the organization, in presenting the twelve objectives purposed to accomplish, voiced the Guild's indorsement of the code of ethics adopted by The American Academy of Singing Teachers last fall and announced that it was the Guild's desire and intention to co-operate with the Academy in all its endeavors to advance the standards of vocal instruction in this country and promote the welfare of those engaged in the profession, both students and teachers.

As announced by Mme. Ziegler, the objects of the Guild are:

1. In general to advance the Art of Music and particularly the Art of Singing in all of its allied branches and interests.

2. To promote a higher standard of vocal instruction for singing and speaking.

3. To promote the welfare and standing of vocal teachers and vocal students.

4. To safeguard the public against employment of those incompetent to teach because of insufficient knowledge of music and the use of the voice.

5. To promote friendship and good fellowship among bona fide teachers of singing and to advance their interests.

6. To provide a central organization with a permanent home in New York city.

7. To let the work of the vocal teachers, as shown by their pupils, constitute part of the examinations. These examinations to be formulated by people who engage singers and by professional critics.

8. To provide a stage on which pupils may be presented.

9. To assist worthy singers for a career and provide a loan fund for students.

10. To give the American composers frequent opportunities, sponsored by the Guild to present their songs.

11. To compete with no existing association, but rather to exist as an altruistic society for well organized helpfulness.

12. No one is eligible for active membership but the teacher who shows good results in students' actual work and who can prove the possession of some musical knowledge.

After Mme. Ziegler's explanation of the Guild's purpose and plans brief addresses were made by Dr. Frank Damrosch, Alfred Human, Frank Gilmore, secretary of the Actors' Equity Association; F. W. Riesberg, Mrs. Ora McCord Wheatcroft, Oscar Saenger, president of the American Academy of Singing Teachers; Vincenzo Miserendino, the sculptor, and Havrah Hubbard. Among the eighty-six present were many persons prominent in New York's music circles.

The Guild of Vocal Teachers was incorporated under the laws of the state of New York December 23, 1924. There were thirty charter members. Today there are over a hundred.

Besides Mme. Anna E. Ziegler, who is president and treasurer, the officers include Mme. Florence Turner-Maley, vice president; Mrs. Warren R. Hedden, secretary; Mme. Henrietta Speke-Seeley, recording secretary, and Mme. Harriet Behnee, chairman of the membership committee.

Maria Mueller in Freischuetz

Because of the illness of both Curt Taucher and Rudolph Laubenthal, German tenors, Der Freischuetz was substituted for the scheduled Die Meistersinger at the New York Metropolitan Opera on the evening of April 11. The cast was familiar except for Maria Mueller, as Agathe, and Thalia Sabanieva, as Aennchen. The Herald Tribune reported, "Most prepossessing in appearance, and in excellent voice, Mme. Mueller was also convincing from the dramatic point of view and deserved the unusual warmth of the demonstrations" which the audience accorded her.

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

Photo by Apeda

CARYL BENSEL

NUTLEY, N. J., is going to have a Time Table Shop.

It took Nutley quite some days to realize just what a Time Table Shop was, but now that it knows it is again congratulating the indefatigable Mrs. C. W. Wildrick, the creator of this unique shop. Mrs. Wildrick is better known to concert audiences as Caryl Bensel, soprano.

For nearly a century the broken down old cottage had stood in the lot opposite the railroad station. It might have remained there for another hundred years if Miss Bensel hadn't suddenly thought of renovating it and turning it into a Time Table Shop. And once the idea arose, it was not long before things began to happen in Nutley. The house was transferred to a new foundation and is now being painted and spruced up generally.

The announcement of the opening of the shop resembled nothing more than the train schedule. On it was printed:

THE TIME TABLE SHOP
*MAIN LINE, Real Estate
Branches
$ Antiques
& Gifts of the "different" sort
% Exhibits
" Specials
* Will run daily. Sundays by appointment
$ Will run daily, except Sundays
% Will run every fortnight
" Will run at the discretion of the hostess

Even after careful perusal of the circular we were left in some doubt as to the exact nature of the shop.

"I hope to make the Time Table Shop an artistic center," explained Miss Bensel. "I intend to allow young artists—local, and otherwise—to use it without charge for exhibiting their work. William Eville of Nutley will be the first to hold an exhibition. Then another phase of our work here will be to help a great many women sell the articles which they make in their own homes. At any time when there is anything of special interest going on here I will serve—not sell—tea to my friends."

"What I make out of the shop financially will go toward creating a fund to help young musicians with their education."

Miss Bensel admitted that her hobby "is to build things—careers, houses, anything which needs a little vision."

GRAVEURE

IN

LEADING MUSIC CENTERS

"An artist beyond compare." — (The Atlanta, Ga., Constitution.)

"A master of interpretation and expression."—(The Spokane, Wash., Spokesman-Review.)

"The voice is a beautiful organ, and the singer's control of it is admirable." — (The New York Evening Journal.)

Management:
Metropolitan
Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City

EASTMAN
SCHOOL OF MUSIC
of
THE UNIVERSITY OF ROCHESTER

Summer Session

JUNE 22 — JULY 25, 1925

All Regular Departments in Session With Complete Faculties

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC

Faculty of Nationally Known Experts Offer Courses in

METHODS, INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC
(Woodwinds, Brasses, Strings)

PIANO CLASS TEACHING, APPRECIATION, VOCAL CLASS TEACHING, HARMONY

NORMAL AND REPERTORY CLASSES FOR PIANO TEACHERS

Organ Accompaniment of Motion Pictures

Academic Work in University in Conjunction with Music Study

For Information Address Director of Summer Session

EASTMAN SCHOOL OF MUSIC
ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

On The Music Highway

THE Dayton Westminster Choir itinerary for April thus far has included appearances in Richmond, Ind., Chicago, Grand Rapids, Battle Creek, Mich., Lansing, Mich., Detroit, Cleveland, and South Bend. They will also fill engagements in Muncie, Ind., tomorrow, in Kokomo, Ind., Thursday, and in West LaFayette, Ind., on Friday. Their entire program was broadcasted last Tuesday night.

The La Scala Grand Opera Company, of which Dr. Francesco Pelosi is the general manager, will present Josephine Lucchese as Violetta in Verdi's La Traviata in Philadelphia on May 4. Demetrio Onofrei will sing Alfredo, and Carlo Peroni will conduct.

Georges Enesco is sailing for Europe the last of this month. He will return next fall to make his fourth tour of this country.

The junior class of Hollins College, Roanoke, Va., presented Herma Menth, pianist, April 6 in a program of Bach-Busoni, Chopin, Friedman, Scriabin, Dohnanyi, Godowsky, Schubert-Godowsky, and Mendelssohn-Liszt. This constituted Miss Menth's third appearance in that city.

The Women's University Glee Club will give at its fourth concert on Friday evening a program of modern American compositions and folk songs, assisted by Loraine Wyman.

At the production of Aida by the Bridgeport Choral Society today, Frederick Millar will sing the part of the High Priest.

The Easter audience at the ninth free noon concert of the Sunday Symphonic Society, Josiah Zuro, conductor, in the Criterion Theatre, New York, heard Wagner's Good Friday music from Parsifal. Michael Rosenker, soloist, received press commendation for his playing in the Tschaikowsky Concerto. Mr. Zuro also led the orchestra in the Tannhaeuser Overture, and Haydn's London Symphony in D.

Esther Dale, American soprano, has just been announced as the soloist of the first Sunday concert of the New York Philharmonic in New York next season, with Mr. Mengelberg as conductor.

Tina Lerner, pianist, has recently completed a series of six historical lecture recitals in the hall of the John Crouse College of Fine Arts, Syracuse University. Her programs dealt with Old Masters, Romantic School. Chopin, Schumann, Brahms, Liszt, and the Modern School.

Paul Franck, young French organist and grandnephew of Cesar Franck, was heard in a short recital in New York a few weeks ago as a prelude to Glenn Frank's lecture, New Discontents For Old. Mr. Franck was a pupil of Saint-Saens.

The Amateur Musical Club of Peoria, Ill., presented Maria Ivogun in concert on March 26.

Frieda Hempel left New York week before last for a six weeks' tour of the Pacific Coast. Her opening concert was given in El Paso on Easter Monday. She is booked to sing also in Phoenix, Arizona, and Long Beach, California, immediately thereafter. Miss Hempel will sing twice in Los Angeles first as Jenny Lind in the Philharmonic Auditorium, later as herself in the Biltmore Morning Musicales for the benefit of the Southwest Museum Fund.

After San Diego and Santa Barbara, she will go to San Francisco for her concert at the Auditorium on April 30. Seattle, Portland, Spokane, Vancouver and Butte are among the cities of the Northwest that will hear her. Practically all the appearances are Jenny Lind Concerts. En route dates are scheduled in Minnesota and Wisconsin on the return trip and Miss Hempel will not reach New York until May 30.

After his Paris concerts, Alexander Borovsky will make an extended tour, playing twelve concerts in the Balkans, eight in Germany, twelve in Scandinavia, and five in London. He will return to this country for his third season in January, 1926.

A concert of Choral Music was given recently by the Yonkers High School Glee Clubs, conducted by Arthur F. A. Witte. The assisting artists were Harry T. Burleigh, baritone, Rose Rubinowitz, violinist, and Peter DeMeo, violinist.

Tamaki Miura will sing arias from Boheme and Madama Butterfly and a group of Japanese songs with orchestra at the Evanston, Ill., Music Festival May 27. Saturday she sang in a performance of Madama Butterfly in Detroit, last evening she appeared in recital at Pittsburgh, and Saturday she again sings Madama Butterfly in Buffalo.

One of the latest engagements for next season closed for Francis Macmillen will be a recital in Marietta, Ohio, the violinist's birthplace.

Royal Dadmun, baritone, at his song recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, April 28 will include a new version of Kipling's Fuzzy Wuzzy on his program.

Contracts have been signed for the appearance of Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, at the Springfield (Mass.) festival. The artist will appear at the afternoon program on May 9 and play Liszt's E flat major Concerto. She will also play a group of solos.

The Glee and Choral Clubs of the College of New Rochelle will give a concert in Town Hall, New York, Sunday afternoon for the benefit of the building fund of the college. The choruses and solos are under the direction of Nicola A. Montani. The soloists are Clare O'Brien, pianist; Katherine Rice, violinist.

A busy month of engagements for Ethyl Hayden began on April 13 with her appearance in recital in Washington, Pa. On the 16th and 17th she sang the Brahms Requiem in Boston with the Harvard Glee Club; on April 20 her Carnegie Hall recital in New York. The Contemporary Club of Bridgeport have engaged her for the 23rd, while on the 28th the Brooklyn Apollo Club have engaged her for their concert.

Just before starting on her tour with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra Marie Tiffany of the Metropolitan Opera Company sang at one of the Brunswick Hours of Music from WJZ and affiliated stations, thus introducing herself to the many audiences which she will meet on tour.

Sascha Jacobsen, violinist, will shortly sail for Europe to make his Berlin debut on May 14 and his London debut on June 8.

William Bachaus sails early in May and will return to America next season for his longest concert year in this country. He has been engaged by the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, but will be free for concert engagements in this country from November 22 to May 15, except for about four weeks, beginning December 10. Mr. Bachaus has been re-engaged for another series of concerts in Havana in December.

Charles Naegele, young American pianist, has just completed his first season in this country, in the course of which he gave two New York recitals and two Boston recitals and has made more than twenty appearances, including a number of private engagements. His latest appearance took place on April 6 at the New York studio of Mrs. Joseph B. Thomas. An audience, including Mr. and Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Schelling, Olga Samaroff, Prince and Princess Troubetzky and Lord and Lady of Bathurst, heard Mr. Naegele.

After making her San Francisco debut in the spring festival under Alfred Hertz, Mme. Charles Cahier will return to New York just in time to catch the Rotterdam for Holland on May 2. Three performances of Bach's St. Matthew's Passion under Mengelberg in Amsterdam will open her spring and fall season in Europe.

Already twenty-five recitals have been booked for Mme. Cahier in this country for next season, exclusive of her four subscription recitals in New York, appearances with the Friends of Music and other orchestral engagements.

Grace Leslie will be heard in the performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's The Golden Legend when the work is given at Keene, N. H., on May 21. The contralto will also sing there in concert on May 22.

Hilda Lichtenfeld will be heard in a piano recital at Rumford Hall, New York, Saturday evening.

Cecil Arden of the Metropolitan Opera Company was heard in recital in McComb, Miss., on April 20, and is singing in Hattiesburg, Miss., today.

Nina Morgana, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang in Salem, Mass., on April 16 with the Salem Oratorio Society and will sing Sunday afternoon in Medford, Mass. Mme. Morgana will appear in Town Hall, New York, in a benefit concert for the International Foreign Language Association on April 29.

Karin Branzell of the Metropolitan Opera Company will make concert appearances next season under the direction of Concert Management Arthur Judson. Mme. Branzell's first New York recital will be in Aeolian Hall on January 8, 1926.

The spring concert of the Glen Ridge Women's Community Chorus, of which Mrs. Fay Simmons Davis is director, will be given in the Glen Ridge Congregational Church on May 7. The assisting soloists will be Frederic Baer, baritone, and Mr. and Mrs. Paolo Gruppe, violinist and violoncellist.

The chorus is made up of one hundred women, many of whom have a difficult time getting away from their household duties for morning rehearsals. Mrs. Davis, organist of the Congregational Church and director of the Glen Ridge Community Vespers, was the leading spirit in the organization of the Chorus in October, 1921. The spring concert will be the seventh public appearance of the Women's Community Chorus since its inception.

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

GUSTLIN
American Opera
Interp-Recitals
BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MANAGEMENT
130 West 42nd St., New York City
CHICKERING PIANO

Sensational in Opera
Jeritza
Triumphant in Concert
Now Booking
Season 1925-1926
Sole management
Metropolitan Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City
Knabe Piano
Victor Records

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

American Tenor Sings at La Scala

Aroldo Lindi Is Praised in Aida; Dirk Foch Leads Milan Orchestra.

Milan.

In the most recent performances of Aida at La Scala, the Milan public had the opportunity to become better acquainted with the singing of Aroldo Lindi (whose real name is Lindau) in the role of Radames.

La Scala audiences have greeted him with unusual applause, their approval confirming that of the Parma public, which, severe as it is in its judgment of singers, favored Signor Lindi unstintedly when he sang in Aida there during the recent carnival.

He possesses a strong and rugged voice of dramatic intensity, with good tone and plenty of verve. He mounts the scale easily and with perfect intonation, and his breath control is unusual. His diction has frequently been praised in reviews for its consistent clarity and correctness of accent.

In the romanza of the first act of Aida and in the duet of the third act, as well as in the final scene his qualities as an artist and singer have consistently been displayed at their best in each performance. In the concluding phrase of the third act (Sacerdote, io resto a te) the tone and power with which he sustains the climactic note have won great applause from the audiences of La Scala.

It is generally considered that Signor Lindi is more satisfactory in the role than either of his predecessors has been this season. Reviewers are marking this tenor for a good future.

Dirk Foch Gives Concert

A reception of only moderate warmth was given Dirk Foch, who directed the program of the Concert Corporation at the Salone Gallignani on March 27. Foch was for a time director of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra and of the City Symphony in New York during its brief career. At present he is conducting regularly in Vienna the concerts of the Konzertverein, succeeding in this position the late Loewe.

The program of his recent concert here included Brahms' First Symphony, Haydn's D major Cello Concerto, with Gilberto Crepas as soloist, Debussy's Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune, Ugo Wolf's Serenata Italiana, and the Overture to Tannhaeuser. The reviewers found more or less merit in the work of Dirk Foch, although they expressed the opinion that rarely did he command his forces to any great display of warmth.

The soloist is first cellist of the orchestra. His talents are marked, but his performance on this occasion was marred and made uncertain by nervousness. Signor Crepas, who also teaches at the Conservatory, was warmly applauded by the audience, and recalled a number of times.

Puccini's Manon Applauded

Another first performance of the season at La Scala was that of Puccini's Manon Lescaut on March 14. The enthusiasm of the audience during the performance was by no means unbounded, although at the end Toscanini won his customary tributes for the clearness with which he presented every page of the orchestral score, bringing out all the instrumental details and making the chorus and orchestra sing and play with a rare rhythmic life and tonal richness.

Among the leading singers of the presentation were the baritone Baldini (as Lescaut), and the basso Autori (as Geronte). The voice of the protagonist, Signora Zamboni, its tone quality, intonation, and range, were not too well adapted to her part, which is of the utmost difficulty for singers nowadays. For this reason the temptress Manon did not seduce her public very completely. The tenor Menescalchi did not have sufficient warmth and breadth of voice for the passionate singing of the Chevalier des Grieux. The scene of the prayer in the third act was not a great success.

The performance nevertheless was effective on the whole. Once more the mise-en-scene of Marchioro was admired.

FEDERICO CANDIDA.

Costanzi Produces Mefistofele

Rome.—Mefistofele was presented for the first time this season at the Teatro Costanzi on March 12. The title role was sung by the basso Nazzareno de Angelis. The tenor Merli pleased the reviewers, although not as much as he did in Aida. Signora Spani was the Margherita, and Edoardo Vitale conducted.

Vitale Directs Sgambati Requiem

Rome. — With Edoardo Vitale as conductor, Sgambati's Requiem was given at the Pantheon on March 12 in memory of King Umberto. The orchestra of the Costanzi shared the major part of the honors of the occasion with Maestro Vitale. The baritone Ghirardini was soloist.

Busoni Choral Concerto Played

Wiesbaden.—Busoni's Concerto for piano, orchestra, and chorus of male voices was given here recently with Edward Weiss as soloist.

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Borodin's Prince Igor In German Premiere

Mannheim.

Although it is thirty-five years old Alexander Borodin's opera, Prince Igor, has just had its German first performance here.

According to the reviews this Russian work is not a masterpiece which is apt ever to seize the interest of the entire world. Herr F. Droop spoke of it as "an interesting stage piece. . . . If one were to search for some standard of its value, one might think of Wagner's Rienzi or refer to Borodin as a Russian Meyerbeer. Still Prince Igor lags far behind both these illustrations in genuine quality.

"One can hardly call Prince Igor a Russian opera on the basis of its music. Except a few choral passages and dances the work has the pulse and style of Italian music. Borodin succeeded best of all in the heroic moments of his opera, otherwise the broad symphonic stream of music flows past the text untouched by the psychological implications of the story, and at its best achieves an individual beauty as absolute music.

"In its better passages the score is illustrative of the style of the Russian Five, with its harmonic richness, the fire of the melodies, the wildness of the dances, and the broad beauty of the choruses. The humorous effects are somewhat strained and intellectual. These parts such as the duet of the two beggars, at times help to enrich the bright colors of the operatic portrait, but it is always felt that they are lacking in spontaneity, and are rather concocted than inspired."

A. K.

London Trio Plays D'Indy Work

London.—A Trio in B flat by Vincent d'Indy was the opening number at a concert given recently in Wigmore Hall by the London Trio. Other numbers on the program were Bach's Chaconne and his Prelude in E, and Mendelssohn's Sonata in D. Three groups of songs were sung by the assisting artist, Princess Catherine Yourievsky. The members of the Trio are Amina Goodwin, pianist, and Messrs. Pecskai and Whitehouse, violinist and cellist.

New Prokofieff Opera Is Given in Cologne

Cologne.

One of the most important novelties of the present German season has been Prokofieff's new opera, The Love of The Three Oranges, which recently had its premiere here. The work at its first performance far surpassed the expectations which the thirty-five-year-old composer aroused when first word of his new piece was heard.

The book and the score are both written with a strong hand. Prokofieff took his plot from Gozzi and borrowed from his world a few figures like Truffaldino and Pantalon, but he has, as Klaus Pringsheim emphasized in his article, "his own way of mastering this material. . . . He has wit, intellect, and humor and the inexorable non-sentimentality required to eliminate pure romance from a romantic fairy-tale.

"Prokofieff avoids studiously any device which may give his opera the name Romantic. There are no songs and no bel canto singing in the score. There is only a single love scene, and this is interrupted almost as soon as started. The culminating point of the whole story the composer ignores with sublime disregard. Instead of portraying the theft of the oranges on the scene, he has the hero disappear in the wings to return next moment with the fateful fruit.

"But the wealth of musical ideas in the score, the lavish instrumental color, the rhythmic ingenuity retain interest in the hearer throughout the four acts of the opera. Everything exaggerated, bizarre, and irrational in the stage action is explained musically. The action is not slavishly imitated in the accompaniment, but the ideas which it suggests are developed with musical form and logic, and have their own character. Throughout one detects the hand of the master of orchestral composition."

Prof. Weissmann's enthusiasm was equally unchecked. "The bizarre and grotesque fantasy," he reported, "is beautifully passed off by the really merry and catchy music of Prokofieff. He uses the whole apparatus of the art of today, but his clever rhythms and unfailing judgment in respect to orchestral color make his music continually attractive. Whether Prokofieff is able to write lyric music which goes directly to the heart is open to doubt, but at any rate he knows his province, and remains within it with rare judgment."

A. K.

New Sonatas Composed by Ysaye

Paris.—Eugene Ysaye has recently completed a set of six sonatas for solo violin.

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist
Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer Flutist
Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records
Maron & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

EUROPEAN NEWS AND VIEWS

Radio Issue Revived in London

Small Audience Hears Mme. Tetrazzini After Broadcasting; Further Opera Trust Details.

London.

The chief excitement in London's musical world during the last week in March was a little flutter in wireless circles. On the 27th Mme. Tetrazzini, who had broadcasted previously, gave a concert at the Albert Hall. The next day the Daily Telegraph reviewer commenced his notice of this affair as follows:

"The 'positively only appearance in London this season of Mme. Tetrazzini' brought a fair audience at the Albert Hall. It will be said, perhaps, that the empty stalls are due to the recent broadcast concert in which Mme. Tetrazzini played the chief part. This may be so. But we are rather inclined to believe that, human nature being what it is, success in broadcasting should lead to increased numbers in the concert room."

It will be remembered that the broadcast concert in question had claimed for it by the press the best of technical conditions.

Managers Decry Broadcasting

In any case the Telegraph writer showed a prophetic knowledge when he intimated that there would be complaints after the Albert Hall affair, for the next day there appeared in all the leading papers of London a letter from Messrs. Lionel Powell and Holt, one of England's largest managerial firms, and the agents of Mme. Tetrazzini. It said in part:

"Our views on the effect of broadcasting, so far as celebrity artists are concerned, are sufficiently well known not to warrant repetition, but last night's Tetrazzini concert in the Royal Albert Hall provided all the justification necessary for our attitude.

"For many years now Mme. Tetrazzini has appeared solely under our management in London, and she has never sung to anything but crowded houses. On her last visit, two years ago, she filled the hall to capacity—and this three times within a few weeks. Last night, following her broadcasting performance ten days ago, she sang to an audience representing only one-third of the smallest of her London audiences during the past sixteen years! The result of the concert was a heavy financial loss to ourselves.

Declare Artists Suffer

"We have no complaint to make on this score. Impresarios have to face losses as they welcome successes—with equanimity. But, in the interests of celebrity artists themselves, we have all along taken the position that it is contrary to their interests to broadcast and thus ruin their value as concert attractions. Mme. Tetrazzini broadcast against our express wishes, and in the face of our deliberate opinion that it would seriously affect her subsequent concerts. She now knows whether she was well or ill advised.

"Whether last night's extraordinary lack of support for one of the world's most famous singers was due to faulty broadcast transmission, bad reception on poor instruments, or to any other causes, the fact remains that the broadcasting of Mme. Tetrazzini's voice was a disaster."

Nevertheless, the reviews of the concert itself were favorable. The Telegraph's comment is a fair sample; it noted the "instant appeal" of the soprano's voice and manner and added: "Whether the secret lies all in the wonderful evenness of the voice or the pliability of an organ which can perform almost any feat, or possibly in the sanguine personality Mme. Tetrazzini shows in her platform manner—who can say? These are all excellences, and any one of them commands admiration."

More About Piccaver

Further reviews of the recent Piccaver concert are now at hand. The Morning Post observed: "He has in him that part of Caruso which seems nowadays the most difficult to reincarnate. Voice—huge, round, and mobile—is his to use as he wills." The Times writer said: "His voice is of exceptionally beautiful quality." The Daily Chronicle thought "Mr. Piccaver has the robust kind of tenor voice with an almost baritone flavor that is so rare and so agreeable when found in perfection." Other notices were no less favorable, and numbered among them several more comparisons with Caruso.

There can be reported now the putting into operation of the plan for a National Opera Trust, which shall guarantee operatic performances, which a previous article described in detail. The first appeal for support makes it clear—what had not appeared before—that the new organization is to foster opera performances of educational and artistic value other than those given by the B. N. O. C. where it seems desirable, although it has chosen the existing National company as the first object of its ministrations.

Opera Trust Announcement

The announcement runs in part: "We have founded the National Opera Trust in the belief, and with the determination, that in a country which holds a place in the forefront of musical nations, opera should form a basis of popular musical art.

"The published reports of the British National Opera Company show clearly that there exists a remarkable volume of support for opera sung in the native language. They show also that the cost of presenting grand opera on a full scale is so great as to render some form of subsidy essential. The need has been long since recognized abroad, where opera always receives State or municipal support. Our intention is to furnish this support by collecting a capital fund sufficient to yield the necessary subsidy [of £25,000 per annum].

"The Trust Fund is not irrevocably committed to any particular undertaking, and subsidies can only be made on terms precluding their distribution in any way as profits. The intention is that the British National Opera Company shall be the first medium of expression of the objects of the trust, and we look forward to the time when we shall be in a position to extend the scope of our subsidies."

The trustees are headed by the Marquis of Londonderry, and prominent musicians associated with him include Sir Hugh Allen, Sir Landon Ronald, and Mr. John B. McEwen.

P. L.

Otto Klemperer, German conductor, has been announced as guest leader of the New York Symphony Orchestra during the second half of next season.

Goossens Leads Large Orchestra

Liverpool.—An orchestra of nearly 200 men was conducted by Eugene Goossens recently in a concert for the benefit of the Musicians' Union. Nearly a capacity audience was present in Philharmonic Hall to hear the program, which consisted of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, the Tannhaeuser Overture, and Liszt's Preludes.

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

BONCI
VOCAL STUDIO
For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900.
New York City
Knabe Piano

WINIFRED BYRD
America's Pianist
Management: Marie Gouled
25 West 42d St., New York

IRENE WILLIAMS
SOPRANO
Available Concert, Oratorio, Recitals, After January, 1925
Brunswick Records
Personal Address: 15 West 74th St., N. Y. C.

MARJORIE MEYER
SOPRANO
Management: Standard Booking Office, 17 East 42d St., New York

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

EMMA A. DAMBMANN, contralto and vocal teacher, founder and former president of the Southland Singers, has received excellent reports of one of her pupils, Gladys Thomas, who is now on concert tour and who was especially favorably received in Austin, Tex.

Leon Sampaix, pianist and teacher, played in Indianapolis April 16 under the auspices of the City Walther League.

The Letz Quartet were guests of honor at the last meeting on March 21 of the Clarence Adler Club at Mr. Adler's New York studio. After they had played Debussy's String Quartet in G minor and Schubert's The Death and The Maiden, several of Mr. Adler's pupils were heard. Those who appeared on the program were Maurice Lieberman, Helen Dietrich, Norman Masloff, Blanche Salomon, Minnie Huber, Pauline Ruvinsky and Harry Anik.

Frederick Schlieder will conduct his third annual summer intensive course in the recognition and exercise of the creative and interpretive principles of musical art in New York from June 1 to 20 and in Paris from July 1 to August 21. There will be two beginners' courses as well as an advanced cultural course.

The College of Music of the University of South Dakota presented Neil Boardman, violinist, in recital last month. He was assisted by Margaret Boardman, soprano, and by Howard Bostian and Genevieve Truran, accompanists.

Marcel Dupre, French organist, is conducting master classes in Paris this summer. M. Dupre's lessons in improvisation will be based on his new book, The Art of Improvisation, which has been published by Leduc and will shortly be available. Preceding his master classes the organist is to make a concert tour of England, Switzerland and France.

A summer course in Class Piano Methods will be given at the Bush Conservatory by Helen Curtis, director of class piano instruction in the Kansas City public schools. Her course at the summer school is a part of the Public School Music department, which also offers courses in class instruction in violin under C. J. Espenshade and woodwind instruments by Elmo Roesler.

Gota Ljungberg, one of Madame Cahier's pupils and prima donna at the Royal Opera House in Stockholm, has also this year been invited to sing at the Covent Garden in London during the spring season. The roles in which Mme. Ljungberg will appear are: Elsa, Elizabeth, Sieglinde, Eva, Tosca, Maliella in The Jewels of the Madonna and Electra.

Mme. Charles Cahier, Contralto, Will Return to Conduct a Special Master Class at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia Next Season, Beginning November 1.

Special attention will be given to the courses in Music this year at the summer session of the Carnegie Institute of Technology, in Pittsburgh. The Department of Music in the College of Fine Arts, according to an announcement, will give intensive six weeks' courses from June 29 to August 7. The work has been outlined to aid teachers, supervisors, and professional musicians along practical lines that are often neglected.

Attendance upon chorus will be required of all registered music students excepting those who play in the orchestra. Likewise, all students of musical instruments will be required to attend orchestra rehearsals, at least to observe, if not to actually play.

The course in Technique of Orchestral instruments, a feature of past years, will be repeated. Other subjects will include Orchestration, Methods, Principals of Music Education, Chorus Conducting, Rote Songs, Appreciation, History of Music, Harmony, Counterpoint, and Dalcroze Eurythmics. Individual lessons will be given in Voice, Organ, Piano, Violin, Violoncello, and all of the instruments of the symphony orchestra.

The Old Tennis Court in the Palace of Fontainebleau, which the French Government is converting into a concert hall for the benefit of the students of the Fontainebleau School of Music, has been intimately connected with many historic personages and at least one event of historic importance.

Since the French Revolution, the court has played no part in history or sport, but it is now being completely altered and renovated so that on June 25 it may be opened to the American students as a thoroughly equipped concert hall containing between four and five hundred seats. In it there will be a new three manual organ to be used for concert performances, as well as teaching. During the summer in this new hall the students will assemble frequently to hear a series of concerts given by the greatest musicians in France and also to hold those of their own meetings that require a spacious auditorium.

Emma Roedter, president of the Bach Society of Cincinnati, entertained this organization at her home on March 29 for their annual celebration of the birthday of Bach. A program of ensemble and solo selections from Bach was given. Miss Roedter owns one of the most complete libraries of Bach compositions extant in America.

May Create Department of Music at Princeton

Princeton, N. J., April 15.—Replying to a petition by undergraduates and two members of the faculty, Dr. John G. Hibben, president of Princeton University, announced today that the university had for some time had under consideration the establishment of a department of music.

Dr. Hibben said that the continued advocacy of such a project by Dr. Alexander Russell, director of music and university organist, had much to do with consideration given the project, and that the petition would be placed before the board of trustees.

Dr. Hibben inferred that it is a question of funds which has prevented inclusion of music study on the university curriculum.

Donald Clave Stuart, professor of dramatic literature, and Louis Cons, associate profesor of modern languages, were the members of the faculty who subscribed to the petition. Among the undergraduate signers were R. M. Crawford, president of the Princeton Triangle Club and of the University Musical Club; E. C. Stout, Jr., L. Mack and G. D. Mattison, members of the senior council; L. T. Merchant, chairman of the Daily Princetonan board of drectors, and Gordon H. Groth, president of the university orchestra. Leaders in student musical, dramatic and journalistic activities also signed the petition.

Mme. Carreras, pianist, is returning this summer to St. Louis for her second Master Class, which will last five consecutive weeks—from April 23 to May 23, inclusive. She has also been engaged to hold a similar Master Class at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music from June 20 to August 1.

Gertrude Otto, contralto, who is studying in New York with Estelle Liebling, has been engaged as soloist for the Morrow Memorial Methodist church at Maplewood, N. J.

The faculty of the summer school of the Cleveland Institute of Music will include Beryl Rubinstein, Victor de Gomez, Andre de Ribaupierre, John Peirce, Charlotte DeMuth Williams, Anita Frank, Roger Huntington Sessions, Edwin Arthur Kraft, Ruth M. Edwards, Walter Scott, Dorothy Price and Theresa Hunter. The six weeks' session of the school will open on June 22.

The child artist students of Anna Tomlinson Boyd were heard in recital March 21 in the Lyon & Healy recital series in Lyon & Healy Hall, Chicago.

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
11-12 Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

WILLIAM FICHANDLER
PIANO INSTRUCTION
Technic—Interpretation—Teaching Methods
604 West 115th St.
New York City
Telephone: Cathedral 6854

PIETRO CIMINI
CONDUCTOR
Chicago Civic Opera Company
5TH YEAR
PERSONAL ADDRESS: CONGRESS HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILL.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephone: Circle 1011

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

SCHOTT & Co. of London are the publishers of a series of organ albums of the works of Alex Guilmant, edited by Dr. William C. Carl.

The third volume of this series, which is a recent issue, includes Guilmant's Postlude in the Style of Bach, Allegretto Tranquillo, Intermezzo, Meditation-Prayer, Noel Alsacien, Communion in E flat, Tempo di Minuetto, Marche Religieuse, Larghetto from the Second Sonata, Nuptial March, Elevation in the Style of Bach, Prelude from the Third Sonata, Caprice in B flat, Nuptial Postlude and several other selections.

The edition is impeccable in respect to the work of Dr. Carl and of the publishers themselves, who have not sacrificed clarity of printing to compactness of material.

Herbert Forrest Odell's Method for the Mandolin, published by the Oliver Ditson Company, Boston, approaches the study of that instrument, properly enough, with all the seriousness and care which one is accustomed to find in texts of the more pretentious musical instruments.

The Method is in four books, with the material selected, arranged and graded by Mr. Odell with not only a very obvious knowledge of the mandolin, but also of best way in which its mastery may be taught. For some pages there is more printed material in the book than there are exercises. The author explains carefully and with the aid of diagrams the fundamental facts of music necessary for the playing of the mandolin, the structure of the instrument, directions as to the holding of the instrument in the various positions, the tremolo, expression, use of the pick, and then works through the various scales to more intricate technical exercises and musical selections.

Five airs and dances of the eighteenth century have been arranged for piano solo by Angela Diller. They are entitled March of the Musketeers, Sir Pantaloon, Danse, Exaudet's Minuet and The March of the Three Kings. The pieces have every qualification for use in the teaching of the elementary pupil of the piano. They are easy, well edited, melodious and thoroughly musical. This is a Schirmer issue.

More difficult, although not beyond the powers of the intermediate piano pupil is H. Balfour Gardiner's Melcombe, a companion piece to his Jesmond and Shenadoah. This also is a Schirmer publication.

Gives $300,000 to Choir School

An Easter gift of $300,000 was received last week by the Choir School of St. Thomas' Episcopal Church, New York. The donor was Charles Steele, member of the firm of J. P. Morgan and senior warden of the church. The school is training thirty boys under the direction of T. Tertius Noble, choir director of the church.

The Center for Modern Music

J. & W. CHESTER, LTD.
11 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET
LONDON, W. 1
Complete catalogues post free on application

METROPOLITAN OPERA ON TOUR

In the Auditorium—Atlanta, Ga.

TONIGHT

Falstaff—with Mmes. Alda, Bori, and Telva; and Messrs. Scotti, Tokatyan, and Tibbett; Mr. Serafin conducting.

WEDNESDAY

Juive—with Mmes. Ponselle and Mario; and Messrs. Martinelli, Erroile, and Rothier; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

THURSDAY

Lohengrin—with Mmes. Rethberg and Claussen; and Messrs. Taucher, Bohnen, and Whitehill; Mr. Bamboschek conducting.

FRIDAY

Mefistofele—with Mmes. Alda, Peraita, and Telva; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and Chaliapin; Mr. Serafin conducting.

SATURDAY

Tales of Hoffmann (matinee)—with Mmes. Hunter and Bori; and Messrs. Johnson and de Luca; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

Tosca (evening)—with Mme. Easton and Messrs. Martinelli and Scotti; Mr. Papi conducting.

MONDAY

In the Auditorium—Cleveland, Ohio

Africana—with Mmes. Ponselle and Mario; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Danise, and Mardones; Mr. Serafin conducting.

N. Y. Philharmonic Gave 103 Concerts During 1924-1925

With the presentation of Bach's St. Matthew's Passion a week ago today, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra brought to a close its eighty-third season. During this season the orchestra gave 103 concerts, an increase of three over the previous year.

Seventy-three subscription concerts were given in New York City and six in Brooklyn. The orchestra played two membership concerts at the Waldorf-Astoria, five special concerts and seventeen on tour. Members of the orchestra also participated in the ten Philharmonic Children's Concerts, directed by Ernest Schelling, in Aeolian Hall on Saturday mornings and afternoons.

The five special concerts included two performances of Bach's St. Matthew's Passion with the Schola Cantorum, directed by Mr. Mengelberg; one concert in the Artists Series of the Music Schools Settlement, conducted by Henry Hadley, and two concerts outside the subscription series, led by Igor Stravinsky and Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

Willem Mengelberg conducted forty-one concerts, Willem van Hoogstraten thirty-nine, Wilhelm Furtwaengler ten, Henry Hadley eight, Igor Stravinsky three, and two concerts were conducted by both Willem van Hoogstraten and Henry Hadley.

Organize to Aid Aged Musicians

Albert Morris Bagby, founder of the Waldorf-Astoria (New York) Musicales, recently announced a plan destined to provide old age pensions for musicians who are left in want. The Music Lovers' Foundation, which is the name of the new organization, has deposited a substantial sum with the Bankers' Trust Company.

The Foundation is appealing to music schools, societies and clubs to participate and to concert-goers to donate "the price of a single ticket." The fund is intended as "an expression of the friendly bond between artist and audience, the men and women who seek the best, and the men and women who provide the best, in the high realm of musical art."

SASCHA JACOBSEN

Russian-American Violinist Will Make His Berlin Debut on May 14 and His London First Appearance on June 8. He Will Tour Again in the United States Next Season.

Sings in Boxer's Benefit

A song recital in aid of the Peter Maher Fund, for the benefit of the retired boxer of that name, was given by Cecilia Guider, soprano, in Town Hall on the evening of April 13. She was assisted by Rose Pizzutiello, pianist, and accompanied by Harry Oliver Hirt.

"She possesses a large compass, and the quality of her timbre was always agreeable," reported the Times. "She sang with feeling and expression and her diction was clearly understood." The Herald Tribune reviewer said, "She sang Italian, Irish, and other songs with a voice of moderate volume, but artistry in phrasing and expressive skill."

Alma Gluck Sues for Tax Refund

Alma Gluck filed suit last Thursday in Federal Court against Charles W. Anderson, Collector of Internal Revenue, in an effort to recover $5,000 which she asserts she paid, under protest, in excess of her income tax for 1917.

According to Miss Gluck, in addition to the $5,569 income tax which she paid in 1917, she was later forced to pay an assessment of $6,792 which was based on record royalties she received from a New Jersey talking machine company and which should not have been paid as the records were made before 1917. She also objects to paying tax on $80,000 received as royalties from the Victor Talking Machine Company which she claims were not received in 1917.

"Music & Letters"
FOUNDED 1920
The British Musical Quarterly
100 pages: 20s per annum post free to any part of the world
"Music and Letters is the best thing of its kind that is published, and forms a valuable addition to the library."—Musical Standard, August 23rd, 1924.
LONDON: 22, ESSEX STREET, W. C. 2

OUTSTANDING among the multitudinous ranks of recent novels is Margaret Kennedy's The Constant Nymph (published by Doubleday, Page and Company, New York). Several of the leading characters in the story are musicians, and they move in a world of music.

The Constant Nymph has been proclaimed by many book reviewers as a novel of extraordinary qualities. Among the mass of stories which are turned out from week to week it is doubtless distinctive and quite worth reading.

From the standpoint of the musician the book is unusually intelligent of its kind. It is customary among novelists when they are writing about musicians to regard them as exotic creatures whose art excuses every absurdity in their nature. Miss Kennedy does much differently.

In the first place she talks about music as though she knows something about it, not as though it were a kind of magic about which a person has a right to be ignorant and credulous.

In the second place, the creation of music is not considered in The Constant Nymph a leading motif in the story. One does not find characters living and dying for music, thinking about nothing else, and deciding all their actions on principles determined by their music and their careers.

Miss Kennedy's story deals with characters, and incidentally one of the interesting things about them is that they are musical. That is part of their humanity, but there is much more besides.

The telling of the tale is interesting and intelligent. The author would have done well to exclude a great deal of her personal analysis of the characters and their motives and to let their actions speak for themselves. The tale would have been accelerated by such economy, and much that is credible by courtesy would have been spontaneously convincing.

The March issue of Bulletin of the Franco-American Musical Society, encased in a cover of morbid purple, has the usual preoccupation of that periodical with information, with criticism relegated to a secondary place. There is a short appreciation of Gabriel Faure with a biographical sketch by Jeanne de Mare, and then there is a complete chronological list of the late French composer's works, a list which has value for reference.

Frank Patterson's article on American Music is a somewhat discouraged summary of the situation among American composers. Sigmund Klein and Charles E. Ives in two articles give data about quarter-tone music, and speculate theoretically concerning its possibilities.

SUMMY'S CORNER
"A Textbook for Teachers, Students and Music Lovers"
Harmonic Material and Its Uses
by ADOLF WEIDIG
Price, $3.00, plus postage
An excerpt from the book: "The student who has done the work outlined in this book faithfully and understandingly, will have advanced considerably toward the desired goal, "musicianship," where he can convincingly say that he has "learned to listen." Not the eye, but the ear is the presiding and deciding judge: "not the name, but the sound is the thing."
Published by
Clayton F. Summy Co.
429 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Sophie Braslau Heard in Only N. Y. Recital

Sophie Braslau was heartily applauded at her only New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. Louise Lindner was the accompanist.

According to the Herald Tribune, Miss Braslau's voice "had its wonted depth and resonance, its capacity for full and ringing tones, though it did not seem to attain its full fluency until the second group." This reviewer added that the contralto, in the Russian numbers, "sang with her normal absence of effort in producing tones of remarkable volume and took ample advantage of the expressive opportunities offered by the Moussorgsky song."

Olin Downes wrote in the Times that her voice "is inherently a very fine contralto. It is an organ capable of varied and emotional expression; of good range; naturally of a dark, rich color—a voice rare in these days. . . . Experience has given Miss Braslau confidence and authority of manner. She can make very largely the effect that she pleases, but her style and interpretation last night left a good deal to be desired. When her tone was not pushed or an artificial, hollow sonority given the lowest register the voice took on its naturally noble quality." W. J. Henderson wrote in much the same vein in the Sun.

The chronicler in the Post commented that she was in good voice and displayed "the resonant quality of her deep tones, the flexibility of her higher notes and a dramatic personality that pleased a large and enthusiastic audience." Deems Taylor of the World felt it a "pity" that the concert was not up to Miss Braslau's standard, as she has "one of the most expressive and beautiful voices to be heard today."

Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) wrote that in Rubinstein's Night and the Londonderry Air, Miss Braslau's upper scale "had a security and fullness of support which showed a gratifying technical advance. Indeed, of such pure, rich resonance and perfect poise was the apical note of the former that if its possessor will henceforth utter only tones like unto that she will probably still find herself one day a true reincarnation of the fading legend of bel canto." In Moussorgsky's Berceuse, he declared there were "finely graduated dynamics, skillful use of color and polished phrasing." Mr. Sanborn spoke of the uneven quality of her singing and regretted the way in which, in his opinion, she forced her voice in Beethoven's Ah Perfido.

WANTED a pianist and teacher for advanced piano students in a School on the Pacific Coast, salary depending upon reputation of teacher. Please write stating experience, age, salary expected, give telephone number. Be prepared for personal interview in New York on April 27th. Communications should be addressed to MUSIC SCHOOL, c-o Musical Digest, 243 West 39th Street, New York City.

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
LILLIAN GISH in "ROMOLA"
With DOROTHY GISH
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps

Photo by Mishkin

MICHAEL BOHNEN,

Basso of the New York Metropolitan, Added This Season a Brilliant Interpretation of Mefistofele in Faust to His Many Familiar Roles.

Gennaro Papi's Mother Dies

Word of the death of Signora Margherita Papi, mother of Maestro Gennaro Papi of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was received by Giulio Gatti-Casazza Wednesday afternoon. The cable from the conductor's brother, Giuseppe, who is chorus master of the San Carlo in Naples, reached the office of the General Manager while Mr. Papi was conducting Boris Godunoff, but was withheld from him until after the performance.

Signora Papi, who was seventy-six years old, died suddenly. According to Mr. Papi she was in excellent health and was anticipating his annual visit to Naples this summer.

Wanamaker Concert Season Ends

A Good Friday program brought to a close the season of free organ concerts in the New York Wanamaker Auditorium. Dr. Alexander Russell played Arkadelt's Ave Maria, the March Funebre et Chant-Seraphique of Guilmant, and Oreste Ravenoell's Christus Resurrexit. Esther Gustafson appeared in religious dance interpretations and F. Woodman Babbitt gave a reading of Longfellow's King Robert of Sicily, assisted at the piano by Malcolm Clegg-Maynier, who played Rosetter Cole's setting of the poem.

In the opinion of Paul Morris of the Evening World "from a purely vocal standpoint, her recital was a great success." He added that "as far as mere voice goes, there are few singers who can compete with her. She has tones of trumpet like brilliance at her disposal. And she can refine her tone to a thread, keeping its vibrant quality and beauty. She has never used her voice with more skill than last evening."

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
GLORIA SWANSON in
'Madame Sans Gene'
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
"Tides of Passion"
With
MAE MARSH
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

Lines o' News AND Chatter

Plenty of Metropolitan Opera House choice seats now. Visitors, who are strangers in New York, will be passing by the place and concluding, by the look of it, that it is a storage warehouse.

* * *

Well, that's one specimen of New York architecture.

* * *

So far as Thomas R. McDermott is concerned, the town is "closed up" until the opera starts again next fall. Mr. McDermott is the gallery god who buys tickets for every performance. When there's no opera he never crosses the Hudson river from his New Jersey home.

* * *

Yes, there's another thing. The opera house box-office staff won't be asked any foolish questions . . . until the advance sale opens in September.

* * *

After the Elman String Quartet concert there was a gathering in the Elman Riverside Drive apartment, with the customary endless variety of edibles.

* * *

So likewise at the Braslau home after Miss Sophie had sung her Carnegie Hall recital.

* * *

"From the land of the sheltering palms," writes Cecil Arden on a postcard which was mailed from Tampa, Florida.

* * *

Lines-o'-Newser got a head on view of Bob Tarrant, and . . . yes, the New Orleans fashion plate of local managers wore, trailing from the top pocket of his coat, a crepe de chine handkerchief.

* * *

Milton Aborn's part in the Schubert production of The Mikado was beautifully done. Some of the singing, and considerable of the acting (names to follow in the next issue) did not quite match.

* * *

Ganna Walska's reported intention to sue all the newspapers which print stories about her singing and the mayor of Nice may scare the critics into giving her good notices.

* * *

George Engles is sailing on the 26th for Europe, to stop a bit with Paderewski in his Switzerland home, play a game of skittles with Conductor Otto Klemperer, and let Europe generally know that the New York Symphony and one G. Engles are still on the map.

* * *

Olin Downes, one of the fairest and ablest music reviewers New York ever knew (and who writes for the Times) has a just cause for suing his city editor for libel. When Olin, rushing from Paris for Prague last summer, was dumped unceremoniously from an aeroplane, Lawrence Gilman, of the Herald Tribune, made inquiries about his confrere's condition. "Oh, he didn't meet with that kind of an accident," remarked the unsympathetic city editor. "No music critic would have nerve enough to go up in a plane, so he couldn't have fallen with one. He was just run into by an airship."

* * *

The reception which Mr. and Mrs. Richard Hageman were to have given last night in their New York home for Mme. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler had to be cancelled because of the illness of Mrs. Hageman's brother.

Ecoutez. Lucrezia Bori is to sing and play Thais at Ravinia Park this summer.

But that isn't the reason Ed Moore, critic of the Chicago Tribune, is taking Mrs. Moore on a trip to Europe.

* * *

Everybody's going to Europe ceptin' Lines-o'-Newser. John Charles Thomas is to sail, next Saturday, with Mrs. Thomas. The American baritone will have printed on his calling cards: J C. T., leading baritone, Theatre de la Monnaie, Brussels. Which is so much for so much.

* * *

But John may have to sing when Bill Brophy starts his next autumn series of Brunswick Hour of Music on the radio, "I Hear You Calling Me."

* * *

All the while Guy Golterman keeps on working on that St. Louis opera scheme of his . . . and never saying a word.

* * *

Opera wars are not to be confined, it seems, to any one city. Los Angeles is to have one, of a week's duration, next autumn.

* * *

None of the participants, however, will be Metropolitan principals. Boss Gatti has refused permission to those who wished to sing for both armies.

* * *

Have you noticed how many once-serious singers are getting into light opera? And musical comedy? Margaret Namara, f'instance, and Tom Burke, and Jerome Uhl, not to single out specially Mary Ellis, Myrtle Schaff, Sudworth Fraser and (probably) others we don't know about.

* * *

As we write, Serious Sol Hurok is putting under his arms a few desks and such and removing from Aeolian Hall down to the Manhattan Opera House, where the Hurok New York headquarters will be until further notice.

* * *

There is to be very shortly, a rush of conductors to the head (we should say to New York). Walter Rothwell, Alfred Hertz, Fritz Reiner, and Rudolph Ganz are scheduled arrivals—minus their respective symphony orchestras—in the next week or so. Nikolai Sokoloff is already here.

* * *

There were many visitors at the home of Percy Grainger in White Plains Easter afternoon . . . where a collection of photograph studies by Frederick Edward Morse were on exhibition.

* * *

Ethel Leginska again is nowhere to be found in the United States. She left for Europe last Wednesday. Other music persons of note who have recently departed these shores are Anna Case, Alfred Cortot, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Coates, Wanda Landowska, Nina Tarasova, Claire Dux, Mmes. Curt Taucher and Rudolf Laubenthal, and Mr. and Mrs. Willem Mengelberg.

* * *

And then when the Olympic left New York Friday it carried with it Maria Jeritza, Georges Enesco, Mrs. Robert Garden, the mother of Mary Garden, and George Gershwin.

* * *

A reception and supper in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Gigli at the home of Dr. John A. Harriss in New York last Tuesday preceded the departure of the tenor and his family for Europe on the S.S. France Saturday.

MUD

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

The Portland
Prospect
See Page 5

VOL. VII. NO. 28 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

John McCormack will close his current season early next month when he appears as soloist at the Cincinnati May Festival. On May 9 he will sail for Europe. He will give two London recitals in Albert Hall, London.

Bulletins of News

Because of the warmth of his reception in his recital of Shakespeare songs in Town Hall on Thursday evening, John Coates, English tenor, will appear in a second recital in New York on May 7. His second American program will be miscellaneous in character, and will be sung in Aeolian Hall.

Paris, April 24.—Andre Caplet, composer and critic, died here today at the age of forty-six. A former director of the Boston Grand Opera Company, Mr. Caplet had directed orchestras at Covent Garden in London and at the Odeon in Paris and was the first conductor of Debussy's Martyr de Saint Sebastien. For many years he studied in his native city of Havre with Henry Wollett, and in 1898 won the first prize for harmony at the Paris Conservatory. In 1901 he won the Prix de Rome.

Rochester, April 25.—The Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra will be conducted by Willem Mengelberg next season on January 14 at a special concert in the Eastman Theatre. Mr. Mengelberg's visit here as guest conductor of the orchestra will take place while Eugene Goossens is in New York as conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra.

After his Carnegie Hall recital Sunday afternoon, Mischa Elman began preparations to leave for San Francisco tomorrow, where he will be married to Helen Frances Katten on May 10. Following the wedding they will come East, stopping at Ann Arbor, Mich., where Mr. Elman will be soloist with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the May Festival at the University of Michigan. They plan to spend the summer in Europe.

Douglas Moore of Cleveland, O., and Leopold D. Mannes of New York were announced yesterday as the winners of the Pulitzer musical scholarship entitling them to $1,500 with which to take advantages of European education. The works of Mr. Moore and Mr. Mannes were of such great merit that the jury, composed of members of the teaching staff of the Department of Music in Columbia University and the teaching staff of the Institute of Musical Art, decided to award two scholarships, instead of the customary one.

Deems Taylor, composer and music reviewer of the New York World, will next season give up much of the routine of daily concert reviewing, it is reported. It is said that he will continue to be connected with the World's music department in an advisory capacity, contributing Sunday articles and occasional reviews. It is understood that Mr. Taylor will use much of his time in the composition of a symphonic work and an opera, the former to be given its premiere by the New York Symphony Orchestra, the latter by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Los Angeles Association Chooses Artists and Operas

THE repertory and artists engaged for the two weeks' season next autumn have been announced by the Los Angeles Grand Opera Association, of which Judge Benjamin F. Bledsoe is president. The season will, according to present plans, begin about September 29.

Thus far, six operas have been scheduled for presentation. Butterfly, Tosca, Navarraise, Cavalleria Rusticana, Rigoletto, and Lakme are among those that will be heard. The artists who have been engaged include Rosa Raisa, Maria Kurenko, Ulysses Lappas, Charles Hackett, Vicente Ballester, Giacomo Rimini, Kathryn Meisle, Edouard Cotreuil, and Giuseppe La Puma, with others to be announced soon.

As announced early last month, Richard Hageman will conduct the operatic offering, with Willy Tyroler, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as assistant. Desire Defrere will be stage manager.

Los Angeles will have two opera seasons this fall, for Gaetano Merola also will take his company to that city for a series of performances after those in San Francisco.

MAY 4 1925
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

200,000 Sign Petition For Summer Concerts

Hylan Remains Silent in Goldman Band Controversy.

A petition signed by more than 200,000 voters of New York City has been sent to Mayor Hylan, requesting that the Goldman Band Concerts be continued in the Mall in Central Park this summer. William Bradford Roulstone, counsel to the Parks Conservation Association, apprised the Mayor of the fact in a letter he made public Saturday. Mayor Hylan has said nothing in reply to the resolutions adopted at the recent protest mass meeting in Carnegie Hall.

The Mayor was warned by Mr. Roulstone that each day thousands more are adding their names to the petition and that a mandamus suit might be the outcome of the controversy. In part, the letter from Mr. Roulstone to the Mayor read:

"Sir—A committee of citizens called and held a mass meeting in Carnegie Hall, April 17. The 2,500 citizens present unanimously adopted resolutions in effect requesting you to permit the Goldman concerts, the most popular thing in the city, to continue this summer in Central Park. These resolutions were handed you. They informed you that the Messrs. Guggenheim were holding open their offer to donate again sixty concerts for 1925. No new terms were demanded. For one week now you have refused to grant this reasonable request of the public. The public is entitled to know why you refuse. . . . The public believes it to be your duty, under your oath of office, to permit these concerts to go on in the Park during 1925 as before."

Announce Details of Wagner and Mozart Festival in Munich

Will Give Seven Wagner Operas and Five of Mozart in Thirty-two Performances.

EASE VISITORS' RULES

Munich, April 15.—Definite dates for the operas which will be given during the Wagner and Mozart Festival to be held here from August 1 to September 9 have been decided upon. The conductors will be Richard Strauss, Hans Knappertsbusch, Robert Heger, and Karl Boehm.

The following Wagner operas will be heard at the Prince-Regent Theatre: Meistersinger, Aug. 1; Rheingold, Aug. 5; Walkuere, Aug. 7; Siegfried, Aug. 9; Goetterdaemmerung, Aug. 11; Tristan, Aug. 13; Parsifal, Aug. 15; Meistersinger, Aug. 18; Parsifal, Aug 20; Tristan, Aug. 23; Parsifal, Aug. 25, Meistersinger, Aug. 27; Tristan, Aug. 29; Parsifal, Aug. 30; Rheingold, Sept. 1; Walkuere, Sept. 2; Siegfried, Sept. 4; Goetterdaemmerung, Sept. 6; Parsifal, Sept. 8; and Meistersinger, Sept. 9. The operas will all be presented at four o'clock in the afternoon with the exception of Rheingold, which will take place at six.

At the Residence-Theatre, the Mozart operas to be presented are: Zauberfloete, Aug. 2; Figaros Hochzeit, Aug. 5; Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail, Aug. 8; Don Giovanni, Aug. 14; Zauberfloete, Aug. 16; Cosi Fan Tutte, Aug. 21; Don Giovanni, Aug. 22; Die Entfuehrung, Aug. 24; Figaros Hochzeit, Aug. 26; Cosi Fan Tutte, Aug. 28; Zauberfloete, Sept. 3; and Don Giovanni, Sept. 5.

Among the singers who will be heard are Laurenz Hofer, Heinrich Rehkemper, Dr. Emily Schipper, Richard Tauber, Hermann Wiedemann, Desider Zador, Rosette Anday, Gertrud Kappel, Felicie Mihacsek, Maria Olszewska, and Elisabeth Schumann. The orchestra will be that of the Bavarian State Theatre.

Foreign visitors to the Festival Plays will need only the German visa on their passports. Former regulations which required special permits to enter Bavaria and a personal call at Police Headquarters have been cancelled. After May 1, when sale opens, orders for seats can be sent to the general agency, Amtliches Bayerisches Reisebureau, 16 Promenadeplatz, Munich, or to the Tageskasse Derstaatstheater, Max Josephs-Platz, Munich. The prices at the Prince-Regent Theatre are all twenty gold marks, those of the Residence range from thirty-five to six gold marks.

Announce Festival Guest Singers

Guest artists who will be heard at Bayreuth and at Baden-Baden in the festivals there during the coming July and August include Lucille Chalfont, Raymonde Delaunois, Helen Kanders, and Marie Rappold; and Edward Lankow, George Meader, and Joseph Schwarz, according to an announcement by Jules Daiber, American representative of these festivals.

Gershwin and Taylor to Write Special Music

Invited by N. Y. Symphony to Prepare New Compositions for Premieres Next Season.

Deems Taylor and George Gershwin have been commissioned by the New York Symphony Society to write orchestrlal works for presentation by the orchestra next season under Walter Damrosch's baton.

Mr. Gershwin plans to write his work, a New York Concerto, while he is in London. He will play the piano part with the New York Symphony in Carnegie Hall December 3 and 4, and at tour concerts in Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. Mr. Taylor has not as yet decided upon the nature of his composition, but it will be a suite in four movements.

The orchestra's list of soloists as announced for next year includes Roland Hayes, Reinald Werrenrath, Florence Easton, Harold Bauer, Lawrence Tibbett, Pablo Casals, Emilio de Gogorza, Albert Spalding, Yolanda Mero, Jacques Thibaud, George Barrere, Walter Gieseking, Mischa Mischakoff, Frieda Hempel, Josef Hofmann, Sigrid Onegin, George Gershwin, and Paul Kochanski.

Four opera programs will be presented at the Sunday concerts. The more important selections of Wagner's first opera, Rienzi, will be given. This music has not been heard in New York since the old days of German opera at the Metropolitan. Wagner's last work, Parsifal, is also scheduled for presentation in concert form. The program will begin with the Transformation music and will include the entire scene in the Hall of the Holy Grail. Soloists, a boys' chorus and a men's chorus of four hundred will supplement the orchestra at this concert. The third opera program will be Beethoven's Fidelio, given with soloists, orchestra and a chorus of 300.

At Christmas, on December 27, the mediaeval miracle play, The Children at Bethlehem, with Pierne's music, will be performed. Already plans have been made for a large children's chorus. The play will be given with full costumes and scenery.

Walter Damrosch plans to devote one concert to Modern Music, Pleasant and Unpleasant. He will explain his views on this subject, illustrating with excerpts at the piano. This program will also include the first appearance in America of Walter Gieseking, who will play Nights in Spanish Gardens, by De Falla, and Chamber Music No. 2, by Hindesmith. At another concert Paul Kochanski will play a new violin concerto by Prokofieff.

The New York season of the orchestra will open October 30, with Walter Damrosch. He will continue as conductor until January 4, when Eugene Goossens will fill the post of guest conductor for two weeks. During the second half of the season Otto Klemperer will act as guest conductor. The season will include twelve Thursday afternoon and twelve Friday evening concerts, twenty Sunday afternoon concerts, six Saturday afternoon concerts for young people, five Saturday morning concerts for children, and six Saturday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn.

GEORGE GERSHWIN

American Composer Who Has Been Requested by the New York Symphony Orchestra to Prepare a New Work for Piano and Orchestra in the Premiere of Which He Will Be Soloist Next Season.

Chaliapin Sues Chicago Opera

Chicago, April 20.—Feodor Chaliapin, basso last season with the Chicago Civic Opera Company today filed suit for $25,000 damages against the company. His lawyers said the suit was the result of an injunction obtained by the company against the appearance of Chaliapin in a concert in Washington previous to his appearance there with the opera company.

The injunction was later changed to allow Chaliapin to appear in concert if his appearance were not advertised.

Attorneys also explained that the opera company contracted with Chaliapin to appear in thirty performances last season at $3,500 a performance and that only twenty-four performances were given, the company having also entered into a contract with Chaliapin's manager giving the latter the power to excuse the opera company from filling the thirty dates. Chaliapin claims he knew nothing of this contract and that his manager had no right to enter into it, his lawyers said.

Bohnen Sings In Last Aida

A capacity audience heard the season's last performance of Aida at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on April 17. The cast was a familiar one, except that Michael Bohnen sang the role of Amonasro in which he was heard but once last year. The Telegram-Mail found him "imposingly barbaric" and the Sun reported that he "earned his full share of the evening's glory." Tullio Serafin conducted.

Cleveland Concerts Offer Varied Novelties

Eichheim Is Guest Leader of His Oriental Sketches; New York Trio Heard.

Cleveland, April 20.—The concert of the Cleveland Orchestra which introduced a novelty in the form of Eichheim's Oriental Sketches conducted by the composer and the appearance of the New York Trio shared the attention of the concert-going public here last week.

The New York Trio, composed of Clarence Adler, pianist, Cornelius van Vliet, cello, and Louis Edlin, violin, gave its first Cleveland concert in Wade Park Manor last Tuesday in the closing concert of the Chamber Music Society's series.

According to James H. Rogers (Plain Dealer) they proved "a rarely accomplished group of players." Mr. Edlin, known here as former concertmaster of the Cleveland orchestra, "now, as of yore, plays with verve, with unfailing skill, with refinement and with sensitive grasp of musical values." Mr. Rogers also found his associates performers "of notable gifts." He wrote that "Mr. van Vliet draws a tone of singularly ingratiating quality from his fine instrument; and Mr. Adler at all times plays with expertness, clarity and discrimination."

In this reviewer's opinion, their "individual excellences were merged in an admirable ensemble. The balance of tone was well proportioned; phrasing and shading were pliant, artfully worked out; and there was spirit in the more animated passages as well as expressiveness in songful periods." Eleanor Clarage of the Times found "an almost automatic precision about their work; a uniformity that was amazing in its perfection."

In addition to Schubert's Trio in B flat and Smetana's in G minor, the ensemble played Three Nocturnes dedicated to them by Ernest Bloch. Miss Clarage liked their "rare and exotic charm" and thought them "brilliantly conceived and arranged."

* * *

Wilson G. Smith wrote in the Press that he found the Oriental Sketches "exotic music with the glamour of the Orient in all its hideous cacophony and discordant twanging of crude and almost aboriginal instruments." Mr Smith thought they "disclosed a fine musicianship, both in structural development and exotic colored orchestration." The work was received with some reserve by Archie Bell of the News.

The orchestra was led by Nikolai Sokoloff through Vaughan Williams' London Symphony and Goldmark's Sakuntala Overture.

Gabrilowitsch Soloist in Closing Concert

Plays Tschaikowsky Concerto and Conducts Heldenleben in Detroit; Gallo Opera.

Detroit, April 21.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch did double duty at the final pair of concerts played last week by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. He conducted the orchestra in Strauss' Ein Heldenleben and d'Indy's Istar Variations and appeared as soloist in Tschaikowsky's First Piano Concerto.

Ralph Holmes wrote in the Times that the pianist gave "a completely satisfying interpretation, opalescent in its shadings, smooth in its texture always—for Gabrilowitsch never turns music into noise—and mounting splendidly to its climaxes." His "superb artistry" called forth the admiration of Charlotte M. Tarsney of the Free Press who also spoke of Victor Kolar's "masterly reading" of the orchestral part. The chronicler in the News asserted that he not only excelled himself but "seemed inspired," putting into his part "all his fine musicianship."

* * *

Josephine Lucchese, who was obliged to cancel some recent engagements because of illness, had sufficiently recovered to appear here with the San Carlo Opera Company in Lucia and Rigoletto. After her "mad scene" in the former opera the applause nearly stopped the performance. Miss Tarsney wrote that there was no trace of her recent illness in Miss Lucchese's performance and that she was "in remarkably beautiful voice." Her work as Gilda in Rigoletto was commended by the reviewers with equal enthusiasm.

WALTER GOLDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
Available for accompanying in the East
Studio Address: Steinway Bldg.
109 West 57th St., New York

GEORGE E. SHEA
VOCAL INSTRUCTION
STAGE ROUTINE for OPERA
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149
MEMBER AMERICAN ACADEMY OF TEACHERS OF SINGING

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

ELSA ALSEN
Famous Wagnerian Dramatic Soprano
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG 1425 Broadway, New York City

CECILE de HORVATH
PIANIST
Management: Clarence E. Cramer, 1102 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Baldwin Piano De Luxe Welte-Mignon Records

Waning Boston Season Marked by Recitals

Boston, April 23.—Two youthful artists were heard here last week. Sammy Kramer, twelve year old violinist, and Grace Cronin, child pianist, both gave recitals Wednesday evening in Symphony and Jordan Halls respectively. The only other recitalists were Granville Stewart, tenor, Charles Touchette, pianist, and Godfrey Wetterlow, violinist.

Sammy Kramer was accompanied by Joseph Adler in the Handel A major Sonata, Joachim's Variations in E minor, Wieniawski's Concerto in D minor, and Vieuxtemps' Ballade et Polonaise. The Globe writer thought he showed "a prodigious technique" and added that "he has a good sense of rhythm, phrases well, seems to understand that a piece of music is an organic whole. . . . Talent he certainly has, but how much only time will tell."

The Herald reviewer felt certain that he has "unusual talent." He commented that in quiet passages "he plays with a sweet tone, moderately strong, with musical phrasing and taste." Both these writers doubted the advisability of his early concert appearances from the point of view of his artistic development. The chronicler of the Transcript thought the concert "an unqualified success" and lauded his technique and musicianship.

* * *

Young Miss Cronin played Chopin's B minor Concerto, Scarlatti's Sonata in A major and his Pastorale, the Allegro from Schumann's Faschingswank aus Wein, and others. According to the Transcript, "her technique already looms large and is in many ways perfect. Intricate passage work does not baffle her, but flows along with feeling of ease. Pedalling is clear, clean, neat. Tone is good. The fullest sonority has of course not yet been attained. As to musicianship, molding and proportioning of large stretches of music was often well done."

The Globe highly praised her technique, phrasing, and shading, but found her interpretations lacking in feeling or understanding. Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald said she had "amazing virility, a certain elan, a touch that is firm and at times quite beautiful. Her technique is large and pliant, although not always accurate." Miss Gerstein, however, observed that the child has not yet learned the art of nuance.

* * *

Granville Stewart was assisted by William Lawrence, pianist, at his Steinert Hall recital Tuesday evening. Philip Hale (Herald) asserted that the tenor "has a voice of fine quality, one that lends itself easily to declamatory measures without undue effort, sympathetic in the interpretation of the gentler emotions. . . . He has, it is plain, a musical nature." Mr. Stewart often phrased well and showed understanding of his songs, according to Mr. Hale.

The singer gave proof of "a well timbred, smooth, even voice," wrote the Transcript commentator, "clouded only in the lower tones. Often he used this voice with discretion and intelligence. Occasionally he treated it as a showy instrument."

* * *

Messrs. Touchette and Wetterlow were heard in a joint recital in Jordan Hall the same evening. To quote the Transcript, Mr. Wetterlow "is a violinist of solid average technical ability. His tone was usually good, but it can be spoken of in no superlatives. His bowing was flexible;" and "Mr. Touchette's tone, too, was often noticeable for its beauty." This reviewer added that it was "in their ensemble playing, their keeping together and supplementing and complementing each other that the two players did their best work."

METROPOLITAN OPERA ON TOUR

In the Auditorium—Cleveland, Ohio

TONIGHT

Faust—with Mmes. Alda and Dalossy; and Messrs. Tokatyan, de Luca, and Chaliapin; Mr. Hasselmans conducting.

WEDNESDAY

Trovatore—with Mmes. Ponselle and Gordon; and Messrs. Martinelli and Danise; Mr. Papi conducting.

THURSDAY

Falstaff—with Mmes. Bori, Mario, and Telva; and Messrs. Tokatyan, Scotti, and Tibbett; Mr. Serafin conducting.

FRIDAY

Pagliacci and Coq d'Or—the former with Mme. Rethberg and Messrs. Martinelli and Danise, Mr. Papi conducting; the latter with Mmes. Sabanieva and Galli, and Messrs. Diaz, Didur, Bonfiglio, and Kosloff; Mr. Bamboschek conducting.

SATURDAY

Parsifal (matinee)—with Mmes. Easton and Telva; and Messrs. Taucher, Whitehill, Bohnen, and Didur; Mr. Serafin conducting.

Traviata (evening)—with Mme. Bori and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and de Luca; Mr. Bamboschek conducting.

SUNDAY

Gala Concert—with Mmes. Rethberg, Mario, and Gordon; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Tokatyan, Tibbett, Picco, Rothier, and Gustafson; Messrs. Serafin, Papi, Hasselmans, Bamboschek, and Setti conducting.

Music Convention in Washington

Washington, April 21.—A convention for world fellowship through music assembled here Thursday, with international amity through music as its goal. A reception to the diplomatic corps and State delegates by the convention committee, presentation of the Bach Choir of Bethlehem, Pa., at the White House and the rendition by the choir and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra of Bach's Mass in B minor in the Washington Auditorium were principal features of the first day's program.

Mayor Proclaims Music Week

Mayor Hylan of New York gave official sanction to the sixth annual observation of Music Week from May 3 to 9 in a proclamation on April 20. This called attention to the fact that Music Week will open with exercises in the churches, schools and theatres on Sunday, May 3. On the afternoon of that day there will be a community sing in Central Park.

Harpist Passes Away

Mme. Kitty Berger, harpist, died of heart disease in the Presbyterian Hospital, New York, on Wednesday. She had been ill several weeks. Mme. Berger was fifty-four years old, and known in private life as Mrs. Paul Pancritius. She was born in Austria. New York heard her in recital last April.

Brahms' Requiem Sung in Boston

Koussevitzky Conducts Harvard and Radcliffe Singers; Ethyl Hayden and Saslawsky Soloists.

Boston, April 22.—Brahms' Requiem was sung in Symphony Hall last Thursday and Friday evenings by the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky. An orchestra recruited from the Boston Symphony assisted, and the soloists were Ethyl Hayden, soprano, and Boris Saslawsky, baritone.

The Globe writer asserted that the conductor's "splendidly dramatic interpretation of the music was one of his most notable achievements in Boston. Mr. Koussevitzky was in control of a fine musical instrument, upon which he played superbly." This reviewer wrote that "the volume and quality of tone from the chorus last night, the precision in attacks, the well modeled climaxes, the clearness with which the many strands of the tonal texture were indicated by the separate voices were worthy of the best professional choruses." Miss Hayden's "beautiful voice and intelligent singing" and Mr. Saslawsky's "sombre tones and imaginative interpretations" were commended by this writer.

It was called a "notable occasion" by Mr. Smith, (Post) who thought the chorus, "as sure and unconstrained as it was expressive and tonally beautiful," bore witness to the success of Dr. Davison's training. The chorus, Dr. Davison, and Mr. Koussevitzky received the praise of the Transcript reviewer. He wrote that Miss Hayden invested her brief part with "a clear, resonant and beautiful tone, admirably controlled," and that the baritone "lacked somewhat the resonant quality" necessary to make his work stand out against the chorus.

The Herald chronicler observed that Dr. Davison "richly deserved" the tribute given him as the chorus sang "with fine accuracy." He also commented that the conductor was "not content to let Brahms speak for himself."

The novelty on the program of last week's pair of Symphony concerts, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was The Garden of Fand, by Arnold Bax. Sergei Rachmaninoff played his Second Concerto with the orchestra, and Strauss' Ein Heldenleben had its first performance by the orchestra since 1910.

Stuart Mason wrote in the Christian Science Monitor that Mr. Rachmaninoff's interpretation of his work was "fairly overwhelming," although it was playing which "astonished by its virtuosity rather than playing which stirred the deeper emotions." According to Warren Storey Smith, of the Post, he played with "surpassing eloquence," and Philip Hale (Herald) agreed that the performance was "superb." Other reviewers agreed.

The Garden of Fand, to quote Mr. Mason, is "fanciful, imaginative music. . . . The very brilliance of the orchestration somewhat defeats the composer's purpose, for the wealth of color ends by becoming slightly monotonous; yet as a whole the composition delights by reason of the delicacy of its workmanship, and the surety with which the composer's altogether poetical conception is realized." H. T. Parker, of the Transcript, commented that, beneath its sheen and fantasy, "it remains a well-knit, well-favored, self-contained music." According to Philip Hale, Mr. Bax tells his story in music that is beautiful, not "fussily descriptive." The writer in the Globe thought the work unimportant and unimpressive.

Mr. Smith wrote that the Strauss tone poem again seemed music "of epic dimensions and of true epic quality." In the opinion of the Globe writer it is "essentially mediocre." This same difference of opinion was found among the other writers, although they were agreed that the performance was excellent. Koussevitzky had made some rearrangement of the seating of his men, but no tonal difference was reported.

On Sunday the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky gave a concert for the Pension Fund. Ein Heldenleben was again played, with Mr. Burgin playing the solo violin part, and the rest of the program was made up of three Wagner excerpts — the Waldweben from Siegfried, the Good Friday Spell from Parsifal, and the Overture to Tannhaeuser.

ROSA PONSELLE
Exclusive Management
NATIONAL CONCERTS, INC.
1451 Broadway—New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: D. F. McSWEENEY, CHARLES L. WAGNER
511 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

Elena GERHARDT
Management: GEORGE ENGLES—Aeolian Hall, New York City
STEINWAY PIANO

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

FLORENCE MACBETH
Leading Coloratura Soprano
Chicago Civic Opera Company

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 28

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year. U. S.; Canada, $6.00; Foreign Countries, $7.00

Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It wi l build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

A Constructive Influence

It would be difficult to find a more constructive influence upon a community than that exerted by a full-fledged symphony orchestra. Even an orchestra which is not of the rank of the twelve foremost organizations in this country does its share.

While chamber music is admitted to be the highest form of music, it is that dispensed by a symphony aggregation which goes farther and does more . . . because of its superior flexibility, the vast array of literature available, and the variety of tonal color and other instrumental effects possible to a symphony orchestra of the highest character.

In such a country as the United States, where materialism has gone on to such ends, there are needed for stabilization of the social fabric all the cultural influences that can be commanded. And particularly has there been, during the past decade, such need—a need never more apparent than now.

A nation courts danger when it concerns itself with purely material things, to the exclusion of food for the spiritual side of human nature and for its aesthetic side also. During the past few years the people have prospered as never before, and they have indulged themselves, too, in ways that augur no good for their future.

Music of the better sort seems to have exerted a beneficial effect upon mankind. It soothes, just as it uplifts. Those who have come to be acquainted with fine music well interpreted have found in it a source of enjoyment, and a stimulation to fine thoughts and aspirations. There are instances, and many of them, where a superior concert has helped to save the day for both man and woman.

New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Los Angeles, and San Francisco are the cities which maintain the twelve foremost symphony orchestras of this country. Through them there are served, in some measure, scores of other communities which cannot support such organizations. Thus are numerous splendid messages carried to many thousands of people, at a cost to the organizations of something like one and one-quarter millions of dollars annually. A few public spirited citizens guaranty this deficit. What deed!

The future of these orchestras is threatened by demands for increased salaries on the part of the musicians who play in them. Those demands have gone on, every few years, until the limit has about been reached.

It is a matter for serious consideration by those men, and the officers of the unions to which most of them belong. Those who have never read the fable of the goose and the golden eggs should lose no time in doing so . . . and in giving the moral some thought.

With the death of Charles Shul (popularly known as Schultz) the New York music scene has lost a colorful character. He was frankly a claquer and was most active at the Metropolitan, although concert audiences often heard his "iron" hands beating.

Rochester's Philharmonic Orchestra is holding to its traditions—brief though they may be—in engaging distinguished conductors as guests. Mengelberg is the latest to consent to wave a stick over its members.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

MODERN composers, who are paying inordinate attention to grotesque and comic music, are in a way begging the question of style. The contemporary idioms are queer and incomprehensible to the traditional ear. Their extraordinary antics have made listeners brought up to diatonic and mildy chromatic styles laugh even when the modern composers by their own lights have been serious. This is true of Varese and Ruggles now as it was of Schoenberg and Stravinsky and Ornstein a dozen years ago.

So long as a new composer who is being laughed at continues to be serious in his own way, one can suspect that perhaps he really is as grave as he pretends to be, and that some time everyone will understand and sympathize with his gravity.

Many of the moderns, however, tend to capitalize the potentialities for humor which their music has while it is little understood, and use precisely their serious devices to create comedy. In this case one can suspect that they themselves are not sure of their style, and are groping for a technique.

Thus when Casella, for example, writes a banal Valse Sentimentale in polytonal terms, the interest of his music is likely to run to no higher level than that of the type of music which he is caricaturing in the first place. The material is banal, and the fact that the composer intended it to be so for the sake of his portrait is not very important. The result is likely to be parlor comedy.

PARLOR comedy is all very well—in the parlor. The moderns have a way of bringing it into the market place. Among the very few American compositions which the authorities of the International Society for Contemporary Music have considered representative and worth performance at their coming festival in Prague is Gruenberg's Daniel Jazz.

The judgment seems to me in this case entirely wrong. Daniel Jazz is a bit of horseplay whose appeal is based entirely upon the verses which it accompanies, and on a few felicitous elements in the music which remind the listener of his humorous attitude towards the Salvation Army, if he has one.

The same sort of thing may be said of Stravinsky's Ragtime and even his Renard. Yet one can see plainly at work in this composer a general contemporary tendency to realize the limitations of pure comedy and caricature in music. This tendency, a sort of modern renascence of "classicism," is crystallizing itself in a great mass of music which not only avoids the attempt to make capital of its "grotesque" qualities, but aims to rest entirely on musical interest in itself, and dodges every programmatic connotation.

COMPOSERS in search of a style often make use of the interest of exotic modes. The search of modern musicians for new scales is relentless, although Mozart probably never thought of such a thing.

Often this dependence on the fascination of what is strange is an indication that a composer is searching for a manner of speaking. Perfect illustration of this fact is offered by American composers who undertake to write opears. In most instances their subject matter has been foreign, and often it has gone as far astray as the Orient.

Now that the Metropolitan has "commissioned" an American composer to write an opera, the question is raised as to what would be fitting matter and manner for an American music-drama. It is odd that this question should be as puzzling as it actually is.

The most important reason why it is puzzling is that an American operatic composer at present must be a pioneer. He has practically no traditions upon which he may base his style. Doubtless an American blood-and-thunder opera with a chorus of New England farmers would have difficulty in convincing an audience. To a certain extent its unpersuasiveness may be dependent on the fact that American farmers are not, in the popular mind, a singing stock.

An Italian peasant chorus, on the other hand, is quite all right, although one may argue justly that Italians, too, are not in real life accustomed to sing in a group while their neighbors murder or make love to each other. The fact is that the Italian opera chorus has established itself as a stage habit. It has a fixed and unmistakable place in the play ensemble just as has the scenery. Having accepted the Italian opera idea as a whole, one no more questions the existence of the chorus than one calls attention to the pasteboard in a tree.

THE American opera of today or of the future cannot rely on a familiar operatic convention because there is none that is native and solidly established. An audience that will tolerate an Italian peasant chorus because it has grown used to it in a certain type of opera in a certain language is likely to laugh at a chorus of New England farmers. It has never seen one like it, and will therefore judge it by its own realistic capabilities.

It stands to reason that the Americant composer who wishes to produce a convincing opera must step carefully. Comic or exotic or very romantic motifs are likely to be the easiest to handle, for a colorful and fantastic mood is easiest established and maintained.

There is no reason for believing that it is necessary for the American composer to follow implicitly a single foreign stylistic model. The man who will begin an American school will write something as original in its way as Tannhaeuser and Pelleas when they were composed.

One thing is certain. It will not do to lay too much emphasis on the music and too little on the play. If anything the balance ought even to lean the other way. That has been the tendency in all modern schools of opera. It will have to be in the American, too, especially since Americans have an extensive theatre tradition by whose standard they are bound to measure even the operatic native drama.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

The Portland Prospect

Theodore Spiering Tells of His Plans for Next Season as Conductor of the Oregon City's Symphony Orchestra

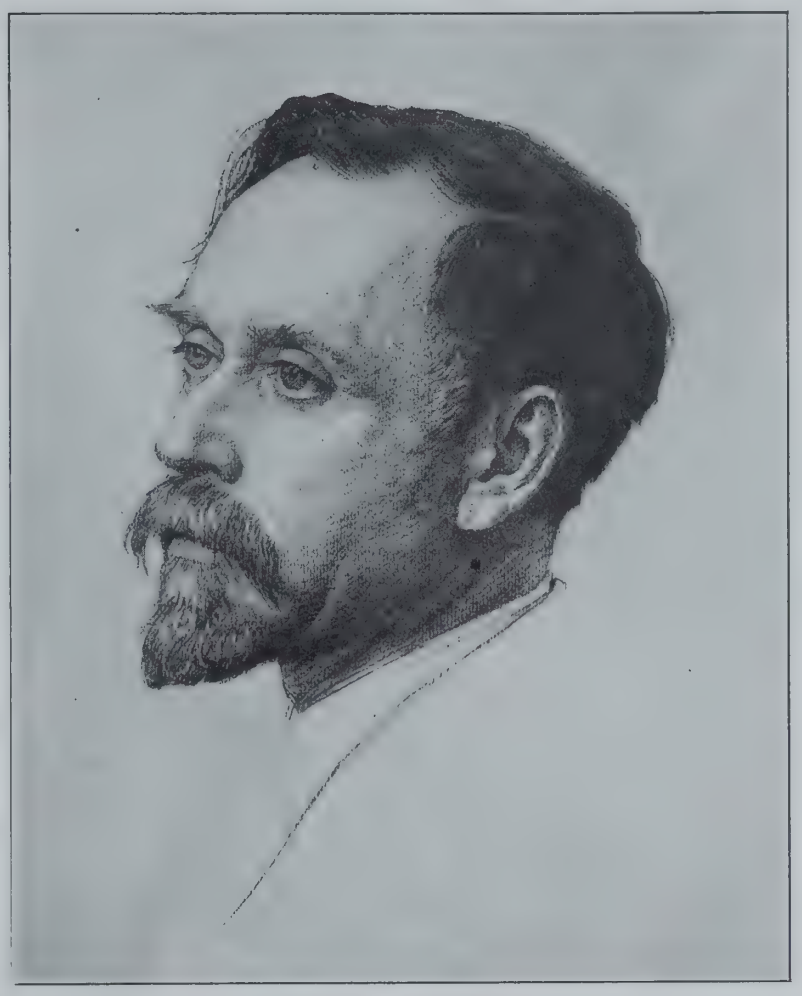
by KAY KENNEDY

"THE Northwestern part of this country is undoubtedly ready for a symphony orchestra of the first rank. There is a large and appreciative musical audience waiting to support such an organization—and it is an audience of much greater cultural development than some Easterners are wont to believe."

Theodore Spiering, conductor, composer, and violinist, has recently accepted the engagement as regular conductor of the Portland (Oregon) Symphony Orchestra for next season and already he is busy planning his work. As we sat in his large, pleasant New York studio, he expressed his faith in the orchestral development of America.

"During my recent visit to Portland as guest conductor, I was particularly impressed with the genuine desire evidenced by the concert-going public to keep abreast of all new artistic developments.

"Portland has a populaton of over 300,000—adequate to support a large orchestra. What is more important, the desire for cultural expansion is sufficiently pronounced so that the upbuilding of a first class institution can be accomplished in the near future. A fortunate circumstance is that Portland possesses a municipal auditorium acoustically adapted to symphony concerts. At the concert which I conducted, there was an attendance of close to 3,000—the capacity of the hall. Considering the population of the city, such an attendance indicates a high percentage of musical interest."



THEODORE SPIERING

According to present plans, the orchestral series in Portland will consist of eight subscripton concerts, four or five children's concerts and possibly some popular concerts.

Mr. Spiering picked up a volume which was lying on the table beside him, incidentally remarking that it was a splendid new Handel Biography, by Hugo Leichtentritt, which he had recently received. Weighing it absentmindedly in one hand, he seemed to deliberate.

"The importance of the various attempts in smaller cities to organize and foster symphony orchestras—even though frequently on a very small scale—should not be minimized. These attempts should receive every encouragement for they are kindling new fires of enthusiasm and are paving the way for a cultural development that is sweeping the entire country.

"This increase of orchestral organizations," Mr. Spiering continued, "offers possibilities of great interest and importance to young American musicians—the long sought for opportunity for the player, the composer and the conductor. It exposes, however, the insufficient preparatory orchestral training of many of these musicians. There should be more schools offering special courses for such training, not only for string players but for those of all other orchestral instruments. A noteworthy and successful beginning has been made in this direction by the Civic Orchestra in Chicago under the guidance of Messrs. Frederick Stock and Eric De Lamarter. The orchestra in New York conducted by Chalmers Clifton and sponsored by Mrs. Harriman is still another such institution. I feel that the creation of an orchestral training school for the Northwest would prove of immense practical value in a general scheme of musical development.

"In this country the young student often regards orchestral training as a hindrance to his career, not knowing that some of the greatest artists of the past rose to fame from orchestral ranks.

"Do you know," he confided, "that the orchestral literature of today requires a great virtuosity on the part of the players. I have known of instances when first players in the orchestra have been better performers than the soloists whom they were accompanying."

Mr. Spiering's words were checked as the forgotten volume fell from his hands to the floor with a thump. He smiled and replaced it on the table.

Most of Mr. Spiering's conducting has been done in Europe—in Germany in particular. Referring to his earlier career Mr. Spiering stated that although brought up in a conservative musical atmosphere, he is nevertheless keenly interested in modern and ultra-modern tendencies. Undoubtedly Mr. Spiering's work with the Portland orchestra will mirror these different influences as well as his unusual artistic receptivity and versatility.

His experience as a conductor enables him fully to comprehend the problems facing him in the building up of an orchestra.

"One phase of my prospective work in Portland pleases me particularly," he went on, "I shall have plenty of opportunity for careful and detailed rehearsals. In New York, for instance, conductors are so rushed with the crowding of concerts, that they are often forced to make repetitions in their programs. I hope to be able to offer Portland varied yet carefully prepared programs that will help to foster the musical interest, already well established there.

"At first my programs will be made up largely of standard works," Mr. Spiering explained in the same quiet, serious tones. "The classics serve as a firm foundation for any orchestral program. However, this does not signify that important new works will not be represented. I shall, of course, include a number of American compositions. I think that it is one of the first obligations of a conductor to encourage contemporary composers. At this point I should like to say, that it requires more thought and consideration to plan the programs for a community in which the opportunity to hear orchestral concerts is limited, than in the orchestral centers of the East for instance, where repetition and experiment are frequent occurrences."

"You see," Mr. Spiering said with a smile, "a conductor, to be adequate in his task must needs be at once a high priest of the old gods and a prophet of the new; at once a prophet and a seer; a follower after the essentially fine and a leader pointing others towards it. If we truly believe music—in fact any of the arts—to be the enduring substance of life—a conductor has an exalted and spiritual mission to fill."

Shavitch Re-Engaged in Syracuse

Syracuse, April 23.—With an audience which crowded Keith's Theatre to capacity, the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra closed its season yesterday in a concert that included Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony and the Folovetskian Dances from Borodin's Prince Igor. It has been announced that Vladimir Shavitch will return to conduct the Orchestra next season.

Kathryn Meisle, contralto, was soloist at the final concert, and a chorus of 100 voices assisted in the Borodin number.

Virginia Ruggiero to Play

Virginia Ruggiero, pianist, will give a recital under the auspices of the Washington Heights Musical Club in New York this evening. Beethoven, Debussy, Moszkowski, MacDowell, and Chopin will comprise her program.

RATA PRESENT
Pianiste of Re-Engagements
Management of Rata Present: Hotel Ansonia, New York City
AMPICO RECORDS

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1921
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

Photo by White Studio

LEVITZKI

"FOR him the piano sang with a tone of unearthly beauty. It rivalled the choirs of the orchestra in its seeming variety of color. He discovered the humor as well as the sentiment, the poetry as well as the strength and vigor of the work. In short, a master played a masterpiece. Wherefore he deserved the tributes of breathless silence and tumultuous applause which his listeners of yesterday accorded him."

GLENN DILLARD GUNN in Chicago Herald and Examiner of February 16, 1925.

Solidly booked from September 1st, 1925, to February 15th, 1926— Available only through March and early April

Steinway Piano
Ampico Rolls
Columbia Records

Exclusive Management
DANIEL MAYER
Aeolian Hall :: New York

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

IMPARTIALITY is a sterling quality. Those who possess it occasionally find their courses disturbed, because a sincerely expressed opinion or action now and again is misconstrued. But it has ever been that way in life. The best of intentions not infrequently are regarded as representative of something quite different.

Daily newspaper music reviewers particularly in the large cities, find themselves the subject of criticism by those about whom articles are written. Such criticism may, and does, have its just bestowal; for the music reviewer, like the artist or organization or composer, may slip Nothing in this world is quite perfect, and the critics (poor souls) cannot escape offending.

In New York, where the corps comprises some of the ablest and most conscientious chroniclers to be found in all the world, there occurs several times every season some incident which draws forth upon some of these chroniclers' heads the wrath of some musician, and the musician's friends

AS A MEMBER of New York's corps of music reviewers I know rather well how they work, and what manner of men the ablest of them are. For twelve years I worked side by side with them. So their mistakes are perhaps a little clearer to me than to others, as are the causes for those mistakes.

When any one of the New York daily newspaper music chroniclers fails to do his full duty it is displeasing. Since the role of the professional judge is a serious one it is my belief that it should be treated with the importance it deserves. And every job should be done with the consciousness of its responsibility—to everyone concerned.

Whatever may be lacking in the recording of an opinion by those New York newspaper music reviewers one thing is certain: it is free from bias. These men are sincere, and they are honest. They do not grind in their columns anybody's personal axe. Personalities, and personal differences between persons who are not concerned in a review, are not permitted to enter into it or to influence a review. That is a matter which should be borne in mind—by quite a number of people.

MISCHA ELMAN'S String Quartet has caused something of a stir. It deserves to have done so. Its third concert took place the other evening, and it sent a keenly discriminating throng away from New York's Town Hall in a happy frame of mind.

The Elman organization offers something which most string quartets don't possess. It is an essential vitality of tone and style possible only where the first violinist commands such qualities as does Mr. Elman.

Its Wednesday night concert revealed a more marked cohesiveness amongst the members than did the two concerts preceding; a greater degree of elasticity, and color too. Even so, the program was not prepared as the Quartet would have liked. Most of the rehearsing was devoted to the Brahms, which left the Haydn and the Mozart to shift more for themselves.

All the same the quartets by those last mentioned masters were beautifully played. What mattered if there was not a finish corresponding to the sandpapered fineness of our best known and most illustrious string quartets? Who cared for any slips? You heard something, and you got something. That was what counted most.

I understand that Mr. Elman wants to devote, next season, as much of his time to his String Quartet as he can. That no doubt will depend on how much of a demand there is for it. He would prefer, I am told, to devote himself exclusively to quartet playing. Perhaps, yet I doubt if he will. One thing is certain, Mischa Elman as a soloist will find himself improved through being a string quartet first violinist and leader. Incidentally, the other three members of the Elman organization, who deserve to be singled out and praised, are: Edward Bachman, violin; Nicholas Moldavan, viola; Horace Britt, cello.

I HAVE received the following interesting story from Monsieur Simon of the Judson staff:

"Before sailing for Albania to write his opera with Arthur Train, Ernest Schelling gave a party in his New York home in honor of another voyager—Willem Mengelberg, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The party was not 'one of those things.' It was a musical Lambs' Gambol, consisting of a joint recital by three noted prodigies of the piano, an illustrated biography of Mr. Mengelberg and a lecture on modern music by Mr. Schelling. The last two items resembled in some degree Mr. Schelling's Celebrated Children's Concerts, although some mammas might have had to explain a word here or there to les jeunes filles.

"The prodigies were Masters Ernest Hutcheson, Harold Bauer and Ernest Schelling, who played, probably for the last time in public, the works which they had performed at their youthful debuts. Master Hutcheson rippled off Glittering Spray by Eisenhauer or Reisenauer or some such composer; Master Bauer played his own version of The Happy Farmer (that's the piece that goes 'Da-dum, da-dum, da-dum, dum, dum, dum, dum' in the left hand) and a polka of his own manufacture; and Master Schelling played La Gazelle. Before the roasts, Masters Hutcheson and Bauer played The Last Rose of Summer, arranged for four hands in the familiar Schmuhlbrecht transcription. Everyone including the guests of honor, Bill Daly, Charles Hanson Towne and Sam Bottenheim, agreed that the boys had a great future.

"Mr. Schelling then narrated the saga of Willem Mengelberg, illustrated by lantern slides especially made for this occasion. Some of the slides slid faster than others, which may have been intentional, but all rights, including the Netherlandish, were knocked down immediatly after the lecture to an unidentified patron of the arts. This was the only casualty of the evening.

"In conclusion, Howard Brockway intoned Mr. Schelling's gibberish on modern music, with incidental ensemble work by Messrs. Brockway, Schelling, Heifetz, Kochanski, Guidi, Lange, Hekking and Daly. Jascha Heifetz played a monochord solo (a monochord is a step-ladder fiddle, bowed with tongs), Dr. George Draper played a Chopin Nocturne and several encores on a musical saw, and early in the morning Mischa Levitzki played his Waltz.

"Mr. Schelling's lecture on modern music probably will be printed in full soon. It ranges from Sacre Printemps to Intergrowls, which latter piece is scored for piano, typewriter, gravel, ratchets, coal bucket, wheel rattle, cymbals, tambourines, balloons and crockery. Mr. Schelling's crockery solo formed a stirring climax to this amazing work, first performed, according to Mr. Schelling, by the Philadelphia Malevolent Sewing Circle."

NOW COMES Rudolph Ganz, of the St. Louis Symphony, with what he calls "The Conductor's Chat With His Audience." It is a four page folder, which begins by telling that John McCormack submitted a questionnaire not long ago to his immense audience, seeking from its members an expression regarding "the welcome or unwelcome presence of classical airs and lesser known art songs" on the tenor's programs.

Mr. Ganz then proceeds to state that during the last four St. Louis Symphony seasons fifty different orchestra compositions have had first presentations, with twenty new names added to the long list offered since Mr. Ganz assumed his conductorship post.

Thereafter the Chat submits nine questions, followed by an expression of appreciation for patronage conferred and an au revoir until the autumn of 1925. The questions are of sufficient general interest to warrant reproduction here, and are as follows:

1. Is an annual Wagner program welcome to you?
2. Also one by Tschaikowsky?
3. Are you anxious to hear more Mozart and Haydn, two masters who are becoming more "fashionable" again?
4. How about a Mendelssohn symphony?
5. Would you dread a program of entirely modern (only mildly so) music?
6. Do you realize that a great number of most popularly known instrumentalists and singers decline to appear at a pair of concerts for purely financial reasons, and that, even if they were willing to accept one fee for two concerts, this fee could hardly be met with even sold-out houses?
7. Do you realize that our list of symphony soloists in the past years has always most favorably compared with those of other orchestras (including Philadelphia and Boston)?
8. Do you remember how practically every soloist presented by us (however unknown he or she may have been to you before the concerts) was received with much enthusiasm by you and the rest of the audience?
9. And, last but not least—will you urge your friends to come and hear us, and thus help to make the Odeon too small for our audiences, so that the dream of our own Symphony Hall may come true, and that the fame of our good city as a great musical center may extend over the entire southwest and the neighboring States, giving St. Louis the place in the Nation's cultural mission which it is bound to occupy some day?

DETROIT is coming on musically at a great rate. And much of its progress is due to the activities of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. The presence of Ossip Gabrilowitsch has proved an asset difficult to estimate. His enthusiasm and personality, quite apart from his skill in making and interpreting programs, have been factors. Manager William E. Walter has contributed his share too, and his departure from his post this week will be keenly regretted by President William H. Murphy and his associates, and Mr. Gabrilowitsch also.

The current season of the Detroit Symphony is declared officially to have been the most successful in the history of that organization. The auction sale of the twenty-five boxes for the sixteen Thursday evening concerts for 1925-26 fetched $29,050, $1,150 more than the income for the season just closed. The 1924-25 deficit is fully covered by the twenty-two hundred guarantors, who pledged subscriptions ranging from $1 each to $50,000 . . . and all, it should be emphasized, without a public campaign of any kind.

The demand for seat reservations for the coming year is very encouraging. With conditions as they are, Manager D. Edward Porter will begin his duties under propitious circumstances.

AN AMERICAN baritone has just sailed for Europe to fulfill a two years' engagement at La Monnaie Theatre, Brussels, to appear there in leading baritone roles. He is John Charles Thomas, an artist whose rise in his career is as remarkable as is the impress he has made on the critics and the public of this country.

I remember well hearing Mr. Thomas when he sang at New York's Winter Garden. His voice and his style and his personality moved me to remark at the time: "If this young American has it in him he can do big things."

A couple of years later I heard Mr. Thomas in Apple Blossoms, when he strengthened the previous impression he made upon me. There ensued thereafter a further lapse; and once more I listened to this baritone . . . in a recital of serious songs in New York's Aeolian Hall.

Ever since John Charles Thomas has gone on—vocally and artistically. He is signally gifted in all ways a singer should be. The power of losing himself in a song, and communicating to his audience what he himself feels belongs to Mr. Thomas. Now he will essay opera, and some time next August Brussels opera patrons will hear and see this American in Herodiade.

The future of this singer can be pretty much what he chooses to make it. Whether he elects to stick to opera is to be determined. He would seem to have there a great opportunity. And yet—I somehow have the notion that eventually he will be discovered confining himself principally to the recital platform, singing to great audiences and reaping therefrom all manner of benefits.

CLEVELAND is started now on its second season of opera with the Metropolitan. A year ago new attendance records were established. That prompted those sponsoring the project to increase the number of performances for this season.

In order to make the two ends meet the receipts must reach the tremendous total, for the ten scheduled representations of opera and one concert, of $250,000. That means $25,000 a performance, of which $21,000 has to go to the Metropolitan.

It is to be questioned whether such an amount can be afforded by any community. In the old days $10,000 was regarded as about the limit. If Cleveland can pay such freight it is indeed a most resourceful community.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

The Palestrina Choir

The Palestrina Choir of ninety mixed voices gave a recital in Town Hall, New York, April 19, under the auspices of the Calvert Associates to commemorate both the fourth centenary of Palestrina and the tenth anniversary of the organization. The concert was designed to illustrate the development of liturgical music from the time of Palestrina to the present.

W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun that the program, under the direction of Nicola A. Montani, "demonstrated clearly the admirable results that may be obtained from the careful training of a chorus not over rich in distinctive vocal material." Mr. Henderson added that the Palestrina numbers were sung "with fine balance of parts, with a style distinguished for sonority of tone, clarity of thematic outline and excellent phrasing and rhythm."

The Post reviewer wrote that the program was sung "with real beauty, the tone quality of the choir being splendid at its best and never falling below a high standard." Mr. Montani, to quote this writer, "proved himself a most excellent conductor and the choir showed unmistakable signs of thorough training. The Times commended the singing, and the writer in the Herald Tribune observed that the chorus "showed thorough knowledge of what it sang; there was confidence and precision in its execution, response to Mr. Montani's wishes in tempo and shading."

The soloists were Catherine Sherwood Montani, soprano; Mayme Dwyer, contralto; John Weber, tenor; John Ambrogi, tenor; John Boland, basso; Albert J. Dooner and Dr. Melchiorre Mauro-Cottone, organists. The concert was opened with a short address by Michael Williams, editor of the Commonweal.

Edward Rechlin

Works by Bach and his contemporaries, Seegar, Walther, Buxtehude, and Bach's eldest son, Wilhelm Friedmann, made up the program played by Edward Rechlin, organist, at his annual New York recital in Aeolian Hall last Tuesday evening.

Herbert F. Peyser wrote in the Telegram-Mail that "a notable distinction characterized all his playing. . . . Unfailing accuracy of rhythm as well as scrupulous taste in registration were at all times evident in his performances, together with a dignified and vital style." His performance of W. F. Bach's larghetto from the D major Concerto (which Mr. Peyser attributes to Vivaldi) was, in this writer's opinion, "exceptionally beautiful."

The Sun chronicler asserted that he played "with a lofty conception of style and his management of stops, manuals, and pedals gave cause for much warm praise." F. D. Perkins of the Herald Tribune commented that Mr. Rechlin "again showed his mastery of his instrument and of this school of organ music." His playing was marked on the whole by "dignity and expressive ability," added Mr. Perkins, "rather than display, but he exhibited technical brilliance."

Miss Gertrude Bonime

Gertrude Bonime made her concert debut in a piano recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, last Tuesday afternoon. According to the Post, "her interpretation was skillful and displayed considerable variety and shading of tone with good technique."

The writer in the Herald Tribune commented that Miss Bonime "seemed a player of technical skill and digital fleetness, sailing fluently, though with no unusual meed of expression through the Beethoven Sonata. . . . The opening Promenade seemed rather unduly sympathetic, but in general the playing was skillful and satisfactory in expression." She had a sudden lapse of memory in the last part of the Sonata, but was more sure of herself in the Chopin.

Miss Bonime played "with a touch at once sensitive and delicate," wrote the Sun reviewer. "Her legato was crisp although not to the detriment of a smooth flowing tone, and there was intelligence and genuine musicianship in most of her work. Her Chopin for a young artist was exceptionally good and revealed a nature and technique keenly alive to a wide range of mood and color." This writer found her "out of her depth" in the Beethoven. According to the Telegram-Mail chronicler she revealed "a fair technical equipment, but hardly that artistic maturity which justifies the ordeal of a recital in New York." Her "musical taste" was lauded in the Times.

Paul Robeson

Paul Robeson, negro baritone, was assisted by Lawrence Brown in his recital of Negro music at the Greenwich Village, New York, Theatre April 19. Mr. Brown played his accompaniments and joined in those spirituals which called for two voices.

The Times reported that Mr. Robeson proved a singer "of genuine power. The voice is ample for his needs, mellow and soft, but it is his intense earnestness which grips his hearers. His negro spirituals have the ring of the revivalist, they hold in them a world of religious experience." The reviewer of the Post considered Mr. Robeson's voice "luscious, mellow" and that he sings spirituals "as few interpreters of these beautiful and moving folk-songs have sung them in New York."

In the World, the commentator remarked on the "variety of mood and musical treatment" contained in the short program. According to the Herald Tribune, Mr. Robeson "proved an effective singer, with a bass-baritone voice of pleasing quality, capable of a wide range of coloring and inflection without forcing or distortion, and interpretative skill enhanced by the eloquence and variety of his facial expression."

Leo Reconi

In addition to early Italian, English, American, German and Russian songs, Leo Reconi, Polish baritone, sang four operatic arias at his Town Hall (New York) recital on April 17. The excerpts were from Pagliacci, Un Ballo in Maschera, La Favorita, and L'Africana. Mr. Reconi was accompanied by Giuseppe Bamboschek.

The Sun chronicler commented that the singer displayed a voice of "considerable volume and range and well adapted to the character of many of his offerings." The "marked depth and resonance" of his voice received the approbation of the Herald Tribune reviewer. This writer noted, however, that, at times, he was "hampered by hardness of tone with a surface sometimes rough, and high notes giving an impression of strain."

Other newspapers did not carry analytical reports of the concert.

Harvard Glee Club

The fifth annual spring concert of the Harvard Glee Club took place in Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 18. Dr. A. T. Davison conducted. Olin Downes of the Times wrote that "the performance of the chorus maintained the excellent standards long since established by this glee club with the exception, at moments, of diction that was not as crisp and distinct as might have been. . . . The performances as a whole were vivid, musicianly, of a quality worthy of the music."

The Post commentator remarked that the singers were "in excellent voice, responding with superb technique and volume to the conductor's baton." In the opinion of the Sun writer, they "fully sustained the high standards of this talented choral organization."

Mendell Dancers

The Rose Mendell Dancers appeared at Town Hall, New York, on April 20 in a program of modern dances, followed by Greek exercises and dances from Japan, Russia, the East Indies, Italy and Spain.

To quote the writer in the Sun, many of the pupils "revealed considerable talent, and the Greek exercises were executed with excellent simplicity and good taste." F. D. Perkins of the Herald Tribune wrote that "vigor marked dancing which indicated considerable proficiency in the art among the participants though the impression seemed one of proficient pupils rather than fully fledged artists."

Other newspapers did not report the concert in detail.

Miss Kitty Cheatham

After an absence of several seasons, Kitty Cheatham reappeared at Carnegie Hall, New York, April 19 assisted by a small orchestra under the direction of John Warren Erb and Herbert Grant, Scotch bagpipe player.

The Times writer remarked that Miss Cheatham's talent is so well known that "it is almost superfluous to comment upon it." According to the chronicler in the Sun, "she sang with light pleasing voice and took some top notes as clearly as any heard in the hall this season." He also wrote that Miss Cheatham "danced, marched, whistled, and trilled with grace, aplomb, ease and facility—just as the demands of her excellently chosen program required."

In the words of the Herald Tribune reviewer, she brought "animation, enthusiasm and marked expressive ability in diction and gesture to make, with a voice of pleasing quality and a costume well suited to the optimistic atmosphere of the concert, a highly effective and well applauded entertainment." The Telegram-Mail review stated that "no one has ever approached Mme. Cheatham in her particular line and probably no one ever could." Of very much the same opinion was the Post observer who found her recital "unique."

Vladimir Drozdoff

Vladimir Drozdoff, a Russian pianist "of intelligence and power" (Times), made his New York debut in Town Hall last Tuesday evening. "Strength and style, not without lighter interludes and moments of sentiment, marked his playing," continued the writer in the Times.

The Herald Tribune commentator noted that "confidence, thorough technical mastery and marked energy were characteristics of his playing, with a tendency to storminess in the Scriabin number, ample expressive power in a performance which did not make for variety of coloring, but yet seemed very effective."

W. J. Henderson of the Sun said that Mr. Drozdoff played with "a powerful hand." He found his performance stormy and uneven. In the opinion of Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail), the pianist proved to be "eminently serious" in a performance "marked by curious inequalities of touch and execution."

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

Julia Claussen
Prima donna mezzo-soprano, Metropolitan Opera Company
MANAGEMENT: HAENSEL & JONES, Aeolian Hall, N. Y.

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

BONCI
VOCAL STUDIO
For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900. New York City
Knabe Piano

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. Telephone
New York City Circle 8815

J. HENRI BOVE
FLUTE SOLOIST
Joint Recitals and Musicales
191 Claremont Ave. New York

Recitals and Choruses in Chicago

McCormack, Chaliapin and Esther Dale Appear; Four Singing Organizations Give Annual Concerts.

Chicago, April 21. — The music honors of the past week were divided almost equally between soloists and ensemble organizations. The large number of concerts given was no indication that the musical season is nearly at an end.

John McCormack gave a recital in Orchestra Hall Sunday with the assistance of Lauri Kennedy, cellist, Walter P. Zimmerman, organist, and Edwin Schneider, accompanist. To quote Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, he sang "with an unusually fervent spirit; with remarkable mastery of vocal technique; with that wonderfully clear articulation; and with that rare artistic perfection and completeness that have made him a world celebrity." Other chroniclers enthusiastically agreed that he was in his best form.

* * *

At the same time, Feodor Chaliapin was giving a song recital in the Auditorium. Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald Examiner wrote that his voice is "a marvel of beauty and expressiveness and his personality one of the mighty ones of the world of song." The Post reviewer commented that his dramatic singing has not affected the "fineness of texture" of his voice and that he is "a master of tone color and capable of expressing the finest shades of meaning without losing the singing poise." The other reviews were similar.

Mr. Chaliapin was assisted by Abraham L. Sopkin, violinist, and Max Rabinowitch, pianist.

According to Mr. Rosenfeld, Esther Dale, soprano, who also appeared here in recital Sunday, "has a voice of admirable quality, and there is also apparent considerable power and a clever manner in its use." Mr. Gunn remarked that she sang Brahms, Strauss, and Albeniz "with beautiful tone and style, with clear and expressive emphasis of the text, with accurate evaluation in their musical and poetic significance, with deep and sincere feeling. The voice is a warm rather delicate mezzo-soprano, with the right color for every mood."

Eugene Stinson wrote in the Journal that Miss Dale showed "an excellent taste for songs and a most effective delivery of them. For uniqueness, she has brought something impressionistic, something almost exotic, into her singing." He also spoke of the "felicity with which her art has developed into something natural and distinctive" and expressed admiration for both her fine diction and her "analytical scrupulousness" which gives "directness and force" to her songs. Mr. Devries of the American was also highly laudatory.

Miss Dale brought out the meaning of the texts with understanding, wrote the Post commentator, "though with somewhat too didactic a quality. Her voice lacked variety of color and was rather heavy." According to Mr. Moore she proved to be "a rather astonishing interpreter of songs, possessed of a soprano voice not quite as astonishing."

* * *

Heniot Levy's annual recital at the Playhouse on Sunday was "notable," according to Mr. Gunn, for some fine Chopin playing and for the introduction of Godowsky's transcription of Bach's D minor Sonata for violin.

In the Post it was reported that he played the Bach-Godowsky number "with breadth of conception and with the spirit that has fought itself loose from the old dry-as-dust Bach tradition and dares make it sound like music. There was the structural sense, clear melodic line and variety in the tone colorings to follow the changing moods." Mr. Levy received commendation in other papers.

* * *

A baritone, Howard Preston, was heard in Kimball Hall Thursday night. In his performance, to quote Mr. Rosenfeld, there were "graphic interpretative style, a resonant, warm voice for the musical expression, and English texts which enunciated clearly for the most part." Edward Moore reported that "he has a voice with quality, range, and color in it, his training has evidently been first class, and he would seem to have the outlook of a musician."

He has a voice "of rich quality, ample range and volume, and under good control" as well as "the instinct for singing," wrote Karleton Hackett in the Post. Mr. Hackett also thought he sang with "imaginative feeling and interpretative force."

* * *

The penultimate pair of concerts were given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra last week under the baton of Frederick Stock. The semi-novelty was Strauss's Thus Spake Zarathustra, which has not been played here for some time, and the rest of the program consisted of Bach's Fourth Suite in D major, Elgar's In the South Overture, two excerpts from a dance suite by Moszkowski, and Alven's Midsummer Wake.

The last of the children's concerts was conducted by Mr. Stock Thursday with Yetta Wexler as soloist in the Mendelssohn Capriccio. She again received commendation.

* * *

The Dayton Westminster Choir, John Finley Williamson conductor, sang in Orchestra Hall last Tuesday. Maurice Rosenfeld commented that their tone quality "is always adjusted to fit the texts of the songs and that accent and rhythm are definite and clearly put forth." Mr. Hackett wrote that they "had a solid body to the tone; the parts were in good balance, and they sang with precision." Mr. Gunn lauded both the choir and the conductor.

* * *

Calvin Lampert conducted the last of the Mendelssohn Club's concerts for the current season before a large audience in Orchestra Hall on Thursday. Alice Gentle, soprano, and Edith Richelsen Brown, contralto, were the soloists. Miss Gentle, to quote Mr. Gunn, sang "with lovely voice and art." He also commended Miss Brown. Mr. Rosenfeld observed that Miss Gentle "put into her music a vocal power and a clear, high range which showed this artist to have developed into a genuine dramatic soprano."

Her solo was sung "brilliantly and dramatically," wrote Mr. Moore and Mr. Hackett said that her tone "had the true ring to it, resonant and courageous." The contralto's tone "was warm in quality and with a sympathy which expressed the meaning of the text."

* * *

The Apollo Club gave Henry Hadley's Resurgam last Monday night with the composer conducting. The soloists were Theo Karle, tenor, Helen Hewitt, soprano, Bernard Ferguson, baritone, and Leah Pratt, contralto.

Mr. Hadley proved himself a conductor of "quality," according to Karle-

(Continued on page 13)

Press Comments on the Recent Italian Concert Tour of

PIETRO YON

FAMOUS ORGAN VIRTUOSO AND COMPOSER

"Maestro Yon is today the greatest and most skillful master of the organ of the entire world."—Pays d'Aoste, Aoste.

"He truly knows how to give new life to the art of organ playing. Had it not been forbidden out of respect for the sacred edifice, the public would have jumped to its feet and screamed wildly in a wave of enthusiasm.

"He can rest undisturbed as the king of modern organists."—L'Eco di Bergamo, Bergamo.

"Program making is one of the hardest tasks of an artist. Usually he drifts with monotonous virtuosity or classic deadweight.

"These shortcomings were overcome by Pietro Yon's masterful program.

"Yon knew how to force his large and selective audience into an enthusiasm not easily reached at displays of organ artistry.

"We must acknowledge that the recitalist possesses besides a technique developed to the utmost conceivable, a sense of interpretative balance, and a taste so refined as to command full recognition as master of masters by the most critical audience."—Provincia di Vicenza, Vicenza.

"Pietro Yon handles with almost defiant bravery the most difficult and complicated of instruments, reaping undisputed laurels.

"He pursues his art with a genuine passion, the burning flame of his yet young life."—L'Unita Cattolica, Firenze.

"The first organ concert of this season will go down in the minds of the Vicentini as a revelation as to what the technique of an exceptional organ virtuoso can be.

"The public came away literally dazed by the amazing, speedy technique, not only as regards agility of the hands and feet, but as to mental elasticity in handling registration and phrasing.

"Considering also that Maestro Yon plays his concert from memory, it fully justifies the sense of marvel which overwhelmed the large and distinguished audience."—Corriere Vicentino, Vicenza.

"The enormous crowd which overflowed the edifice was thrilled with admiration and ecstasy at the marvelous touch of the virtuoso and many times could not withhold its enthusiasm from breaking into open manifestation of approval."—L'Avvenire d'Italia, Bologna.

"Pietro Yon had endless applause. This artist truly deserves to be known by all who have faith in the art of music (pedagogues in technique, admirers in nobility of sentiment) who know how to find in music not only a caressing melody or technical variety, but also, a little of that peace which flows out of good music into our being, conquers the heart, and sets the spirit at rest."—Il Momento, Torino.

"Pietro Yon, one of the most famous musicians of the world, worked the Vicenza public into a frenzy of enthusiasm by his colossal organ concert. The enormous crowd applauded frantically.

"The young Piemontese organist has turned all his energies to popularize a form of aristocratic art which is difficult to divulge. But under his masterful and genial touch the organ music vests itself in festal garments; the severe contrapuntal lines become animate at the decisive rhythm—the expression accurate in every detail, infuses life and sentiment to the cold metallic mass and the organ truly assumes the figure of a gigantic orchestra.

"With his perfect knowledge of orchestration he finds (even in the classical Bach) new ways of interpretation quite different from the traditional with which he captivates the public and reaches even the uninitiated with the persuasive voice of all things truly great."—Corriere del Mattino, Verona.

"The indisputable success of this splendid performer has fully convinced us; showing such genuine technique and finished expression as to withstand brilliantly the most critical comparisons."—Il Gagliardo, Bergamo.

"The sound of the organ spread through the wide naves of the Basilica, in such a new and positive way as to swiftly conquer the large audience."—L'Italia, Milano.

"The master handling of stops and manuals that Yon displayed in a delightful and unequaled manner, forced the public that jammed the cathedral, into enthusiasm.

"Both public and authorities applauded the great recitalist. Often, amid great acclamation, encores were requested."—Gazzettino, Venezia.

Mr. Yon unquestionably fully possesses all the gifts which an artist can have."—La Sentinella del Canavese, Ivrea.

"Maestro Pietro Yon for his marvelous technique and art must be ranked as one of the very first organists of today. Many of the large cities of the world have enjoyed his artistry and the ecclesiastical authorities, conscious of his eminent worth, have selected him (exclusively) honorary organist of St. Peter in Rome.

"Maestro Yon, desirous to show his gratitude at this high distinction, played at the foremost basilica of the world on St. Peter's Day, making a deep impression on the vast audience during the festivities.

"Pietro Yon was received with great courtesy by the Holy Father and by Cardinal Merry del Val."—L'Osservatore Romano, Vatican Organ, Rome.

"I would wish to express at length my joy at being present at your organ recital which for me (an old attendant at such events) proved a great revelation."

(Signed) MSGR. GINO BORGHEZIO,
Vatican Librarian,
Music Critic and Historian, Rome.

AVAILABLE FOR CONCERTS DURING SEASON 1925-1926

MANAGEMENT: THE INSTITUTE OF CONCERT VIRTUOSI, 853 Carnegie Hall, New York City

N. B.—Originals of clippings above reprinted are on file at office of the Institute of Concert Virtuosi and may be consulted by any one interested

AS GREAT IN CON

G I

Wins La
For Spring Co

© Mishkin

"Beniamino Gigli, world famous tenor, thrilled and delighted a large Sunday audience at the Capitol Theatre yesterday. He was given an ovation the like of which has seldom, if ever, been equalled in Hartford. The great tenor "stopped the show." He was so enthusiastically received that he responded to curtain calls by the dozen.

Gigli is a great artist. In some ways he has even exceeded Caruso. There is a refinement, a delicacy of feeling and an artistry which is fully up to Caruso standards. His voice was clear and fresh from beginning to end. He sang with the vim and vigor of youth. In tone production, in voice placement, and in purity in all registers, he is far ahead of any other operatic tenor of the day. All in all, Gigli sang as only this artist can."

—HARTFORD TIMES.

"Beniamino Gigli of the lovely voice, the naive manner and the happy smile sang at the Capitol Theatre yesterday to a large and delighted audience that lost the final notes of every number by tumultuous applause. He sang in lovely unforced tone throughout."

—HARTFORD COURANT.

"Gigli is the world's greatest tenor."—HARTFORD COURANT.

"Occasionally a demonstration in the concert halls merits the characterizing phrase 'wild enthusiasm,' and the applause yesterday heaped on Mr. Gigli had that frenetic touch. There were cries of 'bis,' there was cheering as well as clapping."

"That Mr. Gigli should thus arouse and inspire is not surprising. His voice is a rich tenor, mellow in quality, ample in volume, a voice that can be made eloquent with feeling."

—BOSTON POST.

"Beniamino Gigli, the famous tenor of the Metropolitan Opera House, gave a concert yesterday in Symphony Hall. He pleased his large audience to a degree beyond the power of any concert performer who has appeared here this winter. People greeted him on his entrance with long applause. After the first air they yelled. Before ever he finished his songs they burst in with their clapping. They clamored for extra pieces without limit."

"Mr. Gigli is blessed with a beautiful voice. He can deliver tones in his middle register of amazing richness and sweetness. At the end of the Verdi air he sang a high tone with a splendid ring about it."

—BOSTON HERALD.

"Gigli is without doubt the best heroic tenor of the Italian school since the days of Caruso, most of whose roles he has been singing at the Metropolitan."

—BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

"During a season that has witnessed many notable demonstrations one cannot recall any to equal in magnitude that accorded Gigli. The end of every piece he sang was the signal for a prolonged outburst—not only hand clapping but shouts. The audience almost shook the roof with applause."

—BOSTON AMERICAN.

"His voice is of remarkable beauty and richness of quality."—

—BOSTON GLOBE.

Victor Red Seal Records

CERTIFIED by THE MUSICAL DIGEST

Concert M

R. E. JO

1451 Broadway

CERT AS IN OPERA

G L I

sh Praise
cert Tour 1925

"The most important concert in the musical history of Scranton in the last few seasons was given last evening by Beniamino Gigli, one of the world's greatest tenors. Gigli has a wonderful vibrant voice with a beautiful tone placement. His vocal technique is so perfect as to be completely subsidiary to the beauty and excellence of his voice."

—SCRANTON TIMES.

"Beniamino Gigli made his second visit in this city yesterday afternoon at the Palace Theatre. The great tenor sang with the purity of tone that has made him such an enviable niche in the hall of fame. His strength of tone is as carefully mastered as was the great Caruso's pouring forth in full volume."

—NEW HAVEN JOURNAL.

"Beniamino Gigli of the Metropolitan Opera Company gave a concert at Carnegie Hall last night. It was the popular tenor's last appearance in New York this season. The house with many seats on the stage was sold out. The proceeds were $6,500. He used his beautiful voice lavishly and showed rare skill in phrasing and dynamics."

—NEW YORK SUN.

"An audience that packed the house from roof to stage greeted him with the season's largest and richest assortment of applause, cheers and bravos."

—NEW YORK WORLD.

"Mr. Gigli is a rare tenor. He possesses a delicious voice; he is adept in the lovely graces of bel canto; he is master of Italian diction and can unite in perfect wedding the rhetorical and the musical phrase."

—NEW YORK TELEGRAM-MAIL.

"The delight of the audience knew no bounds, and the tenor must have covered at least a mile in his familiar quick step in taking his bows. Many of his notes were lusciously beautiful. His hearers came to enjoy themselves and gave every evidence of doing so."

—NEW YORK EVENING POST.

agement:

NSTON

New York City

Hardman Piano

© Mishkin

"Gigli has the amplitude of voice for the most robust climax which he achieves with no loss of the caressing velvet texture. He has plenty of spirit wherever emphasis is needed, but he never shouts. He never loses the inherent lyric quality of the music even to obtain a desired flourish.

"In point of enthusiasm his recital has not been surpassed all season."

—ROCHESTER HERALD.

"The last of a long list of concerts was given in the Eastman Theatre last night by Beniamino Gigli. It was a thrilling concert and was the most satisfying of any that has been given during the winter. Another season will not be regarded as a complete success without his appearance. He has the power and resonance of the Caruso voice, and he manages his voice with the same skill that made Caruso one of the wonders of his time."

—ROCHESTER EVENING HERALD.

"Gigli is a great tenor. Hearing the power, the passion, the dramatic appeal of his opening 'Andrea Chenier' aria would convince any hearer of experience of this fact. He has a superb voice and the supreme gift of using it with variety, with beauty and with finesse; his mezza voce is real. His power of diminishing a tone and leaving the quality and intensity intact is a mark of great artistry. He sang four arias and each of them was splendidly sung."

—ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE.

On The Music Highway

GEORGE LIEBLING, pianist-composer, has been booked for a tour of twenty-five concerts for next season under the management of Arthur and Harry Culbertson of New York and Chicago.

Some of the recent appearances of Franceska Kaspar Lawson, soprano, were in Palmerton, Pa., Bolivar, Pa., Connellsville, Pa., and Hinton, W. Va. Miss Lawson is planning a New York recital for next fall.

The success of Dusolina Giannini's two Havana recitals on April 14 and 16 was such that she was immediately engaged for a third recital on the 17th.

Daniel Mayer has just signed contracts for a course next season in Topeka, Kan., with Henry Dotterweich. The course will consist of the Russian Symphonic Choir, Dusolina Giannini, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, and the Letz Quartet.

The St. Olaf Choir, F. Melius Christiansen conductor, is broadcasting tomorrow evening through Station WCCO, Minneapolis-St. Paul.

Hans Kindler, Dutch cellist, sailed from New York on the Mauretania last Wednesday. He plans to spend most of his time at his home in Sonlis, near Paris, where he will rest and prepare programs for next season. He gives two recitals in Paris on May 22 and 24 respectively and will play in London on May 28. Mr. Kindler will return to America June 20 and will be heard in recital here during the entire season.

A recital will be given in Town Hall, New York, tonight by Clyde Burrows, baritone. Emil J. Polak will be at the piano.

The Barrere Little Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of George Barrere, will participate in a transcontinental tour next season under the management of George Engles. The itinerary will embrace the important musical centers of the Middle West and California, comprising nine weeks beginning April 5, 1926.

Mario Chamlee, American tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang at the Philomela Club in Brooklyn, on April 24. Three days previous to this he was the guest of honor, with his wife, Ruth Miller Chamlee, at the Woman Pays Club, at the Algonquin Hotel, in New York City. During May, Mr. Chamlee will sing at three of the large music festivals on the following dates: Spartanburg N. C., May 8; Ann Arbor, Mich., May 20, and at Evanston, Ill., on May 27. He will commence his operatic season at Ravinia Park, on June 27, remaining with that company for the full ten weeks. After Labor Day, Mr. and Mrs. Chamlee plan to go to Italy, returning in time for his season at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The Artists' Choir, an organization of eighty mixed voices of which Mme. Clara Novello Davies is founder and conductor, gave a recital last Sunday evening at the Manhattan Opera House, in New York, for the benefit of its scholarship fund. The assisting artists were Gladys Axman, Alma Clayburgh, Rafaelo Diaz, and Rhea Silberta, pianist.

A feature of the program was A. Walter Kramer's new cycle for women's voices, A Rococco Romance, which was presented by the choir for the first time. The program also included works by Gounod, Handel, Mendelssohn, Bishop, Sullivan, Purcell, Elgar and Ivor Novello; with American composers represented by Geoffrey O'Hara and Deems Taylor.

Efrem Zimbalist and Sara Sokolsky-Fried, pianist, were among the soloists at the concert given for the benefit of the Jewish Teachers' Seminary in Carnegie Hall on April 12.

Janet Adamson, contralto, who has sung in various parts of the country, made her first appearance in New York last evening at Aeolian Hall. She was assisted by Gordon Hampson at the piano.

Laurie Merrill has accepted an engagement with the Symphonia Orchestral Association of Norfolk, Va., to sing with their organization of ninety men, early next fall. She will do three groups of songs in the costume and language of the country she will illustrate.

Clarence Gustlin, exponent of American Opera Interp-Recitals, appeared before various State Conventions held by the National Federation of Music Clubs during the closing season. After his recital in New Mexico last autumn, he was recalled again this spring to give another opera from his repertory of ten. In North Carolina he was heard in Statesville by delegates from all parts of the State, and in Mississippi, at West Point, he played to large audiences.

Robert Imandt, young French violinist, will sail for Europe on June 4 to spend the summer in France, Germany and Switzerland. While on the other side he will look up a number of modern compositions for violin which he will use on his programs next season.

Marie Morrisey will return to the New York concert stage next season in a recital program in Aeolian Hall, Sunday afternoon, October 18. Her Chicago recital is scheduled for November 8 at the Studebaker.

Evsei Beloussoff, Russian cellist who toured this country as soloist with the Ukrainian Choir two seasons ago, and who has recently been the first cellist of the State Symphony, will give his first cello recital next season in Aeolian Hall, New York, on October 15. In addition to this recital, Mr. Beloussoff will give on December 10 a sonata recital with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and on January 27 an evening of Bach music at which he will present works for cello alone, for cello and piano, and cello and harpsichord. Wanda Landowska will be the pianist and harpsichordist of this recital. Mr. Beloussoff is being booked for next season by Daniel Mayer.

A negro baritone, Dock Snellings, gave a program of negro spirituals and operatic airs in Aeolian Hall, New York on Friday evening. Mr. Snellings was accompanied by Harlie Wilson.

The Gaelic Musical Society of America presented an All Nations Folk-lore Festival recently at the College of the City of New York. This was one of a series of folk-lore festivals dedicated to the memory of Victor Herbert.

Paul Althouse and Arthur Middleton will tour Australia again during the coming summer and fall. The singers leave for the Antipodes in May, and as they have been booked for a Pacific Coast tour on their return to this country they will not be heard in the East until January, 1927.

The sixty-fifth birthday of the late Enrico Bossi, Italian composer and organist, who died on his way back to Italy at the completion of his first American tour, was celebrated by a memorial concert given in the Wanamaker Auditorium on the afternoon of April 18.

The program consisted solely of Bossi's works and was participated in by Samuel A. Baldwin, G. Aldo Randegger, Salvatore dell' Isola, Nicola d'Amico, Caterina Gobbi, Rosalino de Maria and Alberto Bimboni.

During May Marie Sundelius will sing in Harrisburg, Pa.; Holyoke, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Kan.; Hartford, Conn.; Troy, N. Y.; Keene, N. H., and Evanston, Ill. On May 23 she will give a concert in Brooklyn.

Music from seven foreign lands will be heard tomorrow night at Town Hall, New York, at the concert given under the auspices of the Foreign Language Information Service.

The program will include first performances of The Poet's Dream and Adolescence by Alexander Savine, who will conduct the Savine orchestra; Rossini's Una Voce Poco Fa from The Barber of Seville, sung by Nina Morgana, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; numbers by Sarasate, Zsolt, Manojlovic and Smetana played by Zlatko Balokovic, violinist; a Chopin group by Ignace Hilsberg; songs by Sigurd Lie, Rung, Rosenfeldt, Lange Muller, Knudsen and Grieg sung by Mischa-Leon; a dance by Julia Hudak; and numbers by Ressiger, Kuhlen, and Lie sung by the United Norwegian Singers of New York and New Jersey, conducted by Ole Windingstad.

The Metropolitan Opera Company ended its New York activities of this season on the evening of April 19 with the twenty-fourth and last opera concert, with Julius Burger and Paul Eisler, at the piano, doing duty for the orchestra, which, with most of the company, had left for Atlanta.

Erwin Nyireghazi, Hungarian pianist, was the instrumental soloist of the evening. Clarence Whitehill sang a group of songs. Operatic arias were sung by Thalia Sabanieva, Ina Bourskaya and Laura Robertson, Raymonde Delaunois, Vicente Ballester, Pompilio Malatesta and James Wolfe.

Frances Alda is at present on tour with the Metropolitan Opera Company. She has been engaged to sing during the coming summer season at the Colon Theatre in Buenos Aires, and will sail for South America on July 4. Besides the role of Ginevra in La Cena delle Beffe, she will sing in Marta, La Boheme, Mefistofele, and Manon Lescaut.

A testimonial concert in honor of Zavel Zilberts, Russian-Hebrew composer and conductor, was given on the evening of April 12 at Carnegie Hall, New York. The Hazomir Chorus, of which he is the leader, and many cantors took part in the program, which was almost entirely composed of works written by Mr. Zilberts.

Having completed its series of eight concerts this season devoted to the chamber music of Brahms, the Elshuco Trio, consisting of William Kroll, violinist, Aurelio Giorni, pianist, and Willem Willeke, cellist, announces for next season a cycle of the chamber music of Franz Schubert.

The six programs in the series will cover the most important works of this kind of Schubert, and will be given on Friday evenings at Aeolian Hall, New York. The dates of the six programs are November 13, December 11, January 15, February 12, March 5, and April 9. The Trio will be assisted in the larger works by other musicians of note.

Messrs. Willeke and Giorni will give besides two recitals of sonatas for cello and piano by Brahms, Strauss, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and other composers.

Sophie Braslau, contralto, will sail for Europe on the S. S. Olympic on May 9. She will make her first appearance as a recitalist in Berlin, at the Beethoven Salle, on May 25.

STELLA de METTE
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Formerly with Metropolitan Opera
Touring with San Carlo Opera Co.
Exclusive Management of
ANTHONY BAGAROZY
Aeolian Hall New York

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

Anton BILOTTI Pianist
Management: Lionel Powell & Holt, London, England
Steinway Piano Welte-Mignon Records Exclusively

The Cleveland Institute of Music
ERNEST BLOCH, Director
SIX WEEKS SUMMER SCHOOL JUNE 22—AUGUST 1
Complete courses in all branches of music under regular faculty
Master Class under ERNEST BLOCH
in Pedagogy, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form and Fugue
Master classes in piano, violin and cello under Beryl Rubinstein, Andre de Ribaupierre and Victor de Gomez
For Summer Catalogue write: Registrar, 2827 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Musical Chicago En Courant

Songsters Bid Farewell; Choral Societies Feature Hadley's Music in Spring Concerts.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, April 21.

TWO renowned singers made their season's adieux to Chicago in recitals on Sunday. John McCormack's farewell took the form of a request program at Orchestra Hall, while Feodor Chaliapin's Chicago swan song swelled the benefit fund of the Chicago Nurses' Club by some $10,000 intake at the Auditorium.

At Orchestra Hall every available nook was filled and some thousand disappointed McCormack fans were turned away. The program was made up from the list of nearly 200 songs requested. Those most often requested won a place on the program, which after all was about as John would have arranged it himself. Perhaps the tenor would have encountered some difficulties had he started out to sing through the list. Besides the large proportion of Irish songs and ballads, there were Handel and Mozart, and a surprising array of requests of this nature: Prologue from Pagliacci; Aria from Forza del Destino; Aria from Mignon; Rose Marie; Three O'Clock in the Morning; etcetera. Such is the public faith in McCormack!

Quite a different public listened to the big Russian as he converted the huge Auditorium into an informal drawing room, calling his songs by number as is his wont, and telling their stories dramatically and vividly, as is also his wont.

SPRING is the season for burgeoning choral societies. Their winter's work is then deemed ready for public appraisal and applause. This last week brought four such to hearing: the Apollo Musical Club, the Bell Telephone Company Chorus (proving that the voice with the smile is worth while), the Mendelssohn Male Chorus, and the Carson Pirie Scott and Company Choral Society.

Henry Hadley, American composer, was gratifyingly featured on each of the four programs. On Monday night he conducted his own Resurgam with the Apollo club; Wednesday the Bell Telephone Company chorus sang one of his part songs; the Mendelssohn club sang one of his male choruses on Thursday, and the Carson Pirie Scott and Company Chorus sang his Ode to Music, in their concert Friday night. Pretty good representation for Hadley—and no tax on the auditors.

RUMOR has it that a scholarship is being planned to commemorate Mr. Stock's twenty years of service with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. True, the twenty years are not technically up until next January, and rumor is not clear as to just what form the scholarship is to take. But it is known that Dr. Stock has long had a worry and a plan in the back of his head, relative to a means of perpetuation of players with the necessary European training to replace the ravages of time on the woodwind, department of, the orchestra. Towards this end the Frederick Stock scholarship will probably be applied.

A remarkable performance Stock and his men gave the Strauss Tone Poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra, at the penultimate concert of the orchestral season on Friday. Four years ago at its last performance, under the direction of Dr. Strauss himself, it was still considered something of an enigma, but time the great clarifier has revealed all, and the Friday audience cheered the revelation.

THE Polish Peasant orchestra offered nationalistic music of a different sort at Orchestra Hall on Saturday afternoon. A gaily caparisoned orchestra with their red and white coats and peacock feathers in their caps, the conductor, Stanislaw Namyslowski, just a little more gorgeously bedecked than his men; the Mazurkas and dances of their program were equally gay. They would seem to have been reasonably busy in Chicago, with nine concerts to their credit in thirteen days. An interesting organization.

Alice Gentle turned Russian for one group of songs and American for another for her share as guest artist of the Chicago Mendelssohn Club's program. One reviewer classified her as "that best of American sopranos."

AT HIS annual recital at the Playhouse on Sunday, Heniot Levy played a transcription for piano by Leopold Godowsky, of the Bach sonata in B minor. The transcription bears a dedication to Mr. Levy and Sunday was its first performance. From its success it will not be the last.

A recital of more than usual interest was that of Howard E. Preston, baritone, who sang with good voice and interpretative ability a program demanding both of those qualities. The Russian group, in particular demanded and received dramatic treatment.

Mrs. Herman DeVries' pair of inseparables, the talented youngsters Helen Derzbach and Edith Orens, who delighted the Chicago Opera patrons as Hansel and Gretel last year, have been engaged for a two weeks' run of that opera in St. Louis this July.

Another pupil of Mrs. DeVries, Pearl Schaaf, sister of Myrtle Schaaf of Rose Marie fame, has just made her debut with the San Carlo company in Detroit in the role of Siebel in Faust.

THE Apollo Musical Club has issued an appeal for help, announcing that it can no longer continue on its present basis, and will be forced to disband unless financial aids is forthcoming. It seeks $10 memberships to defray the deficit between the constantly increasing expenditures and the concert receipts. The club is one of the oldest musical organizations in Chicago, primarily formed as a male chorus immediately after the fire in '71.

The Chicago Artists' Association held their annual frolic last Tuesday night. The Gilbert and Sullivan Trial by Jury was presented under the direction of William Lester. The proceeds benefited the Junior scholarship fund of the association.

Watt Weber, tenor, who recently made a hit by his singing with the Paulist Choir, appeared on Jessie B. Hall's Young American Artists series last Thursday night.

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI
Who, According to Reports, Will Lead His Philadelphia Orchestra in a European Concert Tour During 1926.

Chicago Choruses Sing

(Continued from page 9)

ton Hackett, and other reviewers agreed that, unlike most composers, he gave an excellent interpretation of his own work. Mr. Karle "has a very fine voice" which he uses with "a complete knowledge of its vocal resources and with a musical skill that made the score come through in unusually gripping style," wrote Mr. Rosenfeld.

* * *

Nearly 200 singers, members of the choruses of the Illinois Bell Telephone Company, gave their annual concert Wednesday under the direction of Daniel Protheroe. Jose Mojica of the Chicago Civic Opera was the soloist.

Mr. Mojica gave the Salve Dimora from Faust an "artistic interpretation, clear in tone and musical phrasing" according to Mr. Rosenfeld. Karleton Hackett observed that "his tone was pleasing, he sang with good style, and they liked him."

Indicative of the general reaction to the singing of the chorus was the following assertion by Mr. Hackett: "Daniel Protheroe has the instinctive feeling for choral effect and the practical skill to bring out the desired effect. The tone was lovely in quality and the parts in excellent balance for the true choral pianissimo. It had the rich quality that comes from a body of singers who have all been well trained."

Give Text for Swift Competition

Chicago, April 22.—The fifth annual competition in music composition has been announced by Swift & Company's Male Chorus. A prize of $100 will be given for the best musical setting by an American composer for Blest Pair of Sirens by John Milton. The judges will be Jeanne Boyd, Rudolph Reuter, and D. A. Clippinger, conductor of the chorus. Contributions must be sent to Mr. Clippinger before July 15, 1925.

American Novelty on Last Rothwell Program

Los Angeles Hears Schoenefeld Caprice, Dedicated to W. A. Clark; Choral Music Given.

Los Angeles, April 17.—Henry Schoenefeld's American Caprice, dedicated to W. A. Clark, was the novelty at the concluding pair of concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra last week.

The work was conducted by the composer, and Walter Henry Rothwell led the orchestra through Brahms' Second Symphony, Dukas' L'Apprenti Sorcier, and the Meistersinger Prelude.

According to Ralph Greene, of the Examiner, the Caprice proved both "cheerful and scholarly" with rhythms "freely syncopated in the negro manner, with well balanced and solidly written orchestral parts." He thought that Mr. Schoenefeld showed "a fine sense of effect and a knowledge of sonorities." The writer in the Daily News considered "the theme minor and its conception scholarly."

Carl Bronson, of the Herald, wrote that the work is "an attractive piece of scoring which does not remain steadfastly upon any one theme, but follows the classification of capricious precisely. It is a play upon American themes and is scored with musicianly intelligence and unusual freedom in the utility of the full ensemble of the orchestra." Bruno David Ussher (Express) commented that the music was conventional and "not imaginative."

The final pop concert of the season also took place last week. Three Handel choruses from The Messiah were sung by the University Choral Club under Squire Coop, dean of music at the State University Southern Branch. The rest of the program, chosen by popular vote of the audience, consisted of Rimsky-Korsakoff's The Bumblebee, a Strauss Waltz, Liszt's Les Preludes, the Andante from Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the introduction to the third act of Lohengrin, Tschaikowsky's Marche Slav, and Brahms' Academic Festival.

Mr. Greene wrote that Mr. Coop "showed musical understanding in his interpretations, and likewise thorough command of both choir and orchestra." The chorus, according to this reviewer, "had a freshness of resonance and a vigor that young voices alone can have. The members are admirably disciplined and responsive." The Express writer also lauded Mr. Coop's musicianship and added that the choir "consists of remarkable material, fresh, ringing voices."

Young Pianist Makes Debut

Sascha Helman, thirteen year old pianist, made his New York debut in Aeolian Hall April 18. In the words of the Herald Tribune reporter, he showed in general, "marked technical proficiency, considerably more confidence and smoothness in his playing than seems to be displayed by the average young musician of that age."

EDWIN HUGHES
will hold a SUMMER MASTER CLASS in New York for Pianists and Teachers, June 29 to August 8
For full information address
MANAGEMENT of EDWIN HUGHES
340 West 89th Street, New York
STEINWAY PIANO DUO-ART RECORDS

An Opera Prodigy

Maria Mueller in Her Early Twenties Is a Leading Soprano of the Metropolitan.

PRODIGIES are the fashion of this day as of every other. One likes to read of a tiny child with his top in one hand and an apple core in the other playing from memory Scriabin's Seventh Piano Sonata when one is quite certain that he has hardly lived long enough to play through it more than six or seven times.

One likes to read of the innocent eyes of a six year old as they shine with joy at a chess victory over twenty bearded sages in a row. The child movie star and the baby double-bass player are both close to the hearts of the people.

Sad to relate grand opera has rarely been the scene of such wonders. It is true that there is a little boy—usually a chorister's child — who stands by to be kidnapped in Oracolo, and there are the child in Butterfly and the frolicking youngsters in Petrouchka, but they never utter a note. And Petit Yniold in Pelleas is always impersonated by an adult singer.

"Are there no prodigies in opera?" you will ask.

Yes, there are, but they are not infant prodigies; at best they are youthful prodigies.

Such an one was Maria Mueller—and still is, if you please—the young soprano who this year made her debut in leading roles at the New York Metropolitan. Four years ago she made her operatic debut in her home town in Czecho-Slovakia, Linz-am-Danube. Two years ago the Metropolitan through Artur Bodanzky, who heard her sing, had already invited her to New York, and this season she has finally made her appearance on the most important operatic stage in the world—and she has barely turned her twentieth year!

"I have never sung a minor role," she told me, when I asked her about her career, and was prepared to hear a tale of ladders with gradually mounted rungs. "My first part in opera was that of Elsa in Lohengrin, and I repeated such roles as that, as Eva, Agathe, Marguerite, Elizabeth, and Antonia when I first appeared in Prague and then in Munich and Vienna.

"At first I was not willing to come to the United States to sing. I took the advice of friends of mine who thought it best that I gain more experience, and season my art before traveling so far to make such an important debut.

"To persuade me to remain some of them told me things that I have since found out to be untrue. They told me that the United States was a country where I should find that the commercial spirit predominated, and that the art of the opera would arouse scant interest. I repeat the old remark that one must not judge America by New York, which is the only community with which I have had experience, but here certainly I have found that music has a most important place, and that the public interest in it is sincere and unstinted.

"These tales, however, are unimportant now. I have been here, and I've liked it immensely. At first the tremendous routine of the Metropolitan frightened me. They produced so much, and there was so much preparation for everything! We singers at times, and especially when we are appearing in operas in which we are new here, are called out for rehearsals almost as though we were firemen.

"Of course," explained Miss Mueller smilingly, "that is an exaggeration. I have never been called to rehearse, for example, at three in the morning, but sometimes it feels as though that is the hour when I make a dash for the Metropolitan.

"Now that I have got the run of things I am at home in this atmosphere, and I am looking forward expectantly to my work next season."

At the time of this writing Miss Mueller has left the United States. While at home she is intending to rest, and perhaps to make opera and concert appearances.

"I like concert singing," she told me. "In fact it was in recitals that I made my earliest public appearances. The war broke all that up, and I went into opera. But I shall sing in concerts again, I am sure. The future is important with me. I learn and learn all the time. The roles themselves come easy, but it is the interpretation that has to grow on you with practice and study. It is good to be a kind of prodigy. I like opera singing more than anything else in the world, and having started young, I simply have more of it than if I had only managed to get started later."

L. L.

Eastman Regrets Coates' Departure

Rochester, N. Y., April 21.—Commenting on the announcement of Albert Coates, former conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, in New York Saturday that he will not return to Rochester next season because of disagreements between himself and George Eastman over matters of policy, Mr. Eastman said that the matter is doubly regrettable.

Mr. Coates has been of great service, not only to the orchestra, Mr. Eastman declared, but the work of the British composer-conductor in connection with the Eastman School of Music has been notable since his connection here. Mr. Coates gave his services without stint during the formative years of the school, Mr. Eastman said, and he concluded by saying that Mr. and Mrs. Coates will be greatly missed in Rochester.

Music to Continue in Town Hall

The management of Town Hall, New York, has issued a statement denying current rumors that the building is to increase its civic activities to the exclusion of concerts.

MISS MARIA MUELLER

Foreign Notes

Paris, April 18.—Franz Lehar's Merry Widow was produced here last night for the first time in many years due to the ban on Austrian and German productions. Mary Lewis, former Ziegfeld Follies star, made her first appearance here.

Her beauty and ability as a dancer came in for unqualified praise although "however undeniably sweet may be the tone of her voice, its volume is insufficient to fill a large hall like the Apollo." The critics attributed this to natural nervousness and to her comparative unfamiliarity with the French language and one wrote that "even her faults were charming." Andre Messager, composer, added a word of praise for her performance.

Another American artist, Drusilla Taggert, daughter of Dr. Thomas Taggert, of Atlantic City, also received laudatory notice for her dancing.

Turin.—Boito's Nerone, directed by Arturo Toscanini, won a marked success at its first performance here on March 21 at the Teatro Regio. There were more than a score of curtain calls for the principals after the four acts.

London.—Eugene Goossens, English composer and conductor, has been conducting the Diaghileff Ballet Russe in Barcelona, Spain, during the past month. He will return here with the ballet in May when he will fulfill other engagements.

Mayence.—Out of the one hundred and three works submitted in the prize competition held by B. Schott's Sons for a concerto in chamber style, five winning works have been selected. These are by Paul Dessau (Berlin), Aare Merikanto (Finland), Ernst Toch (Vienna), Alexander Tcherepnin (Russia), and Hermann Wunsch (Berlin).

Because of the equality in excellence of the compositions, the 6,000 gold marks were divided among the five composers rather than following the original plan of awarding a first, second and lower prizes.

Milan.—Mme. Olga Carrara, soprano, who has returned to Italy after her South American tour, recently appeared as Valentina in Les Huguenots at Brescia. She was called to Naples by Maestro Marinuzzi, conductor of the San Carlo, to sing the leading soprano role in his opera, Jacquerie. She also sang in Aida and Tosca. Mme. Carrara is planning to sail next month for America.

Turin, Italy.—As the closing performance of the operatic season here the Teatro Regio presented Siegfried on April 6. It was directed by Gaetano Bavagnoli. The reviews had only praise for his work, but in general they found the tenor Canalda not up to his part.

An Australian singer, Signora Mizza, sang the role of Bruennhilde, and the Wotan and Mime were Cirino and Pini-Corsi. Villa, as Alberich; Signorina Amati, as Erda; Dominici as Fafner; and Signora Alberti, as the bird, completed the cast. The reviewer of La Stampa took particular exception in the performance to the length and choice of the cuts.

MUZIO
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

FORREST LAMONT
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Claudia Muzio Sings at Paris Opera

Appears in Aida; Orchestras Close a Season of Few Novelties; Varied Concerts.

Paris.

Claudia Muzio appeared in the role of Aida at the Paris Opera on March 30. The principals of this performance sang in Italian, the chorus in French, "and when all hands sang together," commented The Chicago Tribune, "the effect was quite Egyptian!"

The same journal remarked that Mme. Muzio's voice "seemed more beautiful than ever," and after paying homage to the singer's vocal art, said, "The chances are that she could make a role interesting if she hadn't a shred of her singing voice left, so completely does she sense and project the character in whose guise she appears." M. Pierre Maudru, writing in Comoedia devoted almost half a column to his opinion that Mme. Muzio's Italian diction is not what it should be!

"She is a magnificent singer," he added, "her mezza-voce is admirable, her musical feeling is exquisite; her facial expressions expressive and tragic; she does not forget—Mme. Muzio—that Aida, slave of the Pharaohs, is the daughter of a King, and she knows how to conserve a noble dignity."

Nina Koshetz Appears Often

Contrary to the usual custom, the first week of the Easter season in Paris was charged with musical activities. It seems that concert-givers and recitalists have decided that this year there shall be no let-up either in their work or in that of the reviewers.

Of the singers heard here this season, few enjoyed the success that Nina Koshetz has in her varied appearances. Since January 4 she has been heard nine times with the local symphony orchestras, has given four recitals, sung a number of times at the Paris Opera (in the role of Marina in Boris Godunoff), and is now one of the "head-liners" at the Champs-Elysees Music Hall.

Last week-end she was heard with the Pasdeloup Orchestra in company with Theodore Ritch, tenor, in songs from Moussorgsky's opera La Foire de Sorotchinski speaking of which M. Stan Golestan in Le Figaro said that "both singers have exquisite voices and are eloquent interpreters." M. G. de Pawlowski in Le Journal called Mme. Koshetz "an impeccable songstress," as also did Emile Vuillermoz in Candide when he wrote, "Her voice is unique. The instrument is faultless . . . here everything is right, everything is definite, and each note seems perfect from birth. Her vocal cords are really those of an Aeolian harp and the breath that plays upon them can draw nothing from them but moving tone."

Risler in Beethoven

Edouard Risler, the piano soloist heard during the second week of April with the Pasdeloup Orchestra in Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, "played that concerto," said Robert Dezarnaux in La Liberte, "with the sincerity and authority we love." The piano that M. Risler played was so badly out of tune that the writer in the Chicago Tribune, Paris Edition, "was ready to swear it had come from the studio of some voice teacher or other." In spite of this handicap, however, M. Risler played with the "admirable poise, dynamic subtlety and clarity" which distinguish his art.

The orchestra of La Societe des Concerts, which holds forth in the former Conservatoire building, has recently performed Beethoven's Ninth, Gabriel Faure's Requiem, and Cesar Franck's Beatitudes. With regard to the Beatitudes, M. Dezarnaux in La Liberte reported that he went to the Conservatory for the express purpose of hearing M. Gaubert's reading of them, "for M. Gaubert loves them and consequently conducts them well. The orchestral interpretation was superb. The most beautiful pages of the Beatitudes—of which fortunately there are many—M. Gaubert read with such fervor that not infrequently one was thrilled." M. Robert Brussel also heard the Beatitudes, and in Le Figaro wrote that "M. Gaubert brought out all their serene beauty," and that the singing of the soloists, Mme. Malnory-Marseilhac, and M. Till, "was distinguished by simplicity and purity of style and wealth of emotion."

Orchestral Season Closed

With this week (April 6-13) the Parisian orchestral season closed. Of course there will be symphonic concerts every once in a while from now on until the beginning of summer, but they are separate from the yearly course of each orchestra. Glancing over the programs of the orchestral activities that have just ended, one is astonished at the small number of new compositions performed. The Paris orchestras, heretofore so ardent in their pursuit of everything modern in music, have this year brought out comparatively little—in fact, so little that, for those who do not swear by the regular repertoires, the season has been extremely dull.

All the chroniclers have lifted their voices in lamentation of the lack of initiative the orchestras have thus far displayed. Robert Dezarnaux, moaning in La Liberte, spoke for all the critical tribe when he summarized the new music heard this season as "peu de chose." Paul Paray, conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra, "was less concerned with playing new works than he was with giving refined and well-balanced renderings of works already celebrated." Gabriel Pierne, conductor of the Colonne Orchestra, "gave programs that were livelier and more varied. Among other things he created le Miroir de Jesus, of Andre Caplet, and brought out La Nuit and the Chants d'Auvergne of M. Canteloube—not a brilliant year, and yet not one that is lost!"

The Pasdeloup Orchestra, under M. Rhene-Baton, performed the "exquisite, little suite En Kerneo of Louis Vuillemin," which is all that Pasdeloup did worthy of remembrance. The Societe des Concerts makes no pretense at being in the modern swim and hence no one complains when its programs retain their classical and safe and sound aspects.

Interest in the music of one J. S. Bach increases steadily. Hardly a soprano who has not sung at least one song of the great John Sebastien at her Paris recital this season, not to mention the performances of Bach by the orchestras, the church choirs, and the rest. Leading in the Bach movement is La Societe J. S. Bach de Paris, which is heard in the Eglise de l'Etoile, Gustave Bret, conductor, Alexandre Cellier, organist. The Societe has already given four big Bach concerts this season. "These performances," wrote M. Adolphe Jullien in Le Journal des Debats, "are absolutely worthy of the Master of Masters to whom they would do honor."

Many Piano Recitals Given

Among the pianists who were heard during the first week of April, Charles Lesueur, according to Louis Schneider of Le Gaulois, "possesses a superb technic but it is never employed to the detriment of musicality; his tone is exquisite; he is tender and powerful." Stan Golestan, in Le Figaro reported that M. Lesueur's playing "is harmonious and charmingly delicate."

The same writer, mentioning other pianists of recent appearances, praised the playing of Adolph Borchard for "its astonishing expressive variety;" that of Marius-Francois Gaillard for its "rich nuances, subtlety, and poetry;" accused M. Michel Barajansky of "abusing the pedal;" and found that with Andre Salomon "the purest and most beautiful music reigns," and that this pianist is one of the "most gifted artists of the generation."

New Music Concert

La Societe musicale independante, which is devoted entirely to the production of new music, at its last concert brought out compositions, some of which no one seemed anxious to hear again. Paul Le Flem, writing for Comoedia, was the only writer who covered this concert in detail, and the following remarks are gleaned from his paragraphs:

"From the very beginning of the Third Quartet of Janco Binenbaum, we are thrown into the midst of a tumult of notes and rhythms. It is a merciless struggle in the course of which the listener in vain attempts to attach himself to some microscopic cellules or to some fixed point. Useless trouble! This first emotion done with, an adagio somewhat calm but cut into by spasms, gives us some respite. With the last movement, the struggle begins again with renewed violence . . . and the auditor, more discountenanced by this frenzy of notes than he is surprised by the newness of the process, applauds with all his heart the playing of the Vandelle Quartet!

"The Quartet of M. Berthet," thought this reviewer, "is of a better policed, more refined aestheticism. The instruments are treated respectfully and are not submitted to any deceptive tentatives. The result is that the sonorities do not have to suffer by running the risks of accidents and that they are clean and nicely contrasted." The best moment of the seance for M. Le Flem was the suite of songs, Le Monde de Rosee, which Claude Delvincourt composed on Japanese verses. "Everything here is airy and full of feeling. M. Delvincourt knows how to manage the voice. The harmonic scheme is rich, and the harmonies never become aggressive . . ." The Dialogue for two violins of M. Raymond Petit "consist of two charming pieces which sound very good," he said further.

Further reviews are available of the

(Continued on page 17)

GRADOVA
"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

Fleta
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

Sensational in Opera Triumphant in Concert
Jeritza
Now Booking
Season 1925-1926
Sole management
Metropolitan Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City
Knabe Piano
Victor Records

OLD-WORLD HIGHLIGHTS

Vienna Opera Presents Ballets

Stravinsky's Pulcinella and Mozart Piece Set by Kroeller; Battistini Sings in Ernani.

Vienna.

Four varied ballets on a single program were recently offered by the Opera in the Redoutensaal der Hofburg, which with its great arched ceiling and fine architecture is considered one of the most beautiful theatres in the world. The four works were settings of Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite, Mozart's Les Petits Riens, and two less important pieces made up of music of Anton Rubinstein and Johann Strauss.

The entire program had been prepared under the supervision of Professor Kroeller, ballet director of the opera, and he not only trained the artists, but also conceived the choreography. Kroeller has been making strenuous efforts to develop the art of the ballet corps of the opera along modern lines and to enrich its traditional style with methods of the present day. For this particular performance he worked especially hard, and his efforts were not in vain.

The Mozart piece is a youthful work of the composer which he composed when he was in Paris, and it is a good illustration of what the influence of the French capital was upon his work. In Les Petits Riens he accepted fully the traditions of the French ballet, but he added to them the flavor of his own genius. The ballet is not very well known, nor was it long ago redeemed from obscurity. The original synopsis of the story of the ballet is not to be found, but a rough sketch of its libretto is at hand. From this Kroeller worked out an effective setting of his own.

Franz Schalk Conducts

Stravinsky's Pulcinella was the second number of the evening, this also with choreography the product of Kroeller's imagination. It was done with revolving scenery and in the costumes of the Italian Comedia dell'Arte. The orchestral accompaniment, directed throughout the evening by Franz Schalk, was here particularly effective.

The music itself is a resultant of the geniality of Stravinsky and the melodic spontaneity of Pergolesi, whose material the former has worked over in this score. It was heard in concert form several days previously, at that time conducted by Fritz Stiedry, director of the Volksoper. The first desk men of the Volksoper orchestra scintillated in the tasks they had to perform in Pulcinella. The Rubinstein and Strauss ballets, also directed by Kroeller, were successful, but not very distinguished.

Of Stiedry himself and of the condition of the Volksoper there is little to be said that is new. The organization is still in economic difficulties, and is bending every effort to get out of them, but the way is still not clear.

Volksoper Lives on Operetta

At present it is subsisting on the profits of an operetta by Kalman, Die Graefin Mariza. This piece ran not long ago for fourteen consecutive months, with daily performances, at another theatre. The managers of this house were compelled by their pledges after that period to undertake other productions, with the result that Die Graefin Mariza was transferred to the Volksoper. It is being produced there with success usually four times a week.

In the Staatsoper there was lately detected a breath of life when Battistini appeared in Verdi's Ernani, a work which the Italian composer wrote in 1844, nearly a half century before his final opera, Falstaff.

During the past winter Battistini has appeared in Vienna not only in six concerts, each of which filled the largest concert hall in the city, but he has had marked success on the operatic stage also. And his success seems quite justified, for despite his age his voice is as fine as ever, and his art of song recalls the heyday of bel canto.

The performance of Ernani which Battistini sang was a revival at the Staatsoper. The prices of admission were unusually high, but nevertheless a capacity audience was on hand.

The last time that the work was heard was in Mahler's time, some twenty years ago. At its revival the other day it aroused new wonder. The conductor of the occasion was Pietro Mascagni. In general the reviewers were of the opinion that Viennese conductors of the past have presented Verdi's work with at least as much ardor as did Mascagni, and with considerable more precision and accuracy to the composer's intentions.

Tales of Hoffmann Heard

A recent Vienna performance of note was that of Offenbach's Tales of Hoffmann by the students of the Hochschule fur Musik in their cosy Akademietheater. The production was remarkable in all respects, considering the circumstances. Much of the credit for the success of it must go to Josef Turnau, who directed the entire affair.

Two leading German conductors have been recent visitors to Vienna. Fritz Busch came from Dresden to conduct one concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra in place of Franz Schalk. His program included the Oberon Overture, Reger's Mozart Variations, and Brahms' Second Symphony. The other visitor was Oskar Fried, who had not been heard here for about three years. His old qualities he displayed once more, but in such a light that a fresh impression of his talents was recorded by his large audiences and by the newspaper music writers.

Quite a reception was accorded Anton von Webern when he conducted a concert of the Workers' Symphony Orchestra, which he organized. At this concert the orchestra was assisted by a small chorus.

At another concert Vienna had the opportunity to hear a kind of cross between a cembalo and a piano, played by Julia Menz, a Munich musician. The instrument has an attachment whereby its tone is made to resemble that of a cembalo, but it is capable of ordinary piano tone also. Mme. Menz played with skill and good effect a program which included classical music which was well fitted for the timbre of her instrument.

Orchestral Novelties Played

Vienna has been hearing few new works for orchestra. All the more welcome, therefore, was the concert of the Friends of Music which included several new compositions, all directed by Leopold Reichwein. The three novelties were a Concerto Grosso of Heinrich Kaminski, one of the more promising of the new generation of composers; a Piano Concerto by Ernst Krenek, played by Eduard Erdmann, and a Passacaglia for orchestra by Professor Prohaska of the Vienna Academy of Music. All three compositions were well received, but the reception of the Krenek concerto was exceptional.

Among the recitalists was Ignaz Friedman, who has now been heard in four piano recitals here. His audiences have increased in size from visit to visit. Eleanor Spencer, also a pianist, made an impression with her unusual technical abilities. Two French musicians also were heard, Marcel Ciampi, pianist, and the cellist Juliette Alvin, a pupil of Pablo Casals.

PAUL STEFAN.

First Performance of Holst Falstaff Opera

Manchester.

The Falstaff opera by Mr. Gustav Holst, whose imminent production has been holding out great interest in English musical circles, has at last been given here (April 4) by the British National Opera Company, and won the warmest of receptions. Compounded out of two or three scenes from the first and second parts of Henry IV, this work, called At the Boar's Head, makes a short piece of continuous action, the words practically wholly Shakespearean.

The "experiment" thus made by Mr. Holst, said Ernest Newman in the Sunday Times, is "very curious and for the most part successful. . . . We have had folk tunes before, in the Beggar's Opera and Polly," continued Mr. Newman, "but they were just 'numbers' in a spoken play. Here the musical tissue is continuous. We have had, as in Hugh the Drover, folk music and original music in the folk vein added to a connected dramatic text, but the text was expressly planned to take the music. Again, we have had, in the case of Pelleas et Melisande, a musician take a prose drama and set it word for word, but to music of his own invention throughout. The present case differs from all the others. Mr. Holst has taken a well-known dramatic text on the one hand, some thirty-five traditional melodies on the other, and welded the two masses into an organic whole. The word 'original' opposite a tune occurs only three times."

Interpolates Sonnet Settings

Two of these tunes are settings for sonnets interpolated into the dramatic text which Mr. Holst makes Prince Hal sing. "The difficulty" presented by these settings "Mr. Holst has overcome; he make it seem the most natural thing in the world that the Prince should sing just these words just then, and the melody he has invented for them, beautifully free in rhythm, remote in style and yet without a suspicion of archaism, seems a natural emanation from them.

"One is astonished at the general congruity between Shakespeare's words and the traditional tunes; it is only here and there that we feel they have been arbitrarily mated rather than twin-born. And just as astonishing is the way in which, again and again, one tune leads into another so naturally that anyone who did not know them would imagine two or three of the joined-up melodies to be simply parts of an original whole. And what tunes they all are! Their raciness, their lustiness, are a tonic for English blood.

Manner of Performance Important

"Whether the opera succeeds or not will depend," Mr. Newman thinks, "on the manner of performance. The performance showed its peculiar difficulties and some miscalculations. The words are manifestly of the first importance throughout. In Germany, the opera would be a sure success, because the audience would know its Shakespeare. In England, one can-

(Continued on page 17)

EVERY READER OF "THE MUSICAL DIGEST"
SHOULD READ
"Music & Letters"
The British Musical Quarterly
"Those who give thought to the vital and intimate problems of music can always find a budget of good matter in Music & Letters."
—London Morning Post.
100 pages; 20s per annum post free.
LONDON: 22 ESSEX STREET, W. C. 2.

ABBY MORRISON
SOPRANO SAN CARLO GRAND OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: H. J. ANDERSEN, 67 East 55th Street, New York City
Telephone Plaza 7147

Ethyl HAYDEN
Lyric Soprano
Management: Loudon Charlton—Carnegie Hall, New York

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

Perosi Choral Music Heard

Molinari Conducts at Augusteum; Stravinsky's Histoire d'un Soldat; I Cavalieri and Parsifal.

Rome.

Two long neglected choral works of Lorenzo Perosi were performed at the Augusteum on April 5: his oratorio, The Entrance of Christ Into Jerusalem, and his poem, Transitus Animae. The concert was directed by Bernardino Molinari, and the chorus was drilled by Maestro Traversi.

The soloists in the oratorio were the baritone Inghilleri and the basso de Santos. Signora Minghini-Cattaneo was soloist in the Transitus Animae. The reviewers wrote that on the whole the two compositions represented Perosi at his very best, and singled out the Benedictus, the Hosannah, and the Curse of Jerusalem in the oratorio as having unusual dramatic and musical power.

The singers and Maestro Molinari were much applauded by the large audience which attended the concert. Umberto Giordano, the operatic composer, was among those who were present.

Perform L'Histoire d'un Soldat

A novelty by Igor Stravinsky, his L'Histoire d'un Soldat was performed on the day previous in the Teatro Odescalchi, formerly known as the Teatro dei Piccoli. This music, written for violin, clarinet, trumpet, bassoon, trombone, double-bass, and percussion instruments, was conducted by Alfredo Casella, and the consensus was that he did his work well, although the piece itself was not very favorably treated in the reviews.

The chronicler of La Tribuna reported, "From this bizarre combination of instruments came indescribable tonal combinations. One felt as though he was present at the cacophonious exercises of a comic circus band. At times L'Histoire contains the sort of music which we are accustomed to hear at the variety shows when the clowns of the performance are carrying on their most strenuous pace, and always there are present traces of the crude exaggerations of negro jazz."

L'Histoire had considerable success with its audience, although the enthusiasm which it aroused was of a special kind. The program of the concert was begun with a performance of the First Brandenburg Concerto of Johann Sebastian Bach. In this number Casella assisted at the harpsichord.

Mozart Requiem Sung

The Mozart Requiem was sung under the auspices of the Roman Philharmonic Academy at the Sala Sgambati on April 6. It was several decades, according to the best records available, since this music had previously been heard in Rome.

The reviewer of La Tribuna was impressed by the power of the Dies Irae, and by the melodic purity of the Lacrimosa. The technical skill with which Mozart worked out his ideas was considered remarkable by this writer, although he felt that in the long run the music was not quite capable of arousing an extended religious mood at the present day, after Parsifal and other works of its kind have entirely changed the outlook of the world on religious music.

Nevertheless the Requiem was considered well worth performance. The Philharmonic Academy seems to have gone about its task seriously. The chorus sang well, thanks largely to the training of Mario Rossi, and the orchestra, directed by Maestro di Donato, supported it worthily.

The tasks of the solo parts were entrusted to Tina Poggetti, Gilda Alfano, the tenor Michele Raggini, and the basso Giuseppe Flamini, who were more than adequate to the music which they had to sing. The audience applauded the performers sincerely and warmly, if not boisterously.

Costanzi Has Its Turn With Ekebu

Zandonai's new opera, I Cavalieri di Ekebu, had as great a success at the Teatro Costanzi on March 28 as it had in its world premiere at the Milan Scala three weeks previously. The members of the cast, the conductor, Edoardo Vitale, and the composer were called before the curtain thirty times by the enthusiastic audience.

The Roman public seemed overjoyed at the lyrical directness of Zandonai's style in this opera, following as it does a period in his career when he wrote in a semi-chaotic manner which displayed unblended the influence of the theatre of the modern symphonic style.

The action throughout the four acts of I Cavalieri is effectively enhanced by the score, and the music aids materially in the cumulative development of the drama. It was the ability of Zandonai to pay strict attention at once to the aesthetic principles of present-day music and of traditional Italian cantabile and to combine the two styles into one that has won him his remarkable success both in Milan and in Rome with his new opera. Some Italian musicians feel that I Cavalieri may for Zandonai be an epoch-making work, for with it he has at last won his way to the hearts of the opera-going public.

MME. NINA KOSHETZ

Russian Soprano Who Has Made Many Paris Appearances This Season, Both in Recital and With Orchestra.

The presentation of the work by the Costanzi forces was excellent, and much of the credit for it was due to the work of Maestro Vitale. The tenor Merli sang the role of Giosta Berling, and Signora Bianco-Sadun was the Commandante. Signor Dentale as Sintram, Maddalena Bugg as Anna, and Signor Parvis as Cristiano, made up the rest of the principals.

Parsifal Returned to Repertory

Wagner's Parsifal, after an absence of four years from the Costanzi repertory, was revived on April 8. It won an extraordinary success. It was directed again by Maestro Vitale.

The entire press was unanimous in approval of the singing and acting of Lina Pasini-Vitale in the role of Kundry. She had not sung at the Costanzi for several seasons before this appearance. The last time she sang Kundry there was in 1914. Isidoro Fagoaga, the protagonist, was praised by the reviewer of Il Mondo for the freshness of his voice.

Nazzareno de Angelis sang the part of Gurnemanz, and the chroniclers were of the opinion that he could not be excelled in his portrayal of this character. He is known for this impersonation at La Scala. The baritone Gherardini was found to be more than satisfactory as Amfortas.

The performance was repeated two days later, Good Friday.

F. C.

Paris Orchestras Finish; Many Recitals and Operas

(Continued from page 15)

Paris debut some time ago of the pianist Anton Bilotti. M. St. Golestan of Le Figaro considered him an outstanding artist, and said besides, "He played with happy contrast and facile technique." The reviewer of Le Gaulois, M. Lagarde used almost the same laudatory phrases, and complimented M. Bilotti on the manner in which he developed with complete subtlety of nuance a truly Beethovenian mood. The Excelsior writer praised the pianist for the "striking frankness" and spontaneity of his phrasing, and said that he attained great breadth of interpretation in works of Beethoven and Liszt without once appearing immoderate in his accentuation, qualities which denoted, in his opinion, "a supple taste and a sincere attitude."

Rigoletto in Italian

The Paris Opera on April 4 put on Rigoletto in Italian. It was a gala performance, and attracted a large and fashionable audience. M. Andre Gresse in Le Journal, after informing the public that he could console himself very easily if he never again heard Rigoletto, called attention to the fact that "the piece was interpreted by Mlle. de Hidalgo, who is Spanish, M. Smirnoff, who is Russian, Joseph Schwarz, who is German-American, and by M. Gresse, who excellently represented France."

"Remarkabe ensemble," he called the performance, "in which were affirmed the vocal mastery of Mlle. de Hidalgo and of M. Smirnoff, and the dramatic sentiment and art of M. Schwarz, baritone of the Chicago Opera." The Chicago Tribune, Paris Edition, found that M. Schwarz "unites a magnificent vocal art with a histrionic method of the first water;" that Mlle. de Hidalgo "poured forth her voice sweetly and musically;" and that M. Smirnoff's Duke was "vulgar."

At the Boar's Head

(Continued from page 16)

not count on such knowledge, and the only thing to be done is for the actors to make certain that not a line of Shakespeare's juicy rant shall be lost."

The Daily Telegraph correspondent was most favorably disposed. "Whatever its constituents," he wrote, "this music adds zest and momentum to the comic scenes; it rises to dignity and eloquence in the noble monologue of Prince Henry; it sets in relief every element of the last episode where the love passages of Falstaff and Ball are broken off by war alarms, and the Hostess' valediction touches the note heard again in Henry V when she mourns over the knight that has gone 'to Arthur's bosom.'"

The only productions of At the Boar's Head in London in the near future will take place at the Golder's Green Hippodrome, one of London's "subway circuit" theatres, on April 20 and 29.

P. L.

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist
Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer Flutist
Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records
Mason & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

RAYMOND HAVENS Pianist
Solist with BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 8 performances
Soloist with CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 2 performances
Soloist with MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 3 performances
For Dates and Terms Address:
EVELYN LIGHT, Sec. 87 Pinckney St., Boston, Mass.

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON 1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

EDWIN HUGHES' Summer Master Classes for pianists have been for seasons past one of the musical features of the metropolis during the vacation period, when students from all parts of the country visit New York for summer study. Mr. Hughes will hold his eighth consecutive Summer Master Class in New York City from June 29 to August 8.

The work will be divided into private and class lessons. In the latter a concise course in modern technical development will be given, including the principles of weight-playing, relaxation, and tone-production. In addition, the fundamental principles of interpretation will be elucidated and applied to all schools of piano composition, and the aesthetic and pedagogical sides of piano playing will be discussed and illustrated.

Mr. Hughes will present demonstrations of the results attained under his instruction in a series of weekly recitals by young artists from his class.

As a former assistant to Theodore Leschetizky in Vienna, and later during his years of residence in Munich, Mr. Hughes' class included students and graduates from many of the prominent European conservatories, and since his coming to New York he has numbered among his pupils graduates of the best known musical institutions in America.

During a period of less than two years past, nine individual recitals have been given in Aeolian Hall, New York, by professional pupils of Edwin Hughes. In addition Hughes pupils have appeared in the last few seasons no less than twelve times with orchestra in New York, as well as with the Detroit and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestras.

Columbia University's Music Department announces its annual concert of original compositions to be given under the direction of Prof. Seth Bingham in the McMillin Academic Theatre tomorrow evening. Faculty members will be represented by a set of variations for string quartet on a theme from John Powell's Sonata Noble. They include Daniel Gregory Mason, Seth Bingham, Bassett Hough and Berrian Shutes.

Students will also be represented by a set of variations, by Philip Harburger, David Barnett, Edward Margetson, Everett Foster and Julian De Gray. Other interesting features are a violin sonata by Williard Rhodes, a piano quartet by Edward Robinson and songs by Marion Howe, Morris Watkins, Ruth Coleman and Morris Ruger. Herbert Dittler, violinist; Margaret Northrup, soprano; Alice McComb Ripple, contralto; William Taylor, baritone, and a string quartet from the Institute of Musical Art, will assist.

The University Choral Clubs of Rutgers College and the New Jersey College for Women, Howard D. McKinney conductor, will give their second annual concert in Town Hall, New York, on May 1. The assisting artists will be Mary E. Schenck, and J. Earle Newton, pianists, and Paul Parks, baritone.

A meeting of teachers of singing, drama, all musical instruments and dancing will take place at Tarasoff's Dancing School, New York, on Thursday.

The purpose of this meeting is to discuss a plan of erecting a home and studio building on a co-operative basis to be owned by teachers, where accommodations may be secured by buying a life interest or by the usual rental system. The project planned is to offer not only studios and living apartments, but also a large auditorium for public concerts; small halls for intimate recitals or private entertainments; a gymnasium, billiard room, library, cafeteria and other inducements conducive to recreation and social intercourse.

Vladimir Rosing, for two years director of the operatic department of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, and producing director of the Rochester American Opera Company, which is an outgrowth of that department, will relinquish his executive work in connection with that department at the close of the present school year, so that he may devote his full time to production of the operas which the Eastman School opera department will make next season in both the Eastman Theatre and in Kilbourn Hall of the Eastman School. Mr. Rosing will also be sole director of any productions which the Rochester American Opera Company may make outside Rochester.

The laying aside of responsibility for the executive conduct of the Eastman School's opera department will give Mr. Rosing opportunity for intensive conduct of his work as producer; thus far he has carried a double responsibility.

More operas are to be given next season by the Eastman School's department than have been in the past. Interest of public and support by the press in Rochester have steadily increased as public performances by the Rochester American Opera Company have demonstrated the value of this project in behalf of opera sung in English by American singers.

A public music memory contest open to all music students, school children, professional and non-professional adults, with a prize of $100 for the winner, will be a feature of the Music Week celebration being offered by William Knabe & Co., piano makers, at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, May 5, at Town Hall. Public schools and high schools will each be allowed to send up to twenty contestants. The music school settlements, music colleges and music teachers of the city are also invited to send representatives. The memory contest will follow the usual rules sponsored by the National Music Week Association.

EDWIN HUGHES
American Pianist and Teacher Who Will Conduct Summer Master Classes in His New York Studios During the Coming Months.

Erwin Nyireghazi, young Hungarian pianist, will play an entire concert and there will be no printed program. The member of the audience who recognizes correctly each number of the program, title of the composition and composer, and who submits the most intelligent criticism on Mr. Nyireghazi's playing, will receive the prize of $100. Printed forms will be distributed to the entire audience, and immediately after the concert the written slips will be collected.

In the case of no contestant submitting a complete correct list of the compositions played by Mr. Nyireghazi, a prize of $50 will be given to the one who names the most correct numbers and $25 each to the next two. In case there are more than one completely correct list the award of the complete prize will be made to the contestant who submits the most intelligent criticism with his list.

The College of Music String Quartet of the University of South Dakota gave a concert in the University Auditorium on March 3. The members of the Quartet are Winfred Colton, first violin, Lillian Brown, second violin, Neil Boardman, viola, and Ella Colton, cello.

Curtis Institute Names New Additions to Faculty

Mrs. Mary Louise Curtis Bok, president of the board of directors of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, has announced several additions to the faculty of the Institute for the season 1925-26. Josef Hofmann, who has been teaching at the school since January, will have charge of the piano department of the master school next season.

Mrs. Bok announced that Wanda Landowska will be associated with Mr. Hofmann in the piano department together with William Bachaus.

Continuing with Mr. Hofmann in the piano department of the master school will be George F. Boyle, who will devote his entire time to his enlarged master classes, and David Saperton, of New York, as personal assistant to Mr. Hofmann.

The violin department of the master school will be under the personal direction of Carl Flesch, of Berlin. Richard Hartzer, of Berlin, will take up his duties in September as assistant to Mr. Flesch, with whom Frank Gittelson, Sascha Jacobinoff and Emanuel Zetlin will continue to be associated in the conduct of master violin classes.

Michel Penha, who will not be with the Philadelphia Orchestra next year, and who is reported to have signed with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, will be succeeded by Felix Salmond. Louis Bailly, formerly of the Flonzaley Quartet, will teach the viola.

A notable addition to the vocal department, which will continue under the personal direction of Madame Marcella Sembrich, is Emilio de Gogorza, baritone. Madame Charles Cahier has also been re-engaged for special master classes in the vocal department.

Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will continue in charge of orchestral training at the Institute, as well as a member of the advisory council. It is reported that Thaddeus Rich, his associate in the direction of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be his associate also in orchestral training at the Institute.

W. E. Walter, former manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, will take up his duties as new executive director of the Institute in a few weeks.

Teachers' College of Columbia University, New York, has announced special summer courses in Music and Music Education for teachers and supervisors of school music touching on music appreciation, theory of music, the physics of music, and methods of instruction, both vocal and instrumental. The summer session lasts from July 6 to August 14.

V. TREVISAN
VOCAL STUDIO
Chicago Civic Opera Association
74 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.

DUDLEY BUCK
Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City
Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

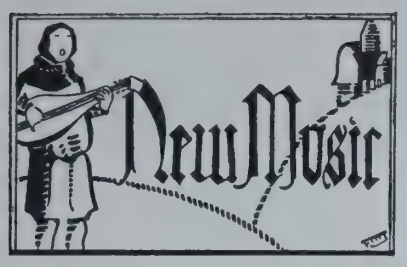
HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
11-12 Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

ARTHUR J. HUBBARD — VINCENT V. HUBBARD
Teachers of Singing in All Its Branches
246 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, MASS.

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephones: Circle 10117

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director
120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application
Address Dept. V



TWO transcriptions for the piano of Chinese music are among the recent issues of Carl Fischer. Harriette Cady is the arranger of the colorful Spring Song (Sian Chok) and Chinese Lullaby. The pieces have unusual charm, with a distinctive melodiousness that is genuine and spontaneous, and not simply writing according to the formula of Oriental modes.

Samuel Becker himself is the publisher (Minneapolis, Minn.) of his own four Character Sketches for the piano. The Petite Valse Caprice is catchy and melodious, and hints of the influence of Chopin, although it can hardly claim the distinction of the better works in that form of the Polish master. It is of moderate difficulty, and well adapted to the use of teachers.

The same is true of Mr. Becker's Slavonic Romance, which has a certain dark dramatic force. The Valse Allurement is fitted either for study or perhaps for concert use. It is in the traditional vein, and is not too difficult to play. The Trial is descriptive of a Russian tragedy, heavy in its accent and serious in mood.

Three new songs of the semi-popular type are published by M. Witmark and Sons. They are David Guion's Howdy Do, Mis' Springtime (issued in three ranges); Frederick W. Vanderpool's Home to My Joy and Thee (in four ranges); and Arthur A. Penn's When the Sun Goes Down (in three ranges). These ballads have an intimate appeal which certain concert artists have recognized by including them in their recital repertories, either for encore songs or for numbers in American groups.

Schirmer is publishing as a number in its Scholastic Series Eduard Poldini's Moments Musicaux for the piano. This volume contains twenty-five nameless interpretative studies for the student of intermediate technical standing. Each piece is a page or two long, and among them they illustrate every shade of light romantic mood.

The melodic and rhythmic interest of these compositions is unusual. There are a certain grace and individual touch in them all, and the virtue of these qualities is particularly that they are not forced. The work is thoroughly edited in respect to pedalling, phrasing, and dynamics, but the fingering is left to teacher and student. This is a fitting member of the busy piano teacher's pedagogical repertory.

Gigli Sings at De Curtis Concert

A large audience applauded the concert given by Ernesto de Curtis of his own compositions at Town Hall on April 16. Mr. de Curtis was assisted by Beniamino Gigli, tenor, Caterina Gobbi, soprano, Silvio Sideli, baritone, Gladys Barnett, pianist, Mario Caiati, cellist, and Diomed Avlonitis, violinist.

JOSEF ADLER
Teacher of Piano
ACCOMPANIST
137 West 86th St. New York
Phone Schuyler 3580

Ethyl Hayden Heard In New York Recital

Ethyl Hayden, soprano, was heard in recital at Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 20.

According to W. J. Henderson of the Sun, she has "a naturally warm and mellow quality in the medium and a fine ringing clarity in the upper scale which is the result of a competent management of head tone. . . . She has an admirable attack, a sufficient breath control and a nice conception of phrasing." He remarked that her intonation was improved, and that "she has style, but not a high degree of influential eloquence."

Deems Taylor of the World found that "the quality of her voice is as good as ever it was and at its natural best it is a beautiful one. In addition, Miss Hayden is beginning to show much more variety and expressiveness in her singing . . . she has yet to combine technique and interpretation." Writing in the Telegram-Mail, Pitts Sanborn commented that she is "a delightful singer" and proved "most satisfying in lyric music."

In the opinion of Olin Downes of the Times, "the voice is not of the color especially suited to dramatic expression, but is flexible, lovely rather than rich in character, and of a particular brilliance and resonance in the upper tones." The Post commentator thought her voice had improved materially, "being now flexible and, especially in the upper tones, resonant and brilliant." The writer in the Herald Tribune also lauded the "clearness and purity" of her high voice.

Will Aid Young Artists

Walter W. Naumberg last week announced a gift to musicians in memory of his father, the late Elkan Naumberg, who gave New York City its $100,000 bandstand in Central Park. The son has asked Alexander Lambert to act as Chairman with Mischa Elman and Richard Aldrich, on a committee to select young artists ready for professional careers. Mr. Naumberg will defray costs of the first public recitals of these musicians.

The plan is limited at first to pianists and violinists. Candidates will have preliminary hearings on application to the National Music League.

Society Will End Season

The closing recital of the American Orchestral Society of the season will take place in Town Hall, New York, on Thursday afternoon. The assisting artists will be Olga Samaroff and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play Mozart's E flat Concerto for two pianos and orchestra.

MISS ETHYL HAYDEN
Soprano, Was Heartily Praised by New York Reviewers After Her Song Recital in Carnegie Hall Last Week.

Music School Series Concluded

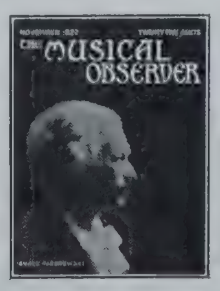
The last of the series of concerts for the benefit of the Association of Music School Settlements was given in Carnegie Hall, New York, April 19. Myra Hess, pianist, Clara Sanchez, soprano, and Carlos Sedano, violinist, played for the first half of the program. The second part was opened by the Roger Wolfe Kahn Orchestra, after a short speech by John Philip Sousa. Olga Steck, Russell Mack, Burr McIntosh, the Moscow Art Trio, and Norman Phillips also contributed to the entertainment. A song by Channing Pollock and Ted Barron, with Mr. Barron at the piano, closed the program.

Gives Intimate Song Recital

Suzanne Zimmerman, soprano, gave a recital in Chickering Hall, New York, April 18. She was accompanied by Bruno Huhn in a group of songs by Grieg and others by Parker, Buzzi-Peccia, Huhn, Cowen, Saint-Saens, Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Faure, Bizet, and Gounod. According to the Herald-Tribune, her program was "well received." The Times reviewer remarked that "in an intimate auditorium, Miss Zimmerman displayed genuine charm."

Singers' Club in Last Concert

The Singers' Club of New York, conducted by Ralph Grosvenor, gave the second and final concert of its twenty-second season in Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 16. The soloists were William Wollenhaupt, baritone, and Emma Patten Hoyt, soprano. A large audience applauded numbers by Seymour, Gaines, Schubert, Coleridge-Taylor, Bartholomew and Handel.



This Coupon Is Worth 25c

LET'S GET ACQUAINTED!

If you are interested in a Music Magazine full of good, practical, interesting, novel reading matter and carefully selected musical compositions, mail this coupon with 25 cents and let us send you two issues of the MUSICAL OBSERVER.

THE MUSICAL OBSERVER CO.
62 COOPER SQUARE, N. Y. CITY

NAME .....ADDRESS .....
CITY .....STATE .....

FUGITIVE NOTES ON SOME CANTATAS AND THE MOTETS OF J. S. BACH, by W. G. Whittaker; published by the Oxford University Press, American Branch, New York.

Books whose subject matter is technical detail hold out a special fascination, no matter whether the subject matter is geometry, bridge-building, or the culinary art. There are times when the constant reader has revulsions against the most ingenious of fiction or the most sensible of criticism. He feels the urge to go directly to the mat with facts and figures, and to wrestle with ideas which have more than literary elegance to recommend them.

Such a book is Mr. Whittaker's. Articles and volumes in which the art of Bach are extolled in general terms of soul and spirit are frequent. Mr. Whittaker takes that for granted. He approaches Bach's choral works from a practical angle. He discusses them from the point of view of presentation, with the customary difficulties of limited resources in mind.

"They (these notes)," he says, "are merely the outcome of a study of the works themselves for actual performance, and of a collation of the leading commentators on them, Spitta, Pirro, Parry, and Schweitzer. What then is the apology for their compilation? The writer remembers his early attempts to understand the church cantatas. There were but few published in English. The original text was not issued with these, and consequently passage after passage was incomprehensible, for translators have very often strangely little respect for composers' intentions. That certain words should be associated with certain phrases and with certain notes, particularly in the recitatives, that every detail of their meaning should be commented on by the music, are things undreamt of in the philosophy of many translators."

It is such difficulties as these, and the problems of orchestral accompaniment of these chorales by organizations whose instrumental resources are limited, and from time to time the matter of cuts (or of transferences of solo parts to the chorus) when they are absolutely necessary to tide over a lack of soloists, that Mr. Whittaker discusses in his Notes.

After all this is the better way of doing service to Bach—simply to make it easier to have his music sung and heard. A considerable bibliography is included by Mr. Whittaker in his volume, and also valuable summaries of the history of church cantatas and of motets.

The text of the book itself includes minute studies of fourteen cantatas and six motets. In each article the author discusses details of interpretation, of text, and of musical and verbal significance. Musical illustrations are used on almost every page. Further information regarding the choral works of Bach is supplied in the very complete appendices. The Notes are full of indispensable information.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

Metropolitan Opera Opens Atlanta Week

Gala Crowds Turn Out for Nightly Performances; Rosa Ponselle Unable to Sing.

Atlanta, April 23.—The Metropolitan Opera Company opened its fifteenth season here Monday night before an unusually large and brilliant audience in the Auditorium with Ponchielli's La Gioconda. Because of a sudden attack of tonsilitis, Rosa Ponselle was unable to sing, and Frances Peralta substituted for her. Tullio Serafin made his first appearance here as conductor.

According to Hugh Hodgson, of the Constitution, Mme. Peralta's "beautiful soprano voice seemed to be in unusually excellent condition for her unexpected opportunity to shine with the stars of the capable cast." After conquering an initial nervousness, continued this writer, she "gained confidence and sang with her accustomed ease and beauty of tone." O. B. Keeler, of the Journal, wrote in similar vein of her performance.

Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, another newcomer to Atlanta, disclosed, to quote Ralph T. Jones, of the Constitution, a voice "of power and brilliance." Mr. Keeler commented on his "incredible beauty of tone." The histrionic and vocal talents of both Giuseppe Danise and Jose Mardones were highly praised by the chroniclers. Jeanne Gordon's "voluptuous tones and glorious presence" received Mr. Jones' commendation and Mr. Keeler made mention of her "magnificent stage presence" and "superb voice." Marion Telva also was highly praised.

According to Mr. Jones, Mr. Serafin proved "a master wielding a baton tipped with genius." No less enthusiastic over the conductor were other writers who also commended the work of the chorus and the stage production.

* * *

The opera heard on Tuesday night was Falstaff with the following cast: Mmes. Bori, Alda, Telva, and Howard and Messrs. Scotti, Tibbett, Tokatyan, Bada, Paltrinieri, and Didur. Mr. Serafin again conducted.

Another capacity audience heard the opera and, in the words of Mr. Keeler, "the season of 1925 may be regarded as launched toward a brilliantly successful terminus." The work of the members of the cast met with the enthusiastic praise of both the audience and the reviewers.

* * *

Mr. Hodgson wrote that "La Juive was presented Wednesday night in all of its dramatic glory and with an unusual amount of spirit and enthusiasm." Miss Ponselle's condition was improved, but she was still unable to appear. Florence Easton was called upon to fill her role. According to the Constitution, Atlanta regretted not having the opportunity of "enjoying Miss Ponselle's glorious voice" but added that Miss Easton "pleased the large audience with her lovely voice, her customary skill in song, her intelligence and genuine musicianship."

Giovanni Martinelli's Eleazar was the subject of unqualified praise, and Queena Mario and Leon Rothier were commented on favorably. Mr. Hodgson praised the conducting of Louis Hasselmans particularly.

EVSEI BELOUSSOFF

Russian Cellist Who Will Next Season Appear in Solo and Joint Recitals in a Tour Under the Direction of Daniel Mayer.

Peroni to Conduct Rome Band

Carlo Peroni, former conductor of the San Carlo Opera Company, has just returned from a tour which consisted of one hundred and twenty-five appearances with Geraldine Farrar's Carmen Company. Mr. Peroni has been called to Rome to succeed Maestro Vessella as conductor of the famous Rome Band and will also be superintendent of municipal music in Rome. In addition, he has been scheduled for two concerts at the Augusteum.

Music of the Movies

Zuni Indian music is being featured at New York's Capitol Theatre this week in connection with the repetition of the feature picture, Romola. Enid Watkins, soprano, is singing, and the Capitol Ballet Corps dances in an appropriate setting. The orchestra under David Mendoza is playing Gomez' Overture, Il Guarany. Maria Yurieva and Vaselaff Svoboda, Russian dancers, are appearing also.

Virzi Violin Wins Medal

The gold medal for musical instruments of the bow and string type awarded at the industrial exposition being held in Rome has been bestowed on J. & J. Virzi of New York. The prize winning instrument is a violin equipped with the Virzi tone producer.

Bartok to Come to America

Bela Bartok, Hungarian composer, will make his first American visit next season, according to an announcement of Concert Management Arthur Judson, who will direct his activities here.

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
GLORIA SWANSON in
'Madame Sans Gene'
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
BEBE DANIELS
in
"THE CROWDED HOUR"
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street
Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
MARION DAVIES
in
"ZANDER THE GREAT"
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps

Lines o' News AND Chatter

Will Rogers, stage humorist and writer, is being booked by Charles L. Wagner in a series of joint appearances with the de Reszke Singers, it is said.

He is not going to sing or play the piano or even an accordion. He'll simply talk. The quartet will supply the music.

* * *

Says H. I. Phillips, in his Sun Dial column in the New York Sun: "Being a Premier of France is like being a pitcher for the Philadelphia Athletics. It is even worse. It is like being a Central Park band leader under a Hylan administration."

* * *

But all that will not disturb Frances Nash, who is to sail soon for Europe . . . for a rest and to play, quite possibly, a pianoforte recital in Paris.

* * *

America's summer operas are now getting ready to don their feathers, with which, be it noted, there will be little fuss.

* * *

Looks as though W. A. Clark, Jr., the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra's founder and president, had become a commuter between his home town and New York. He ran down to our town a few days ago, and departed last Friday.

* * *

Incidentally, he will be missing this summer the manager of his orchestra, Mrs. Caroline E. Smith, who is to spend three months in Europe.

* * *

Gathering the well known shekels—in Atlanta, Cleveland, and Rochester—is now going on by the Metropolitan Opera Company. It costs about a dollar and eight cents for every turn of a railroad wheel.

* * *

Happy days for conductors, who appear to be conducting all over the place.

* * *

Famous phonograph duettists, and story-tellers too, are Mario Chamlee and John Charles Thomas. A stitch in the side comes to nearly everyone who listens to their inimitable tales.

* * *

Opera in German is verboten in Prague, so when Mary Cavanova sings Octavia in Rosenkavalier there, the performance will be sung in English . . . fancy that!

* * *

Guy Maier, the pianist, and Dan Mayer, his manager, are the betes noires of proof-readers . . . apologies to Guy for surnaming him Mayer last week.

* * *

Over the luncheon table at the Blue Ribbon Thursday, Andreas Dippel explained how he will make a phonofilm of the Ride of the Valkyries . . . full orchestra, real horses scampering over real clouds, and everything.

* * *

Harry Becker, whose talents are divided between writing and music, is combining them in his latest position. He has been taking over the work of Theodore Stearns as music reviewer of the New York Morninfi Telegraph for the rest of this season. Mr. Stearns is abroad, finishing an opera that he has been composing.

* * *

There was plenty of material for the traditional ship's concert on the S. S. Reliance when it sailed from New York last Tuesday. To sing there were Nanny Larsen-Todsen, Maria Mueller, and Lucille Chalfont; to play the violin there were Carl Flesch and his youthful protege, Isaac Briselli; August Berger was on hand to direct whatever ballet activities might be planned, and Samuel Thewman of the Metropolitan was available for advice as to staging. Conductors?—Artur Bodanzky and Herman Hans Wechsler were among those present.

* * *

Thirteen and one-half hours represented the time spent in New York by Sir Hugh Allen, head of the London College of Music, on his recent visit to this side of the Atlantic. Canada profited most through the presence of the English musician; but when next Sir Hugh crosses the ocean he will linger longer in our midst.

* * *

What musical dinner would be complete without Dr. Rubin Goldmark as a speaker? So thought Dr. Eugene A. Noble, presiding at the Juilliard affair given in New York's University club last Friday evening in honor of Sir Hugh Allen. Whereupon Bre'r Goldmark told several of his very best stories, in addition to commenting pertinently on this and that.

* * *

Atlantans were sorely disappointed that Rosa Ponselle, whom they greatly admire, was indisposed for the performances of Gioconda and Juive, in which operas she was scheduled to appear with the Metropolitan. But Rosa recovered in time to sing Santuzza in Cavalleria, at the closing performance.

* * *

Presently the Cincinnati Music Festival, with no end of big singing guns and a distinctive program . . . also Lawrence Maxwell in his element.

* * *

Since The Musical Digest circulation department has no mind-reader in its personnel it will facilitate the delivery of this publication to "movable" subscribers if they will send notification of their summer addresses.

* * *

There is talk of a Hollywood Bowl June concert, with Frieda Hempel as the featured attraction.

* * *

"Anyhow," said a friend to John Barclay, the baritone, "you've got a good start on your journey to heaven." Which wasn't so bad, considering that John is six feet five, or thereabouts.

* * *

By the same token, Felix Salmond should also be congratulated.

* * *

And Dick Hageman, too, whose legs reach well under the longest grand piano in captivity.

* * *

Then there are Feodor Chaliapin, Albert Coates, Clarence Whitehill, Paul Bender, Edmund Burke, Franklin Robinson, and—no doubt—certain others whose names we cannot recall at this particular moment.

* * *

Meanwhile, The Musical Digest Year Book is being prepared. Those who should be in it please communicate with the editors. Those who want much invaluable and interesting music information would better request the reservation of a copy. Out early next September—something new which no musical person will want to be without.

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

Calls for Concert Reform
See Page 16

VOL. VII. NO. 29 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

Mme. Claudia Muzio, after completing her season with the Chicago Civic Opera Company, left for Europe, where she is making operatic appearances in leading soprano roles. She was applauded recently in the title part of Aida at the Paris Opera. From Europe she will go to Buenos Aires to sing at the Colon Theatre, and she will be heard in the fall in opera in San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Bulletins of News

Alfredo Casella, Italian pianist and composer, will conduct the State Symphony Orchestra for the second half of next season, sharing the season with Ernst von Dohnanyi, according to an announcement by Jacob Altschuler, manager of the orchestra. Mr. Casella will conduct instead of Eugene Goossens, who was first announced as Mr. Dohnanyi's colleague.

Having the day previously ended his first season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky sailed for Europe from New York on the S. S. Majestic on Saturday afternoon. Mrs. Koussevitzky sailed with him.

Leaving this country on the same ship were Myra Hess and Josef Hofmann, pianists. Other musicians who have recently sailed for Europe are Mary Mellish, soprano, and Mieczyslaw Munz, pianist.

Rochester, N. Y., May 2.—The first program of manuscript works for orchestra by American composers was presented yesterday morning under the auspices of the Eastman School of music in the Eastman Theatre here. Seven composers were present to hear the performances of their music, selected from over fifty submitted manuscripts, by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra under the leadership of Howard Hanson, director of the school.

The program consisted of Aaron Copland's Cortege Macabre; Donald Tweedy's symphonic study, L'Allegro; Adolph Weiss' tone poem, I Segreti; Mark Silver's symphonic poem, Peace and War; Bernard Rogers' Soliloquy for flute and string orchestra; William Quincy Porter's Ukrainian Suite, and George F. McKay's Symphony, From the Black Hills.

A digest of the reviews of this concert in the Rochester and New York papers will be published in the next issue of The Musical Digest.

No important new developments have taken place in the matter of the Central Park Mall concerts. Mayor Hylan has kept silent, and the Citizens' Committee for Free Music in the Parks has continued to gather signatures on its petition to have the Goldman Band Concerts restored in their full schedule this summer.

Mrs. Bella Zilberman, president of the committee, staged a demonstration in front of City Hall on Saturday. With the aid of members of the committee she released hundreds of colored toy baloons within sight of the Mayor's window to each of which was attached a small petition. Police dispersed the demonstrators and the crowd which gathered.

Metropolitan Opera House Unfortunately Victimized

CONSIDERABLE discussion is going on concerning the character of the speeches made in the Metropolitan Opera House last Friday afternoon, during a meeting held under the auspices of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, Locals 2 and 9, and how it was made possible in this classic institution.

The entire affair was declared in the daily newspapers as a demonstration of the "red" order; and first page prominence was given to the occurrence, including the action of Nahan Franko in refusing to lead his orchestra in the "Internationale" song until he had first played the Star Spangled Banner. It was not long thereafter that Franko departed the Metropolitan.

The Metropolitan management appears to have been victimized in permitting the auditorium to be used for the purpose it was. The arrangements were made by Sol Hurok, the music manager, who informed the Metropolitan that the affair was to be a concert, and gave up one of his unused dates from the several he had contracted for with the Metropolitan.

The Metropolitan management feels it strange if Hurok did not know precisely what the nature of the meeting was to be. Hurok declares himself indignant at being imposed upon by the offending locals, and insists he had no thought the affair would be other than the concert he was told was planned.

It is safe to say that some pretty thorough lessons have been learned all around.

Metropolitan Opera Opens in Cleveland

Cleveland, May 2.—A performance of Meyerbeer's L'Africana opened the local season of ten appearances of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company last Monday evening.

Twice during the evening the applause literally stopped the show, and at the conclusion of the opera, the enthusiasm was even greater, although there were vacant seats in the auditorium. The principals were compelled to take numerous curtain calls. In the cast were Mme. Ponselle, quite recovered from her illness, and Mmes. Mario and Wakefield, and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Danise, Didur and Rothier. Tullio Serafin conducted.

On Tuesday evening Louis Hasselmans conducted Faust, with Frances Alda and Feodor Chaliapin, and Messrs. de Luca and Tokatyan. The performance called forth similar praise from the reviewers as had the previous night's opera. Rosa Ponselle sang again Wednesday in Trovatore, together with Jeanne Gordon, Giovanni Martinelli, and Giuseppe Danise, and strengthened the favorable impression she made in L'Africana. Gennaro Papi conducted. The Thursday performance of Falstaff had in the cast Mmes. Bori and Mario and Messrs. Scotti and Tibbett. Mr. Serafin conducted.

National Music Week Is Observed from the Atlantic to the Pacific

1,000 Communities Taking Part in Activities Which Began Last Sunday.

SHOW INTEREST ABROAD

National Music Week, which began last Sunday and will continue through the coming Saturday is being observed not only in many cities and States throughout the United States, but in the various Territorial dependencies also.

Communities in Alaska, the Virgin, Philippine, and Hawaiian Islands, the Canal Zone, and Porto Rico are celebrating the week, and the National Music Week Committee has received inquiries from England, Japan, and Canada, many communities of which are already actually observing the occasion, or are intending to organize for the 1926 observance.

Indications are that the present observance of the week will eclipse that of last May. In 1924 there were 452 community-wide and 328 partial celebrations that were recorded by the committee. On April 24 of this year the number of cities which had notified the committee that they would participate in National Music Week was already 455, with more to come. It is expected that the number in all may approach 1,000.

A full program for the week of concerts of choruses, orchestras, and bands, with many prize contests for professional and amateur musicians, was begun on Sunday. The music clubs of the various cities have cooperated in the preparation with the National Music Committee, of which Otto H. Kahn is the head. President Coolidge is the chairman of the honorary committee. The National Bureau for the Advancement of Music, of which C. M. Tremaine is director, has also aided in organizing the week's activities.

New York's sixth annual observance of the week is typical of that of the larger cities. Mayor Hylan announced the official observance of the occasion in a proclamation.

Churches had special music services on Sunday morning with the co-operation of their choirs, and in the afternoon 15,000 persons joined in a community sing in Central Park.

More than 10,000 children have been taking part in preliminary music competitions in the five boroughs of New York, and the competitions will reach their final stages this week. The finals in the contests are being held each afternoon of the week except today in Town Hall, with well-known musicians as judges.

At the Wanamaker Auditorium an organ festival is being held consisting of daily concerts with various programs. The finals of the school chorus contests will be held in Carnegie Hall Friday evening, and a demonstration program is being held there Thursday with famous artists as judges in which the progress of the children of the city in the appreciation and knowledge of serious music will be shown. Many other music events are scheduled.

Vocalists Head Boston Music

Coates, McCormack, Bonci, and Mme. Sylva Give Song Recitals; Instrumental and Ensemble Concerts.

Boston, April 29.—Vocalists were in the majority among the recitalists here last week. John Coates, English tenor, made his Boston debut Sunday and John McCormack was heard in recital the same day. Other singers were Alessandro Bonci, tenor, Ester Ferrabini, soprano, Lillian Prudden, soprano, Marguerite Sylva, mezzo-soprano, and Mario Cappelli, tenor.

Other musical attractions were the presentation of Haensel und Gretel by the New England Conservatory of Music, a concert by the Fox-Burgin-Bedetti Trio, the Flute Players' Club twenty-sixth concert, and the first appearance here of "Roxy's Gang."

Mr. Coates sang a program of Shakespeare songs in both an early and a modern settings in most cases. Stuart Mason (Christian Science Monitor) thought his singing "wholly delightful" and was delighted to hear English sung "so musically and clearly." In his opinion, Mr. Coates proved not only an excellent singer, but an entertaining lecturer.

The Herald writer asserted that he "showed himself a singer of extremely fine direction, of a strongly developed power of differentiation of mood, of nice feeling for the melodic line." He uses his voice, according to the Transcript, "discerningly, pliantly, surely" and "sustains the melodic line, curving into it the coalescing phrases." This chronicler noted the marks of service on his voice, but added that "it ranges widely and freely." In the opinion of the writer in the Globe, Mr. Coates' excellent diction, his "thorough yet never pedantic musicianship, and his agreeable voice enabled him to convey to his hearers his spirited, imaginative interpretations of text and music unhampered by limitations of technique and of vocal means." This reviewer did not think the tenor's voice at its best, although it did not lack in power and resonance.

* * *

In his recital Sunday, John McCormack again showed himself "the supreme artist," wrote Mr. Mason. According to the Globe, "as always his every word stood out clearly, though nothing of tonal quality or beauty of phrasing was sacrificed." Other reviewers wrote in similar vein. He was assisted by Lauri Kennedy, cellist, John P. Marshall, organist, and Edwin Schneider, pianist, who also received commendatory notices.

* * *

A benefit concert for the Italian war wounded was given Sunday evening by Alessandro Bonci and Ester Ferrabini. Arthur Fiedler accompanied. The Monitor reported that Mr. Bonci's voice "is still a thing of sheer beauty" commenting particularly on his "superb ease of production" and the "loveliness of quality, rich, velvety, and lustrous." According to the Transcript writer, he sang "with a zeal and a fervor" and again proved himself "inimitably skillful at his trade." His "radiant personality" and histrionic skill as an interpreter were commended by this writer who, however, admitted that his voice "is no longer firm, not yet liquid." To quote the Herald, "his strength lay in his suavity of intonation, in his instinct for the stage, his dramatic bravura, his personal magnetism."

Miss Ferrabini, continued this writer, sang modern Italian songs "very beautifully, with exquisite nuance, the strange and piercing melancholy, that invades them. Hers is a rare charm and feeling for mood and drama." The Transcript reported that "her upper register is so much gold, her modulation quite flawless." According to the Monitor, she sang "with fine intensity, seeking, in the newer way, to heighten and clarify the composer's intention."

* * *

Assisted by William D. Strong, pianist, Lillian Prudden, soprano, was heard in recital at Jordan Hall Saturday afternoon. Evelyn Gerstein of the Herald wrote that she has "a large and robust voice, one that is not incapable of a sensuous warmth, yet such warmth is so infrequent and fragmentary that her singing yesterday was too often dull and labored, even insecure."

The Monitor chronicler wrote that Miss Prudden's voice "has a resilient fluency which transforms a delicate softness into exquisite subtleties" and that she is blessed with "clear enunciation and, best of all, a keen musical intelligence." He remarked on the lack of evenness of texture of her singing. The writer in the Transcript thought "Miss Prudden's voice at its best shows bell-like clarity, ringing resonance."

The "artistic and sympathetic" accompaniments of Mr. Strong, as well as the "understanding and full mastery" of his solos received this reviewer's praise. In the Monitor he was commended for his spontaneity and the beauty of his style.

* * *

Marguerita Sylva and Mario Cappelli gave a joint recital in Jordan Hall Friday evening. Mr. Mason commented that Mme. Sylva "deftly characterizes her songs" and, without profuse gesture, succeeds "in introducing a considerable degree of dramatic action into her interpretations." He admired the way she exercised her art with "such conspicuous restraint and good taste." Mr. Cappelli, wrote this reviewer, "sings with fervors."

* * *

Present and former students of the New England Conservatory of Music took part in the production of Haensel und Gretel at the Boston Opera House Saturday for the scholarship fund of the Conservatory. Wallace Goodrich conducted. Maria Claessens of the Chicago Civic Opera Company was the only outsider in the cast. Others were Charles Pearson, Marion Davison Duffle, Jeska Fisher Butler, Hazel Dunlap, and Pauline Clauss.

To quote the Monitor, "Mr. Goodrich's conducting was fully up to his own high standard and the leading roles were sung with the finish associated with the work of these artists." The Herald writer observed that "taste and intelligence, plus enthusiasm, made the whole performance one to give delight." Other writers agreed in commending the work.

* * *

The concert of chamber music given at Steinert hall Friday evening by the Fox-Burgin-Bedetti Trio showed again "a fine musicianship, of the individual and of the ensemble, a sensitiveness and zest that are rare in the performance of chamber music." (Evelyn Gerstein.)

* * *

The assisting artists at the Flute Players' Club concert Sunday were Josephine Durrell and Beatrice Griffin, violinists; Anna Golden, Charles Denoe Leedy and Reginald Boardman, pianists; Joseph Lauther, tenor; Laurence Turno, flutist; Emil Acieri, clarinetist; and Raymond Allard, bassoonist.

* * *

"Roxy's Gang" made their first Boston appearance in Symphony Hall Tuesday evening and were heartily applauded by a large and enthusiastic audience. S. L. Rothafel, better known to radio audiences as Roxy, "is an admirable showman" and versed in the felicities of casual good fellowships." The Gang included Betsy Ayres, Gladys Rice, Caroline Andrews, Marjorie Harcum, Ava Bombarger, Joseph Wetzel, Sheddon Weir, Peter Harrower, William Robyn, William Axt, Maria Gambarelli, Julia Glass, Margaret McKee, Frank Moulan, Douglas Stanbury, James Parker Coombs, Yasha Bunchuk, and Dr. Omandy Blau.

METROPOLITAN OPERA ON TOUR

In the Auditorium—Cleveland, Ohio

TONIGHT

Aida—with Mmes. Rethberg and Claussens; and Messrs. Martinelli, Danise, and Mardones; Mr. Serafin conducting.

The Eastman Theatre—Rochester, N.Y.

WEDNESDAY

Falstaff—with Mmes. Bori, Mario, Telva, and Howard; and Messrs. Tokatyan, Scotti, Tibbett, and Didur; Mr. Serafin conducting.

THURSDAY

Boris Godunoff—with Mmes. Gordon, Dalossy, and Hunter; and Messrs. Errolle, Chaliapin, and Mardones; Mr. Papi conducting.

Boston Symphony Men Retire

Boston, April 29.—Rumors that new contracts had been refused to twelve of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the result of a demand for a "shake-up" by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, were denied here yesterday by Judge Frederick Cabot, trustee of the orchestra.

"Some players will not be with the orchestra next season," said Judge Cabot, "but this is a normal situation and occurs annually. Rumors of trouble are without foundation."

It had been reported that contracts had been refused to certain players because of personal dissension with Mr. Koussevitzky. However, it has been learned that those who will leave the orchestra are doing so voluntarily. Among those who will not play here next season are Georges Longy, who announced some time ago his intention to return to France, Clement Lenom, and Alwyn Schroeder, cellist.

Sargent Is Honored by Boston Symphony

Audiences Stand as Koussevitzky Leads Funeral Music for Dead Painter.

Boston, April 30.—As a memorial tribute to the late John Singer Sargent, the audience at last week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stood while Serge Koussevitzky conducted Siegfried's Funeral March from Goetterdaemmerung.

Prokofieff's Violin Concerto was played for the first time in America by Richard Burgin. Schubert's Fifth Symphony, Loeffler's tone poem, La Bonne Chanson, and Wagner's Tannhaeuser Overture completed the program. The Concerto, according to Stuart Mason of the Christian Science Monitor, was played "with a remarkable sureness" and Mr. Burgin "deserves every praise for the outstanding excellence of his achievement."

Warren Storey Smith wrote in the Post that the soloist played in "a masterly fashion" and the Globe reviewer thought that he performed the difficult work "with a skill that was wholly admirable." Philip Hale in the Herald commented that Mr. Burgin played "superbly" while H. T. Parker (Transcript) asserted that he excelled himself.

This writer admired the Concerto as "revitalizing a withered form, pursuing, and sometimes capturing, a fitful, evasive beauty." According to Mr. Mason, "it must be admitted that it is exceedingly clear in conception and execution and suffers not at all from that vague and experimental, even fragmentary style to be found in many a modern work." Mr. Hale commented that "it abounds in ideas, in turn beautiful and joyously humorous." A "clever youthful work" was the Globe chronictler's opinion of the Concerto, and Mr. Smith considered it a "striking and individual achievement . . . singularly free from that harmonic audacity which we now association with Prokofieff."

* * *

The final concert of its supplementary series was given by the Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, in Symphony Hall Sunday night with Mieczyslaw Munz, pianist, as soloist in Franck's Symphonic Variations. The rest of the program consisted of the Vivaldi-Siloti Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

Mr. Munz' performance of the Variations "was delightful and wholly in keeping with the music," wrote the Globe reviewer, and the writer in the Transcript liked his "ingratiating" touch and an "ear for delicacy."

ROSA PONSELLE

Exclusive Management
NATIONAL CONCERTS, INC.
1451 Broadway—New York City

Victor Records Knabe Piano

MARION TELVA

Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company

Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

JOHN DOANE

Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

MARIO CHAMLEE

TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

Request Program Ends Fritz Reiner's Season

Pacific 231 Among Compositions Chosen; Felix Salmond Scores With Orchestra.

Cincinnati, April 28.—Prolonged applause greeted Fritz Reiner and the orchestra at the final pair of symphony concerts last week. On these occasions no soloist was presented to the subscribers. The previous pair of concerts were marked by the appearance of Felix Salmond as soloist in Dvorak's B minor Violoncello Concerto and by the American premiere of a Concerto for quintet of wind instruments and orchestra by Vittorio Rieti.

At the concluding concerts last week, the program was made up of the following request numbers: Dvorak's New World Symphony, Honegger's Pacific 231, Strauss' Don Juan, and Wagner's Dance of the Apprentices from Meistersinger. The Dvorak and Strauss works divided honors in critical reviews, and the chroniclers, after praising the work of the organization, expressed regret at the seson's termination.

Like enthusiasm was manifested by the reviewers over the preceding pair of concerts.

According to Samuel T. Wilson of the Commercial Tribune, as far as the soloist was concerned it was the outstanding concert of the season. Mrs. N. P. Smith of the Times Star commented that "command of phraseology," and "interpretation as well as the "tear" tone were all displayed by "this fine artist." In the Enquirer, W. S. Goldenburg asserted that Mr. Salmond played the Concerto "with authority, his full, luscious tone possessing that fine, soulful quality that is so characteristic of the cello when it is perfectly played." He considered Mr. Salmond a "consummate artist." Mrs. Plogstedt commended his tone of "luscious quality."

Mr. Wilson thought the Rieti work, although not of especial depth, "was worked out in inimitable fashion" and was pleased with its "unexpectedness." In Mrs. Plogstedt's opinion, the new work proved "easier to analyze than most of the modern fare."

* * *

The Orpheus Club, "that excellent singing organization of male voices" (Mrs. Plogstedt), completed a successful season Thursday evening with a program of old English numbers and several American compositions under the direction of Prower Symons. Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, was the soloist and was enthusiastically received.

* * *

Charles Pearson, the new business manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, has undertaken his work of mobilizing forces for a successful season next year.

Gonda Engages Artists

Next season Cleveland will hear the following artists under the management of Frederick Gonda: Maria Jeritza, Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch (joint recital), and Elsa Alsen and Rudolph Laubenthal in a Wagner concert.

SANDOR HARMATI

SANDOR HARMATI, whose string quartet was awarded the prize offered by the Philadelphia Chamber Music Association a few months ago, and whose symphony was given the Pulitzer prize last season, has been engaged as conductor of the Omaha Symphony Orchestra of seventy players. Mr. Harmati will conduct during a twenty-four weeks' season.

Mr. Harmati is a graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Budapest. He had his early orchestral training under such men as Strauss and Weingartner and has had considerable experience in both this country and Europe. Mr. Harmati is an American citizen and has been in this country since 1914. Besides having conducted the Women's Orchestra Club, the American Orchestra Society, the Charleston Symphony Orchestra and the Morristown Symphony Society, he has been active in chamber music circles, where he first came into prominence with the Letz Quartet. He has been for the past three seasons first violin of the Lenox String Quartet.

National Music League Conference

Under the auspices of the Organization Committee of the National Music League, a conference and tea were held on the afternoon of April 27 in the Park Avenue Baptist Church, New York. Short speeches on the scope of the League were made by Mrs. Harold V. Milligan, chairman of the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs; Rubin Goldmark, representing teachers of music; Florence MacMillan, president of the Parnassus Club, on the matter of housing students; Edward Johnson, representing artists; Christabel Hamilton, of the Studio Club, from the angle of students; Mrs. John Henry Hammond, president of the Three Arts Club, from the point of view of patronesses; Salvatore de Stefano, from the general point of view of music, and John Powell, discussing from the composers' angle. A speech of Arthur Judson, representative of a managerial point of view, was read, in the absence of Mr. Judson, by Mr. Gilpin.

Stokowski Leads Familiar Programs

Mendelssohn Club Gives Second Concert; Salzedo and Britt in Joint Philadelphia Appearance.

Philadelphia, April 30.—Three numbers, as popular as they are familiar here, made up last week's symphony program. To the obvious delight of the audience, Leopold Stokowski conducted Bizet's second L'Arlesienne Suite, Debussy's L'Apres-midi d'un Faune, and Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony. The performance of the last two received particular praise from the reviewers. The third all-Wagner program of the season was played at the preceding pair of concerts. According to Linton Martin of the North American, "it was a real Wagner program, played so superbly as to leave the listener fairly stunned by the ecstatic impact."

The music played included Ein Feste Burg Ist Unser Gott, the Faust Overture, Overture and Venusberg Music from Tannhaeuser, the Vorspiel and Third Act Prelude to Die Meistersinger, and, from Tristan und Isolde, the Preludes to the first and third acts and the Liebestod. The Record reported that it was "a glorious combination and magnificently played." Sidney L. Laciar of the Public Ledger wrote in the same vein, but Stanley Muschamp (Inquirer) found a "certain sense of sameness" in the concert, although the playing was "at all times of remarkable beauty."

During the intermission, Miss Frances A. Wister, in behalf of the Women's Board of the Academy of Music, presented to the Academy a Memorial Tablet to the founders and architects of the building. The gift was accepted for the Philadelphia Orchestra Association by William Jay Turner.

The final concerts of the children's series took place last Wednesday and Thursday afternoons. The program culminated in the singing of Dixie by the entire audience, after which Mr. Stokowski invited the children to yell as loudly as they could. They did.

* * *

At the second subscription concert Wednesday evening of the Mendelssohn Club's fiftieth season, N. Lindsay Norden conductor, the assisting artists were Fred Patton, baritone; Anton Horner, horn; Joseph Horner, horn, and Vincent Fanelli, harp.

The Record reported that Mr. Patton's "remarkably sonorous voice swept the audience with enthusiasm. . . . Patton is one of the most interesting singers before the public, with a real gift for dramatic work and a musicianly feeling that never degenerates into anything less than the best standards." Mr. Laciar commented that he received an ovation for his singing of a Mendelssohn aria, "not only for vocal skill but even more for the spirit with which it was sung. . . . Mr. Patton showed a real bass-baritone voice, sonorous in the lower register and brilliant in the upper, the whole covering a range of nearly three octaves."

According to the Bulletin, the chorus, under Mr. Norden, "once more displayed its rare beauty of quality and notable blending and balance of tone." Mr. Laciar thought its greatest virtue lies in "the perfection of ensemble and in the unanimity with which the details of choral work were performed." Other reviewers joined in commendation of the soloists, the chorus, and the director.

* * *

The third and final concert of the series by members of the faculty of the Curtis Institute of Music was given last Thursday in the Foyer of the Academy of Music by Carlos Salzedo and Horace Britt.

Mr. Salzedo, head of the harp department, got some "very remarkable and beautiful effects" from his instrument, wrote Mr. Laciar. Stanley Muschamp wrote that he displayed "great variety of tone coloring when one takes into consideration the limits of his instrument" and commended both his sense of rhythm and appreciation for the music. Under Mr. Salzedo's hands, to quote the Record, the harp became an instrument "unlimited in tonal possibilities, fascinating in manipulation and flooded with such a variety of effects that every instrumentalist can learn new possibilities from hearing the harp played by this musical wizard."

This writer thought Mr. Britt's playing showed "polished style" and "was sufficiently versatile to create continuous demands for encores." The tonal effects of the violoncellist, he qualified, were rather limited. Mr. Laciar said he played the Lalo Concerto "with technical ease and good interpretative powers and tone." According to Mr. Muschamp, he plays "with facility and warmth of tone, and was particularly successful in the beautiful quotations from the writings of Schumann."

GIGLI

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones
Aeolian-Vocalion Records
Aeolian Hall, New York

ALBERTO BIMBONI
VOCAL STUDIO
2025 Broadway
New York City
Telephone
Endicott 6074

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO
BRUNSWICK RECORDS

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

GEORGE E. SHEA
Member American Academy of
Teachers of Singing
Also Opera Stage Routine
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, MAY 5, 1925. VOL. VII, NO. 29

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.; Canada, $6.00; Foreign Countries, $7.00

Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

Ambition and Opera

Tonight will bring to a close the current engagement in Cleveland of the Metropolitan Opera Company. There will have been nine performances of opera and one concert. In point of magnitude this undertaking is impressive, for apart from the works presented the financial cost has been huge.

A year ago Cleveland was host to the Metropolitan for one full week; the enterprise enlisted the co-operation as guarantors of many public spirited citizens, and the deficit was so small as to be of no particular moment.

This spring the engagement was extended by nearly one third, and there was just one guarantor.

For one reason or another the public support was not sufficient to approach closely the expense involved, and as a consequence there will be a considerable monetary deficit. While this is entirely a personal affair between the gentleman who will write his cheque and the Metropolitan Opera management it is a matter to be regretted.

Deficits of any inconsiderable amount in opera projects are generally injurious to their progress. There are exceptions, of course, and it is to be hoped that this instance is to be one of them. But there is a lesson to be learned from the experience of this specific opera engagement. Ambition should be attended by conservative procedure. It might have been better to have made this second Cleveland opera season of the Metropolitan company of similiar proportions to the one preceding.

Women and Orchestras

Women have done so much for the progress of the world that their enlarging activities in the more important aspects of the music arts are to be admired.

They have been music pioneers in this country, helping to point the way and encouraging the men to investigate a field theretofore foreign to them. Their enthusiasm and unflagging energy have been factors in helping music carry on.

Only recently there was formed by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra a women's auxiliary committee of one hundred; and very promptly did this committee secure pledges of a considerable sum of money. Other orchestras have such aides, who labor intelligently and to fine ends.

There is now before Conductor Rudolph Ganz, of the St. Louis Symphony, the matter of engaging two violinistes . . . to serve as regular playing members. Some people will want to know: "Why women in the violin section? Why women in a symphony orchestra of superior character?"

Why not? Women harpists have been members of certain of our foremost symphonic organizations. The London Symphony Orchestra has long had stringed players of the fair sex.

The one point at issue, it would seem, is whether the candidates can perform their duties as competently as the men who play with them. If they can do so there would appear to be an end to the matter.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

IN the analysis of the nature of music, writers almost invariably refer to the three fundamental elements, melody, harmony, and rhythm. A fourth has gradually been added. Alfredo Casella wrote recently a study of the progress of music as illustrated by the development of the perfect cadence, and in preface to his work he mentions tone color, along with melody, harmony, and rhythm, as a basic constituent of music.

We of the present day are so accustomed to subtle and intricate instrumentation that we are apt to lose sight of the fact that its technique is not a spontaneous thing which a musician is likely to have as early as he has absolute pitch.

Sir Hubert Parry, in his Style and Musical Art (Macmillan), points out this fact, "To those who enjoy the fruits of two hundred years of patient artistic endeavor," he says, "the problems of orchestration seem sufficiently simple, but to those who were only just beginning to climb the hill, and had no maps to show them the impracticable places, it proved indeed a most arduous undertaking—how arduous is most effectually shown by the fact that two of the greatest geniuses who ever adorned the art, Handel and Bach, frequently made a failure of it."

Skill in orchestration is nowadays a common thing, even among composers of the second rank. The reason is that it is probably the most learnable of techniques, in the entire process of composition.

It follows that if the old masters were alive, now, and had Strauss, Berlioz, Wagner, Brahms, and Rimsky-Korsakoff behind them, they would dress their ideas much differently from what they actually did. It is not uncommon at present for other persons to do this re-dressing for them.

Schumann's symphonies have been re-orchestrated, and there are the familiar illustrations of this practice in Beethoven's symphonies, where not only are choirs enlarged beyond directions, but parts are transferred from one instrument to another, as from bassons to horns in the Ninth Symphony.

Nevertheless, conductors had better not advertise their improvements on the classics. One can imagine the effect of an advertisement in a Carnegie Hall program announcing that at its next concert the Philharmonic Society would play Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in a new orchestration by Maurice Ravel, with a special obbligato in the development of the last movement in which the themes of the symphony and of four of Beethoven's piano sonatas would be combined with a chorale by four tenor tubas on the theme of Dies Irae.

IN all arts not only do new manners of expression necessitate new materials, but the materials exert a reciprocal influence on expression. At first novel devices of instrumentation were used because composers wished to write different music from what had been heard before. The resulting variety of orchestration gave musicians then an increased variety of style and color.

Hence have come the greater fullness and breadth of modern orchestration, the wider and less periodic range of melody, and, to an extent, even the modern leaning for dissonant harmonies. The last mentioned result is not obvious, but it is unmistakable. If a composer is determined to use a full palette of colors and a great variety of instruments, he is forced, in giving all of them enough to do, to weave an intricate contrapuntal texture.

In such a polyphonic texture (one can point to Wagner and Strauss for illustration) composers must, if they are adventurous melodically, employ more and more passing dissonances. So the listener's ear becomes accustomed to cacophonous harmonies, and soon he can be counted on to take them in when they are static.

The development of passing dissonance is largely dependent too on variety of orchestra color. One could not write an interesting music of modern harmonic tinge for an orchestra of the general evenness of tone quality of that which Handel and Bach used. The result would be confusion. On the other hand almost any clashing interval will be accepted by the most conservative ear if it is scored between piccolo and viola, for example, or between oboe and tenor tuba.

FROM one point of view the most interesting happening at the Auer birthday concert was the playing of Josef Hofmann. Mr. Hofmann has been before the public now nearly forty years. His popular prestige as a pianist and musician is impregnable. It is natural that he should bend his immense abilities in any direction which he likes.

Mr. Hofmann is following—or more probably leading—the continual tendency of pianism towards the orchestral effect. The interesting part of his playing the other evening was that it quite represented the entire tendency in itself. He played three pieces, Chopin's F sharp minor Polonaise, Tschaikowsky's Berceuse, and the Liszt transcription of the Liebestod.

The virtues of the playing were familiar. Above all there was Mr. Hofmann's ingenious sense of the unity of the pieces he was playing. The interpretations did not consist of a series of moods more or less incidentally chained one to another, with arid spaces or arbitrary links between. On the contrary every part of the long Polonaise looked forward to what was coming, and developed naturally from what was past. Mr. Hofmann has an endlessly admirable way of moving with relentless vitality through a composition so that its interest never dies until the very end. His continual understanding of what is the correct stress of the music under his fingers, what are the points of climax and repose, and where the various strands of melos lie are what give his interpretations this unity.

There was more indication of what Mr. Hofmann's attitude towards the piano is than the mere fact that he played an orchestral transcription and gave it super-pianistic breadth. He showed at times a typical disdain for the limitations of his instrument and for traditional purisms of pianism. At the climax of the Liebestod his fortissimos disregarded the ordinary conservative tenets of tonal purity. A smashing bass or a shrill unmoderated treble were the result of his preoccupation with the orchestral spirit of Wagner's music.

The result is many things. One of them is that, although the clarity and surety of his finger technique sometimes suffer, Mr. Hofmann is one of the most admirable and interesting musicians in the world today. Another may be that your next door neighbor's daughter will try the same method after she has heard him, which will be bad.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

In a Lighter Moment

Mme. Olga Samaroff Chats of Concert-giving, Teaching, Tonsils, Surprise Parties and a Radio Proposal

by KAY KENNEDY

THE last few tones hung suspended in the air, trembled, and were gone. Olga Samaroff rose from the piano to greet the visitor.

"I have spent the day at the photographer's, and I feel that tea is an actual necessity right now," Mme. Samaroff explained as she rang for tea. "I don't know of any more exhausting pastime than that of being photographed. As well as I can remember it in my somewhat dazed condition just now, I had every conceivable pose taken—except, possibly, standing on my head, and I'm not quite sure about that!"

It was April, but the bleak, dreary day belied the calendar, and both the tea and the crackling blaze in the open fireplace were most welcome. Ruddy shadows from the fire were caught in the heavy silver tea service and danced fantastically on the book-lined walls. It was with a sense of delightful well-being that I gladly concurred wtih my hostess' suggestion—"let's not have an interview, it will be much pleasanter just to talk."

Enveloped in the warm glow, we were content to let the conversation drift lazily over the tea cups. Yet, in spite of the apparently aimless, chatty talk, I could see that Mme. Samaroff's reposeful manner and quiet, assured poise hid a tremendous energy and the capacity for a great variety of interests. With a deceptive facility, she spoke of music, of musicians, of books, of paintings—but the lightness of her tone did not disguise the authority evidenced in each discussion.

An interruption occurred as, preceded by gleeful laughter, young Miss Sonia Stokowski made her entrance astride the willing and patient back of Fraulein. In her blue quilted satin dressing gown and slippers, she trotted up to her mother to kiss her good-night and was introduced. After some hesitation, she made a curtsey and then fled to protection of her mother's skirt. As she obediently followed Fraulein out, her eyes lingered on me suspiciously.

"You really mustn't mind," smiled her mother, "It's just that she's afraid you're going to vaccinate her! She was recently vaccinated and ever since has been extremely suspicious of the intentions of any one who is strange to her.

"Not long ago, Dr. Noble, of the Juilliard Foundation, was here and when Sonia heard him called 'Doctor' she was terrified and refused even to come into the room. Again a vaccination panic! Tomorrow she is going to a party with Gloria Caruso, Cobina Wright, and Walter Damrosch's enchanting little granddaughter, Margot Finletter. It will be great fun, ending with a magnificent repast of cream of wheat and apple sauce. I wouldn't miss it for anything!"

Photo by Kubey-Rembrandt

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF

Mme. Samaroff went on to speak of the Juilliard Foundation and her work there.

"This is my first year of teaching, you know, and I am surprised how well I like it. Boring? Oh, nothing of the sort! I have found it very stimulating and most interesting. It is a constant joy and surprise to explore the minds of students—to learn of their hopes and ambitions, and to be able to draw from my greater store of experience to advise and counsel them.

"In an artist's life, each year brings some new phase of development. With growth there is a constant accumulation of new ideas, new ideals, new truths, and a proportionate shaking off of discarded ones. One's horizon always recedes, and new and unsuspected vistas of knowledge and accomplishment are opened before one. This year has been very wonderful for me—I have seemed to feel this particularly. It has been sort of a rebirth."

She hesitated a moment and then smiled.

"I hate to seem sordid, but I had my tonsils out last summer, and that may have had something to do with it! However, regardless of the cause, it has been quite a red letter year. I have gained so much in confidence when I am to give a recital, that my comparative lack of nervousness really surprises me at times.

"It is self-evident, of course, that, as one gains in mastery, one's nervousness gradually diminishes. But even now—even with this new and wonderful confidence—I still am nervous to some extent before a concert. If there is an interruption during the concert, or some unexpected noise, it throws me entirely off, and I have to finish my recital mechanically.

"At one concert that I gave in Texas recently, a baby started to cry in one of the quietest passages of the work I was playing. My first instinct was to stop (but I do so dislike 'temperamental' artists!) so I continued—and so did the baby! At the conclusion of the number I asked the manager if something couldn't be done about it and she told me that the mother of the child had driven over thirty miles in a Ford to come to the recital and had had no one with whom to leave the baby, so we couldn't ask them to leave, could we? I just gritted my teeth and finished the recital. But it was such a perverse child!

"What do I think of the radio? I don't think. The effect of the radio on concerts and the effect of concerts on radio, have become so utterly confused in my mind, that all I can do is to fulfill my present contract which forbids my broadcasting. Even so, some amusing things have happened to me in connection with the radio—nothing less than a proposal of marriage in one instance!

"I spoke at Miss Anne Morgan's request for the American Woman's Association recently, from Richmond Hill, L. I. Doubtless Miss Marie Dressler's extremely witty introductions aroused the sense of humor of a gentleman in a remote part of this continent, who sent me a long telegram, assuring me that hearing my voice had convinced him I was the woman he had long been looking for. He, therefore, offered me his hand and heart, and would I please let him know my age and weight and whether I would consider a joining of our lives. I could not resist writing back that I was ninety-nine, weighed 300 pounds, and was taking the next train. I seem to have had the last word!

"Of course, I realize that I should be filling these moments and your pages with serious utterances of an instructive nature, but somehow I cannot seem to summon that mood today, perhaps because I have been so seriously concentrating all winter. You have struck me at a lighter moment. I rather think many of my colleagues are like me in this; that when the serious responsibilities of a strenuous season lift, we are apt to get a mood of irresponsible gaiety. It may not last long, but if I could tell you the details of a surprise party we are planning for the near future, I think you would agree with me that the artists whose names adorn the most serious concert programs of the winter season, are not much better than a lot of children when they arrive at the moment of vacation's beginning. I think a part of every human being never quite grows up, and that part is, perhaps, larger in artists than in others. However, I cannot give you the details of the surprise party, for then it would not be a surprise, and it is going to happen just about the time you publish this interview."

MAY KORB
Lyric Coloratura Soprano
Exclusive Management
R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

RUTH
BRETON
VIOLINIST
"A welcome apparition on the concert stage."
(Lawrence Gilman, N. Y. Herald-Tribune)
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York
Packard Building, Philadelphia

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St., New York City Telephone Circle 8815

RUDOLF LAUBENTHAL
TENOR, METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

THE INIMITABLE

JOHN COATES

ENCHANTS LARGE AUDIENCE

TOWN HALL, APRIL 23rd

THE SUN, FRIDAY, APRIL 24, 1925.

British Tenor Delights in Songs

John Coates Soars Into His Upper Scale With Ease and Is Master of Style.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

John Coates, tenor, who revealed himself in a song recital last evening in the Town Hall, has been called "Britain's greatest singer," "the very voice of Britain" and "Albion's ambassador" abroad. He began life as a comic opera tenor, but in 1901 appeared at Covent Garden in serious opera. He went to the Continent and achieved brilliant success at Cologne as Lohengrin, Romeo and Faust, and thence to the famous old Leipsic Gewandhaus and even to Mr. Mengelberg's Concertgebow in Amsterdam.

Why he did not sooner arrive in this country will probably remain a mystery, for no matter how popular an artist is in Europe there is a lustrous lure in the land of the dollar. Mr. Coates introduced himself thus belated with a novel and interesting program. It consisted entirely of songs from Shakespeare, but the singer with fine artistic ingenuity gave his entertainment vivacity by presenting each lyric with an old and a modern setting except in one or two cases where only one existed.

It is a pity that Mr. Coates did not come sooner. Firstly, we should have had the pleasure of hearing a very excellent voice in its best estate and before honorable service in art as well as in the world war had shorn it of some of its velvet. Secondly, we should have earlier made the acquaintance of a captivating art and an engaging personality. Mr. Coates is a singer. He has quality of tone sufficient for his present needs and problems of tone production do not trouble him. He soars into his upper scale with that ease which has marked the delivery of so many British tenors, such as Edward Lloyd and Ben Davies.

He has good breath control, and uses it for extended and exquisitely curved phrasing. He has admirable diction; one knows what the song is about. He is a master of style. He has a style for every song and the right style. And he keeps it throughout the song. He has communicative force and to this he adds a cunning use of pose and bodily movement. In short he has for each of his lyrics a completely formed plan of presentation and when you have heard him sing the number you feel that nothing his been neglected that was necessary to a musical and delightful publication of its meaning.

* * * * * But last evening's assembly, a large one including several vocal teachers, singers and instrumental musicians, made no secret of its pleasure. Mr. Coates got a hearty welcome and well deserved it.

EVENING WORLD

Realm of Music

By Paul Morris

It is a pleasure to record that the famous English tenor, John Coates, who after an absence of two decades from this country returned to give a recital last night in Town Hall, is not much interested in the gloomy art of singing sad songs. He is a humorist, a light-hearted, gay singer, a painter of bright fanciful musical pictures.

Yesterday was Shakespeare Day, and appropriately, he gave a whole program of songs set to texts of the famous bard of Avon. It would have been a hazardous undertaking for another singer. I cannot recall a single other musician who could have presented such an entertainment without making it monotonous. But Mr. Coates's hearers laughed and applauded with the enthusiasm of an Al Jolson audience. There was no rough humor. Mr Coates is an artist in the best sense. He manages his voice with the greatest possible skill. It is not a young voice. He is well along in years. But so cleverly does he color his tone that it seems beautiful. So perfectly does he phrase his music that he seems to be talking to his audience as he sings. The balance between word and music is adjusted with the greatest skill. Mr. Coates's program was unique. He presented alternate settings by old and modern composers of most of the familiar Shakespearean poems.

In the hands of a lesser artist many of the songs would have had little appeal, but he made every number a thing of great beauty.

Between songs Mr. Coates gave short explanatory talks, and his speeches were almost as absorbing as his singing.

HERALD TRIBUNE,

By F. D. Perkins

John Coates, a figure well known to British concert platforms, made his first recital appearance here last night at the Town Hall- * * * * * *

Not only in its program did Mr. Coates's singing vary from the standardized recital type. After a career of more than thirty years, his voice was not of the largest volume, but skillfully and artistically used, with smoothness and delicacy, a sense for nuance in softer passages, and a remarkable expressive ability, coupled with unmistakably clear diction. With an appearance and manner which, we were told by a friend of that author, vividly recalled the late Henry James, Mr. Coates sang and discoursed—for the concert was virtually a lecture-recital, although "lecture" hardly describes his pleasantly informal remarks—with an enthusiasm that rapidly communicated itself to his hearers, who, with the singer, gave evidence of having a very enjoyable time. In gesture and expression he showed a histrionic ability which must have stood him well in his opera and light opera days.

Simplicity and directness in the early numbers, with a touch of eighteenth century oratorio in Dr. Arne's songs, more elaboration, especially in the accompaniments, more of a descriptive aim in the music in the modern songs seemed to be the principal points of contrast between early and contemporary settings. Mr. Coates, who had begun strictly at 8:15 in order to reach a dinner of the English-Speaking Union before it closed, acquired greater volume, with less effort, for his top notes as he warmed up during the recital, and his first extra number, Caliban's declaration of independence, set by Handel's amanuensis, John Christopher Smith, which Mr. Coates suggested as a Bolshevik national anthem, was sung with unrivalled gusto.

TELEGRAM AND EVENING MAIL.

"Arch-Chanter John" Delights.

John Coates, an English tenor of veteran fame, made his first appearance in New York at the Town Hall last evening. Emphatically it was a case of better late than never. This recital of Shakespeare songs proved to be one of the most delightful events of all this long season of music. Mr. Coates—"arch-Chanter John" of Sir Edward Elgar's dubbing—not only sang with art that was truly consummate, but he interspersed comments as he went along of winsome learning and of priceless humor. Mr. Coates has a port, a presence and a personality, and he is urbanity itself about it all. This Shakespearian evening of his might have been a playful moment in the life of a Cabinet Minister.

Mr. Coates' voice may no longer be in its prime. "When I was ten I was in my prime and I knew it," he remarked, apropos Shakespeare's Jackie Wilson and the chance that at a like age the boy had invented and sung the "J. Wilson" setting of those words of wondrous beauty, "Take, O Take, Those Lips Away." Be all that as it may, Mr. Coates' art as an interpreter could hardly have been finer at any time than it is today. His diction might serve as model to anybody who has ever sung; his sense of nuance and the musical line is of the finest; he has a rare command of mezza voce; he combines as only the most accomplished artists can the musical with the rhetorical phrase. In a word, Mr. Coates' singing is that of a master and is instinct at every point with the captivating charm of great art.

* * * * * * * * *

Mr. Coates sang them one and all with an equal devotion, and his audience testified repeatedly to its joy in everything that he did.

One artistic song recital.

PITTS SANBORN.

LIMITED TOUR
NEXT SEASON NOW BOOKING

Management: LOUDON CHARLTON, Carnegie Hall, New York

Steinway Piano

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

THE EXASPERATING thing about singing is how easy it seems to be . . . when you hear some one sing who really can. I recall what one artist once told me. Said he: "When I used to listen to Caruso, or to Battistini, or any other great vocalist I always felt encouraged. What plunged me to the depths was having to sit in a hall where mediocre singing struggled on."

Others have experienced and still experience similar sensations. Singing is easy—when you know how. It is the "how" of it that is so difficult to master; and, thereafter, of holding firmly the fort.

Some of us who value rightly the free emission of the singing voice are usually interested to get the opinions of those who have made a study of its technique. So it was to the point when I met, the other day, Dr. Cyril Horsford, the eminent London throat specialist, and heard him talk on the subject. Later this visitor—who sailed from New York no later than last Saturday on his return to his home—permitted me to look through the manuscript of an address delivered in his Harley street residence before a large group of singing teachers.

DR. HORSFORD is in agreement with the masters of days long since gone, and with those of the present generation who know what they know. He attaches, for one thing, due importance to the taking and the control of breath. He points out, from a physiological standpoint, the necessity of avoiding rigidity of the chest—of the ribs particularly, since in that region of the body should the lungs expand and contract to their fullest extent.

"Many of the troubles of the vocal cord, and even the complete loss of voice, are often dependent entirely on some fault in the breathing apparatus," says Dr. Horsford. "If the breathing apparatus is faulty the vocal cords will not behave themselves, and eventually they will strike."

Improperly taken and controlled breath prompted Dr. Horsford to say in his lecture that the pharynx, if it could, might say: "No, you are not going properly. I will not let you go," and therefore would contract. "That is really the explanation of the perfect co-ordination which is essential between the three elements of the vocal apparatus [the breath, the cords, and the resonators]. Conversely, if there are faults in the resonators, the vocal cords will strike."

WHAT Dr. Horsford feels to be the correct way of breathing is what he terms "costodiaphragmatic," which he describes as "the movement and the expansion of the enlargement of the lower region of the chest, which is the ideal region for the enlargement of the chest cavity."

Then he stresses another point which some few singing-masters appreciate. He declares: "One essential thing is that when you fill your lungs you must hold in a manner that will keep up the air tension. It is the continuation of the action of inspiration which is really the function of expiratory control. In short, you want to fill your lungs with a sufficiency of air, and the lower chest must be kept expanded practically to the end of the phrase sung."

Wisdom, that. And again.

"Perfect singing means perfect vibration inside your cavities," continues Dr. Horsford—referring, of course, to the technical side of singing. "And just as the vibrations inside are perfect, so much more perfectly will they travel. Therefore, you do not sing so that Mr. So-and-so shall hear you; you sing so that you, even you, shall be a perfect vibrating machine. If you tell a pupil to sing to somebody at the back of the hall the pupil will endeavor to push the voice to Mr. So-and-so, and the pushing is fatal. The whole science of voice production therefore consists in making the cavities vibrate completely and wholly."

THE DIFFICULTY of so managing the tongue that, together with all else which forms the pharynx, there shall be "an open doorway or passage through which the vibrations may reach to the ends of their cavities" also is mentioned.

This expert, who serves professionally many great singers, states that "voice is the vibration within the cavities from the base of skull right down to the bottom of the lung. It is vibration which makes voice, and this business in the neck is merely a mechanism to set into vibration the air around. Therefore the voice is forward because the ends of these cavities happen to be forward—i. e., in the mask. It implies that the obstructions, the elastic tubes and the other difficulties which prevent us getting vibrations to the ends of their cavities, are no longer there. The voice is there when the door is open."

Dr. Horsford points out the need for training the tongue muscles, and the muscles of the palate, yet he dwells on the danger of voluntary control of the pharynx in these words: "The more voluntary effort you put into that [the pharynx] the tighter you make it. Then, of course, there is the purity of vowel sounds, and effective diction of those consonants and those vowels which you know from experience help to remove obstructions.

FARTHER ALONG in Dr. Horsford's lecture he touches on why voices fail, and drives home a telling point. He said once, in a paper devoted alone to that subject, that "voices fail either through faults in the instrument or faults in the methods of use."

Along comes this Englishman with the frank statement that "I have seen many a voice ruined from want of medical guidance, and many a professional singer's career seriously interfered with by an operation."

Interesting, and very much so, is the assertion of Dr. Horsford that "the correct position for the larynx in singing is a low position, because only in a low position will the interior be allowed to act properly at all.

One vital part of Dr. Horsford's lecture touches on the matter of registers in the singing voice. Because his explanation of his belief is so clear it deserves to be set forth here:

"One word about the question of registers, which is, of course, of vital importance. Some people will say: 'I do not believe in registers. My pupils all have a uniform voice.' If they have, and that voice is really good and lasting, all they have done has been to correctly and efficiently open the pharynx above so that the resonance is perfect; and when resonance is perfect, the registers have been employed and the voice is uniform without your knowledge and therefore without any credit to you, but merely because you have trained the voice to that perfection in resonance.

"That there are registers is a fact, and a very essential fact, too. The vocal cords cannot extend to the full range of voice by merely increasing the tension of those two cords, without strain, without endangering their vitality. It is a physical impossibility, and consequently, as you know perfectly well, as the pitch of a voice will vary with its length, tension and density, we therefore have to raise the pitch by either increasing the tension, shortening its length, or diminishing its density.

IT is necessary for you to know that at the end of a certain series of notes a change in the nature or relation of the vocal cords to each other must take place to enable you to sing the whole scale without damaging those vocal cords. Therefore you have to be absolutely rigid in your determination to carry each series to a certain length and no further. If you do not do that, you are straining and thereby damaging the elasticity of the vocal cords. Hence when those vocal cords have to adopt a new position, they cannot make the new arrangement, and consequently the next series of notes are very irregular and weak from want of tone, or tension, or stability of those vocal cords.

"That is often found in the contralto because the lower notes have been overstrained and overtaxed in the desire or determination of master or pupil, or both, to use the wonderful chest notes. Therefore, having carried it beyond what is easy and proper for them, those vocal cords say: 'Now I cannot rearrange myself because I, like an elastic band, have been pulled too much.' Hence you have a damaged vocal cord.

"Tonus of muscle, tension of elasticity in the vocal cords, is essential at all times for the purpose of resisting pressure from below. The perfect voice will not be obtained until there is a perfect balance between pressure from below and resistance at the vocal cords. But resistance is at the larynx and nowhere else. If there is no current of air above, there cannot be pressure; and if there is no pressure, there can be no resistance; therefore, the only place that there can be resistance is at the vocal cords, because it is at the point of resistance that this current of air is transformed into vibration, hence the importance of breath control.

"THEREFORE the training of the voice is really the training of muscles within the larynx to resist the pressure from below. Then the tube above says: 'Very nice. I have nothing further to do. I will therefore open.'

"My chief desire now is to answer, or endeavor to solve, some of the problems which occur in your daily experience. I want to know the troubles from which you suffer in your teaching, and to discover whether I can make these difficulties simpler by any physiological explanation."

IT SEEMS definitely decided that New York is to hear, next season, the Dayton Westminster Choir. Mrs. H. E. Talbott confided this information—after the choir had made a justifiable record in Richmond, Ind., Chicago, Battle Creek, Grand Rapids, Lansing, Detroit, South Bend, Muncie, Kokomo, West Lafayette, and Cleveland.

Mrs. Talbott, who came to the rescue of this organization at the opportune moment, has since charged valiantly in its behalf. She's enthusiastic over it (Mrs. Talbott has the enthusiastic nature, though, it should be stated, not unduly so). As a consequence, since the Westminster Choir sings admirably, it has been able to carry on to chances for recognition which is deserved.

But I believe, as does the sponsor of this organization, that its sincerity and spirituality are outstanding qualities. Conductor Williamson has done and is doing constructive work. With the Choir at its best New York should be impressed.

FROM AMARILLO, Texas, comes a letter written by May Peterson together with a full page advertisement carried in the Amarillo Daily News about Miss Peterson's appearance in the Panhandle Music Festival—which occupied an entire week recently.

The interesting phase of this advertisement (unusual in point of size to stress an individual artist) is that it resulted in an increase of $700 in the single-seat sale on the evening the soprano sang. "Songs You Like" was the top line of the ad, with "will be sung tonight by May Peterson" directly underneath, followed by a photographic reproduction of the artiste. Then came a list of seven songs, and information concerning where tickets might be purchased.

I have contended, many times, that success in getting people into a concert auditorium is largely dependent upon managerial initiative and industry. Here was enterprise, and it paid. The local manager who complains about mediocre patronage often has himself alone to blame. This is not an age where one can publish a few small ads about a concert, send out a herald or two, let the newspaper editors have a half dozen badly written stories, and then sit back in a chair and wait for customers to walk in. The up-and-coming impresario is the one who succeeds, and gets ahead. And who makes the visiting artists happy in so doing.

SYRACUSE has gotten back of its orchestra in a manner which foreshadows a new era in its existence. Most music folk remember the start, some four years ago, under conditions not easy to surmount. Last season Vladimir Shavitch was engaged as conductor, and since that time there has ensued a gradual elevation in the quality of the orchestra's playing, its discipline, and the programs offered.

By degrees Syracuse people realized what it was possible for its orchestra to achieve. Now steps have been taken to reorganize the board of directors, which, when nominated and elected, will choose its officers and . . . a manager.

Melville Clark, who was the prime mover in the establishing of the orchestra, is to relinquish the presidency of the organization. An acting executive committee is now at work on plans to place the orchestra on a firm basis, and will issue shortly an official announcement.

Mr. Shavitch has been reengaged to conduct this organization, and he is enthusiastic over the possibilities . . . which include serving, in a modest way, other communities than Syracuse.

THE CRITICAL SCALES

Royal Dadmun

After an absence of several years from local concert platforms, Royal Dadmun was heard in a song recital at Aeolian Hall last Tuesday evening. He sang a Handel air; two sixteenth century numbers by Quagliati and Falconiere in modern transcriptions by Pietro Floridia; a translated Russian group; one in French; another in German; and, in conclusion, English and American songs. Sigfrid Prager accompanied.

The Times chronicler commented that the baritone "sang with discriminative style and authority. . . . Mr. Dadmun displayed freedom and buoyance beyond the usual dexterity of baritone voices of his powerful timbre." According to the writer in the Herald Tribune: "A skilled singer, Mr. Dadmun gave an expressive performance, doing notable work in bringing out the contrasted emotions of a song such as Koenemann's When the King Went Forth to War. His voice, of adequate volume, showed some departure from absolute smoothness of tone, but the net impression was one of pleasing quality."

Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail wrote that his performances "bore their customary stamp of painstaking conscientiousness . . . his delivery always shows the results of creditable striving and long standing concert experience." This reviewer, however, thought Mr. Dadmun too inclined to a "slumbrous mezza-voce utterance" which becomes monotonous. The Sun writer observed that Mr. Dadmun "sang with artistry and refinement of style. His good voice served him well in the expression of sentiments, and his finish in phrasing was a valuable asset in his general work."

Weyland Echols

Weyland Echols, heard in New York earlier this season at a benefit recital as the "masked tenor," gave a recital in Aeolian Hall Wednesday evening. John Doane accompanied.

The Times reported that, "with a light, lyric style, a sensitive vocal pianissimo and intelligent phrasing, he combined moments of manly declamatory singing, though the tone as yet was not often sustained and its most characteristic effects were found in half-voice at high range." Pitts Sanborn (Telegram-Mail) asserted that Mr. Echols "indisputably knows a thing or two about artistic song delivery. He has learned some of the important secrets of style and applies them with discretion and no small authority."

According to the writer in the Sun, Mr. Echols "disclosed a voice of agreeable character and ability in using it. . . . His intonation was excellent, his diction, for the most part, clear and his phrasing generally admirable." This chronicler commented that a cold seemed to mar the uniform evenness of his scale at times." Mr. Echols produced a pleasing quality of tone when not aiming at a volume beyond his compass, wrote the reviewer of the Herald Tribune.

PERSIS Pianist and Teacher COX
Address: Pierce Building, Copley Sq., Boston, Mass.; or
Dana Hall, Wellesley, Mass.
Baldwin Piano Welte-Mignon Records

Miss Regina Diamond

A concert debutant of recent days was Regina Diamond, who gave a song recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 22. German Lieder shared the program with Italian and English songs. Richard Hageman was her accompanist.

W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun that Miss Diamond "has a very good voice, quite good enough for concert singing and capable of more warmth and expressiveness than appeared most of the time last evening. . . . The young lady showed promise, but her art is not yet sufficiently developed." In the final line of Gretchen am Spinnrade she relaxed and lost all throat tightness, according to Mr. Henderson, and "the natural color of her voice revealed itself as warm, lucent, and even emotional in character." The Times chronicler also noted the occasional nervousness which marred parts of the recital, but thought she possessed "a good lyric style, and vocal resources."

To quote the Herald Tribune, Miss Diamond's singing "had merit and possibilities of development. Her voice was of ample range and good size. . . . Her tone was good in passages of moderate volume, with clear quality and smooth surface." Herbert F. Peyser (Telegram-Mail) commented that her voice "deserves careful fostering. It is a soprano of no small purity when properly supported and allowed to flow unimpeded."

Dock Snellings

Dock Snellings, a negro postman from Burlington, Vt., was heard in recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 24.

The Times reported that the baritone "gave evidence of the seriousness of his aims and proved best equipped for the singing of the spirituals." According to the Herald Tribune, he displayed "a deep, resonant voice, with a quality of tone agreeable in soft notes, but in others inclined, it seemed, to a rather harsh timbre." This writer found him more at home in the spirituals which were sung "with expressive sincerity and a clearer, freer tone." Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail observed that Mr. Snellings was not equipped for the songs by Verdi, Rubinstein, Handel, Leoncavallo, and others.

Junior Orchestra in Annual Concert

The annual spring concert of the Louis Cornu Junior Orchestra was given in Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 26. According to the Sun, "the artistic results, animation, and interest shown by the members in performance are very praiseworthy." The organization, which is ten years old, gives young players an opportunity for symphonic training. Evelyn Brill, violinist, played several solos.

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

Miss Janet Adamson

"It is seldom that a first recital brings to public attention so beautiful a voice" as that disclosed by Janet Adamson at her Aeolian Hall (New York) debut on April 27, was the opinion of Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail. He added that Miss Adamson's voice is of "ample volume, rich in substance and of velvet texture. Its tones glow with native fire, tingling for the brilliant phrase, apt to publish tense emotion."

Her technical virtues were also applauded by Mr. Sanborn, although he admitted that her singing was uneven and that there was room for further development in some of its phases.

Less enthusiastic was W. J. Henderson (Sun) who commented that Miss Adamson revealed "a serviceable voice," which might perhaps have done better if it had been kept to the range of a mezzo soprano. The upper tones did not seem to be natural and surely were pushed. The lower ones had a more spontaneous character." According to the Herald Tribune "there was no doubting Miss Adamson's interpretative talent, her capacity for expressing the varied emotions of the taxing Chausson number, skill in phrasing and very intelligible diction. But her tone, in its upper notes, gave from time to time an effect of strain."

To quote the Times, the singer brought to the audience "an endowment of naturally musical feeling and some fine moments of a dramatic contralto voice. Her vocal material, not always under command, was constrained as yet by some uncertainty as to its use."

Panhandle Festival Held

Amarillo, Tex., April 20.—The Panhandle Music Festival, under the direction of Emil F. Myers, was held here from April 13 to 18.

The soloists who were heard were May Peterson, Florence Macbeth, Albert Spalding, Rudolph Reuter, Oscar Seagle, and Jose Mojica. Other concerts were given by Girvin's Little Symphony, Ramon B. Girvin conductor; the Amarillo High School, under the direction of Mrs. Robert Wilson; and the West Texas State Teachers' College, Wallace R. Clark conductor.

The festival drew one of the largest crowds it has ever known, and the various concerts were applauded by capacity audiences. There was also held a series of contests after which a concert was given by the winners.

Clyde Burrows

Clyde Burrows, baritone, gave his first New York recital at Town Hall last Tuesday with Emil Polak as accompanist. The Times reported that he proved "a serious and sincere artist, not alone in the old light-flowing melodies, but in communicative emotion, such as marked his well delivered texts from tone poems of a later day."

Old English ballads, German Lieder, and songs by Wade, Arnold, Schubert, Grieg, and Brahms comprised his program for the most part. There were also two Bayou ballads and two translated Russian numbers.

According to the Sun, Mr. Burrows is a "natural born singer." This writer continued that "he disclosed a voice of agreeable quality and good range. He sang with ease and fluency of tone and fine sustaining power. His style needed a little more color and finish, but he was fully able to please his hearers well. His sense of pitch was admirable." Herbert F. Peyser of the Telegram-Mail thought he lacked interpretative or artistic abilities, and the Herald Tribune chronicler wrote: "His voice showed possibilities, a soft, agreeable quality of tone in his softer notes, resonant fullness in some outbursts of louder ones, but there were invasions by a less agreeable timbre."

Alessandro Telesio

A recital was given in Chickering Hall, New York, on April 22, by Alessandro Telesio, tenor. His accompanist was Christian Schiott. The chronicler in the Sun wrote that Mr. Telesio "revealed a light tenor voice of good quality, which he used with considerable skill and a sound knowledge of style. He did not possess the resources necessary for dramatic recitative, but he made excellent use of the lighter lyric opportunities of his offerings." This writer added that his head tones were "exceptionally good."

The Herald Tribune reporter commented also that Mr. Telesio's voice seemed of a lyric rather than a dramatic quality. He thought that the tenor showed "a pleasing, unruffled quality of tone."

Italian-American Soprano Heard

A young Italian-American soprano, Amelia Antonucci, gave a recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, April 26. In an aria from La Forza del Destino, to quote the Herald Tribune, she showed "ample vocal volume and emotion, but an unpolished quality of tone.'

Willem Willeke
BRUNSWICK RECORDS 'Cellist STEINWAY PIANO
Management: EMMA JEANNETTE BRAZIER, 100 W. 80th St., New York

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 21, 192
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

ALLEN McQUHAE
TENOR
RECITALS—ORATORIOS—ORCHESTRAS
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Bldg., 57th St. & B'way, N. Y. C.
Brunswick Records

ANNA FITZIU
SOPRANO
Management: R. E. JOHNSTON
1451 Broadway New York

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

The Artists' Choir

The Artists' Choir, conducted by Clara Novello Davies, gave its second New York spring concert at Town Hall on April 26. Gladys Axman, Alma Clayburgh, and Rafaelo Diaz were the vocal soloists and Rhea Silberta, pianist, also was heard. The accompanists were the Misses Bedford and Whited, pianists, and the Misses Weymer, Shaffner, and Stockwell, harpists.

To quote the chronicler in the Sun, the chorus "showed improvement in tone quality and sang with good balance, good intonation and excellent phrasing and spirit." The Herald Tribune reported that the singers "made a very considerable impression, singing with a large degree of volume and spirit and, with one or two minor exceptions, notable unity and precision in response to Mme. Davies' direction." This writer qualified that "there was, perhaps, room for further polish in the highest notes of the sopranos, in some of the lusty notes of the male chorus, and occasionally in the ensemble."

According to the Telegram-Mail commentator, the choir, "ably" directed by Mme. Davies, "gave proof of good material and careful training in choral music." The soloists received commendation and this writer observed that Miss Axman delivered Il Est Doux from Herodiade with "fine quality of tone (especially in the upper part of her scale), a flowing legato and well considered phrasing."

Mme. Davies was presented with an ivory baton as a token of appreciation for her work with the chorus.

Boris Lang

Slavic music constituted, to some extent, the program played by Boris Lang, Russian pianist, in Town Hall, New York, on April 24. Among the composers represented were Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Chopin, Bach and Liszt.

In the opinion of the writer in the Herald Tribune, Mr. Lang "seemed to have a competent technique, marked fluency and lightness for rapid runs and expressive ability." According to the Times, "Mr. Lang has musical feeling, but has not a comprehensive foundation of technique or musicianship." The chronicler in the Telegram-Mail merely found his attitude "earnest."

Large Audience at Benefit Concert

A large audience applauded the concert given in Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 23 for the benefit of the St. Andrew's One-Cent Coffee Stands Society. The soloists participating in the program were Ruth Barrett, organist, Anna Pinto, harpist, Christian Thaulow, violinist, and Adrian Vanderbilt, pianist. There was also a vocal quartet composed of Clara Lambert, Grace Divine, Richardson Irwin and Jean Theslof. The accompanists were Morris Jimonick, Evelyn Smith, and Alice V. Williams.

Mischa Elman

At his final New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall on April 26, Mischa Elman played Nardini's Sonata in D, Vieuxtemps' Fifth Concerto, and pieces by Chausson, Barbella-Nachez, Brahms-Joachim, Grieg, and Wienawski, besides Auer and Elman arrangements.

Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail wrote that "the distinguished fiddler has never seemed more in the vein." According to the Post, the program "afforded excellent opportunity for the display of those qualities which have given Elman his place among the foremost artists of the world." The Vieuxtemps Concerto, further to quote this writer, gave "full play to the richness and poetry of his tone and splendid technique." The Sun writer reported that Mr. Elman's "general work had its familiar beauty of tone and finish. . . . His tone coloring was exquisite, his pitch seemingly perfect, and his range of sentiment well controlled."

After the violinist had warmed up, wrote the Herald Tribune reviewer, "tonal clarity and fluency and the familiar Elman technical brilliance" marked the performance. In the Times was mention of the cordial reception accorded the artist.

Miss Gale—Miss Gay

A joint recital was given in Chickering Hall April 27 by Mary Louise Gale, violinist, and Vernice Gay, pianist, both of whom made their New York debuts on this occasion.

According to the Sun reviewer, both young artists "acquitted themselves with much credit in their respective performances. They seemed to be still in the tentative stage as to style, and Miss Gale needed more elasticity in her bowing. But on the whole, they showed admirable training and played well. More experience will do much for them."

Miss Gale, playing, among other things, Bruch's G minor Concerto, displayed a very competent technique in the opinion of the Herald Tribune writer, with marked agility sometimes verging on brilliance, and a tone satisfactory in regard to clearness, and volume, except when the vigor of her bowing produced a passage or two of drier quality. This commentator observed that Miss Gay's music was "well played, with well developed technique and notable fluency." Other papers did not carry analytical reviews of the concert.

Bella Sadin Gives Piano Recital

Bella Sadin, young New York pianist, opened her recital at Rumford Hall on April 24 with Brahms' Handel Variations. Also on her program were numbers by Chopin, Dohnanyi's Rhapsody, and two pieces for two pianos played with her teacher, Dorsey Whittington. To quote the Herald Tribune, Miss Sadin "seemed to have the mechanics of her playing well in hand, and a vigor indicating expressive capacity . . . the impression seemed one of promise." Other newspapers did not publish analytical reports of the recital.

Machine Is Invented to Measure Singers' Emotions

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27.—A method for "measuring the artistic emotions of singers" was described today by Dr. C. E. Seashore of the Iowa State University at the opening session of the National Academy of Science here.

Dr. Seashore has compiled many tests to determine innate music ability and special talents in music. His latest method has already been applied, he said, to John McCormack, Geraldine Farrar, Anna Case, Nellie Melba, David Bispham, John Barnes Wells, and Louise Homer. He exhibited photographic records of renditions of Annie Laurie by each of these artists.

"These records permit us to express quantitatively and in fine detail the expression of artistic emotion in singing in terms of variations in pitch, time and intensity," Dr. Seashore said. "Volume and other complex factors may also be determined by an extension of the same principle of measurement."

Tinlot to Go to Rochester

Minneapolis, April 28.—Gustave Tinlot, French violinist and concertmaster of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, has tendered his resignation to the orchestra, to take effect at the end of the present spring tour.

Mr. Tinlot was released from his contract, which covered another year, so that he might accept a professorship at the Eastman School of Music here. He will also play first violin in the string quartet and be concertmaster of the symphony orchestra maintained by George Eastman.

The new concertmaster of the Minneapolis organization, according to the announcement by Arthur J. Gaines, manager, will be Pierre Henrotte, present concertmaster of the Metropolitan Opera Company and at one time of the Chicago Opera Company.

Sings in Costume

A costume recital "for children and adults" was given by Sibyl Mandell, American diseuse, in the Princess Theatre, New York, on April 19. According to the writer in the Sun, Miss Mandell "wore tasteful costumes and she knew how to pose and act with admirable skill. Her singing assets were modest, and animated inflection of voice greatly aided her in verbal speech." Her performance was marked by "spirit and wealth of gesture," wrote the Herald Tribune chronicler, "her singing showed a capacity for clear, agreeable quality." Other newspapers did not report the concert in detail.

Shakespeare Settings Sung by John Coates

John Coates, English tenor, made his New York debut in Town Hall April 23 in a recital of Shakespearian songs. In the words of Pitts Sanborn of the Telegram-Mail, the singer "not only sang with art that was truly consummate, but he interspersed comments as he went along of winsome learning and of priceless humor." With one or two exceptions, Mr. Coates sang each song in both an early and a modern setting.

"In a word," continued Mr. Sanborn, "Mr. Coates' singing is that of a master and is instinct at every point with the captivating charm of great art." Olin Downes wrote in the Times that he is, at best, "an experienced and accomplished singer." He showed in his interpretations, said this chronicler, "his mastery of diction as also his musicianly treatment, on many occasions, of a melodic line."

Among the qualities of his singing admired by W. J. Henderson of the Sun were his "captivating art and engaging personality;" his good breath control, which he uses "for extended and exquisitely curved" phrasing; his "admirable" diction; and his mastery of style. Mr. Henderson also wrote that his quality of tone is "sufficient for his present needs" and "problems of tone production do not trouble him." F. D. Perkins (Herald Tribune) wrote that after a career of thirty years as a singer, "his voice was not of the largest volume, but was skillfully and artistically used, with smoothness and delicacy, a sense of nuance in softer passages, and a remarkable expressive ability, coupled with unmistakably clear diction."

The comment in the Post was: "Mr. Coates has a naturally good voice, but there were times when he forced it overmuch. His diction is excellent." The reviewers were agreed as to the interest of the program he offered.

Verbrugghen Conducts Elijah

Minneapolis, April 24.—At the sixteenth symphony concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen conductor, Mendelssohn's Elijah was given with the assistance of the Minneapolis Symphony Chorus. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland and Meta Ashwin Birnbach, sopranos; Agnes Rast Snyder, contralto; Judson House, tenor; Bernard Ferguson, baritone, and Master Bobbie Jellison, boy soprano.

WILLIAM S. BRADY
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

GRADOVA
"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

RHYS MORGAN
THE WELSH TENOR
Management: ROGER DE BRUYN, 1639 Broadway, N. Y. C.
Tel. Circle 5500 DR. J. O. HOWELLS, Associate

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

Francis Rogers
Concert Baritone and Teacher of Singing
Member American Academy of Teachers of Singing
144 East 62d St., New York City

DOROTHY MILLER DUCKWITZ
AMERICAN PIANIST
Will accept a limited number of pupils
CHICKERING PIANO WELTE-MIGNON RECORDS
Management Dorothy Miller Duckwitz, 145 West 77th St., New York City

Stock Wins Ovation In Closing Concert

Chicago Symphony Ends Thirty-fourth Season; More Choral Events.

Chicago, April 30.—The thirty-fourth season of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra came to an end Friday night when Frederick Stock conducted a program made up of Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture, Weber's Oberon Overture, Brahms' First Symphony, excerpts from Tristan und Isolde, and Schumann's Abendlied.

Mr. Stock, who has conducted the orchestra for some twenty years, was accorded an ovation. Maurice Rosenfeld wrote in the News that this conductor has gained "with each year more and more confidence and greater mastery in the conducting of the highest in music."

The entire audience joined in lustily and sang the Blue Danube when Mr. Stock conducted this number at the final pop concert of the series last Thursday. In addition to Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, the orchestra also played numbers by d'Albert, Glazounow, Grieg, Keller and Elgar.

* * *

A chorus of over five hundred children from all parts of the city sang Sunday afternoon in the annual festival of the Civic Music Association. The Civic Orchestra, under Frederick Stock, was highly commended for its work.

Two songs by Edward Moore of the Tribune were sung with "very good tonal quality and commendable precision," to quote Maurice Rosenfeld. The performance was deemed excellent by the chroniclers, all of whom commended the cultural and educational work being done by the association.

* * *

The annual concert by the Marshall Field & Company Choral Society took place in Orchestra Hall on April 22. Thomas A. Pape conducted. The soloists were Arthur Kraft, tenor; Lois Johnston, soprano; Edna Swanson ver Haar, contralto, and Carl Rollins, baritone. A Cantata by H. Walford Davies, The Pilgrim's Chorus from Tannhaeuser, the Hallelujah from Beethoven's Mount of Olives, and other part songs comprised the program.

Mr. Rosenfeld asserted that Mr. Pape "never displayed his musical abilities, his artistic talents and his command over the entire ensemble so ably as he did at this concert." He continued that "there was often a beautiful and expressive tone quality from the chorus." According to Edward Moore, the concert provided "some of the best choral singing of the season." The performance was highly praised by other reviewers.

The soloists were "admirably equipped," wrote Mr. Rosenfeld, and Mr. Moore agreed as to their competency. He added that there was "superb quality" and "some excellent taste" shown in Mr. Kraft's singing. The solos were commended also by Karleton Hackett of the Post, and Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald Examiner thought Mr. Rollins "a gifted and routined baritone, and that Miss Johnston sang "with straightforward and convincing earnestness and vital and pleasant tone."

* * *

The United German Male Choruses of Chicago gave a concert Sunday for the benefit of Ulrich's Orphanage. Fifty members of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Eric De Lamarter assisted, and the soloists were Mme. Minnie Lang, soprano; Dr. Fery Lulek, baritone, and Master Leonard Shure, pianist. Weber's Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster was sung by Mme. Lang, "making effective display of a rather unusual range."

Mr. Rosenfeld asserted that the singers, under Karl Reckzeh, "displayed a remarkably fine tone body, a buoyant lightness in quality and good musical interpretation. . . . Mr. Reckzeh deserves praise for the excellent work he has accomplished." The other reviewers agreed.

ROYAL DADMUN
American Baritone, Who Was Warmly Applauded in His New York Recital Last Tuesday Evening

Musical Chicago En Courant

Home Season Ended, Orchestra Will Play on Tour and at Festivals; Events of a Closing Year.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, April 28.

THE Chicago Symphony orchestra officially ended its thirty-fourth season on Saturday night with the clatter and bang of Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture. The audience endeavored to produce a 1925 fanfare of appreciation of equal volume, and Mr. Stock and the orchestra were permitted to retire with the consciousness of a season well done.

One retirement at least, was for good. Albert Ulrich, oldest member of the orchestra both in age and years of service, will not return. Having begun to play with Theodore Thomas in 1881 and having played continuously with him and Mr. Stock since 1883, forty-two years, he has earned a slight repose and will receive a pension and start with a summer's vacation in Europe. Mr. Stock introduced him to Saturday night's audience, who gave him a heart-warming farewell.

Though the official orchestral season has closed, the orchestra still has a tour of two weeks and sundry festival engagements to fill before actual disbandment takes place. As a matter of fact that function is more theoretical than actual as fifty players remain together, simply moving their means of support from Orchestra Hall to Ravinia Park, where they learn that an opera orchestra remains in the pit and is supposed to be heard but not seen.

MR. MOORE makes interesting statistical report in the Tribune to the effect that Richard Wagner was the composer most frequently listed on the symphony programs. Beethoven and Brahms were second and "the beginning and end of music, Johann Sebastian Bach and Igor Stravinsky," third.

The final popular program of the orchestra on Thursday night turned into a community "sing" with Frederick Stock as sing leader, not a new role as far as the children's concerts are concerned. After a rousing performance of the popular Tschaikowsky Fifth symphony, he announced that the Blue Danube Waltz would be played as one of the "million and a half" requests received. The audience was invited to sing, and did—lustily and well.

It would seem that the most "civic" force in Chicago music is not so named.

THE annual festival of the Civic Music Association of Chicago, which rightly construes its name, took place at Orchestra Hall on Sunday. The festival offered evidence of at least three phases of the Association's activities. The Civic Orchestra, (for the development of symphony players) played, the combined children's choruses of the Association sang under the direction of Herbert E. Hyde, and Frederick W. Carberry led the audience in community singing. Karleton Hackett added a plea on behalf of the association for funds to carry on their fine work and to cover their deficit of the past year.

Announcement was made of the graduation of four members of the student civic orchestra. Three will go to the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra and one to a desk with the Chicago Symphony.

The Orchestral association announces the election of Augustus S. Peabody as third vice president and of William Owen Goodman as member of the executive committee of the association.

Coincident with the closing of the orchestral season comes from the press Philo Otis' book The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Its Organization, Growth, and Development, 1891-1924. By age and association Mr. Otis is ideally equipped for his task. He is secretary of the orchestral association, has been intimately associated with the orchestra since its inception, and further, his recollections go back to 1857. The book is therefore a complete and valued record of orchestral beginnings in Chicago and their activities up to date.

TWO HUNDRED and twenty-five pupils of high and grammar schools took part in the Greater Chicago music memory contest at Orchestra Hall on Saturday afternoon. The contest was held under the auspices of the In and About Chicago Music Supervisors' club, but proved to be more "about" than "in," as Chicago schools were not represented.

Mr. Stock and the Chicago Symphony orchestra presented music to be identified to the contesting teams of five each, who were supposed to name the composition, its source, the composer and his nationality, from the few bars played by the orchestra. Gary proved that steel is not paramount in its schools by winning two places, first for the grade schools, and tying for first with Lake Geneva in the high school contest.

SOCIAL, art, and music circles in Chicago are more than a little exercised over the forthcoming production of John Alden Carpenter's new ballet Skyscrapers at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Comments as to a prophet and his honour are frequent and apt. The fact that the composer drew his inspiration and title from the newly arising skyscrapers adjacent to his own home in the heart of old Chicago, would seem to justify the plaints of Chicagoans who would have liked a home production. However, one congratulates Mr. Carpenter,—and the Metropolitan.

AMONG other observations relative to Girls' Week was a concert presenting several of Chicago's most talented girls. Helen Hedges, soprano, has received numerous commendatory comments as to her charm and ability during the winter; Marion Roberts was last year's winner in the piano contest of the Federation of Women's Clubs; Helen Walton danced and Catherine Wade Smith and Theodora Bliedung, violinists, played. The program was arranged by the Musicians' Club of Women.

Rene Lund, Chicago baritone, showed at his annual recital on Sunday that he had climbed several more artistic rungs on his ladder of achievement. His singing pleased a goodly audience.

THE Chicago Opera Society has awarded the David Bispham memorial medal to John Adam Hugo of Bridgeport, Connecticut, composer of The Temple Dancer, presented by the society in Chicago last year.

M U Z I O
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

FORREST
L A M O N T
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

INA BOURSKAYA
MEZZO-SOPRANO
Metropolitan Opera Company—Chicago Civic Opera Company
Concert Management: S. HUROK, INC. Aeolian Hall, New York City

Volpe Leads in Farewell

Kansas City, Mo., April 25.—The third and last concert of the season by the Kansas City Conservatory Orchestra, which took place last Sunday afternoon in the Ivanhoe Auditorium, was the occasion of the last public appearance of that organization under Arnold Volpe, its founder and conductor.

Mr. Volpe has been in charge of the Conservatory Orchestra School since its inception three years ago, and under his direction the orchestra has grown to a membership of seventy. The members of the orchestra presented him with a watch.

The soloists at the concert were Mrs. Hunter L. Gary, soprano, Mary McKee, pianist, and Claude Dengolesky, violinist. Mrs. Gary sang for the first time three new songs with orchestra by Mr. Volpe: Homeless, Lullaby, and If You Could Know.

The orchestral numbers were Haydn's Second Symphony, Bizet's l'Arlesienne, and a Spanish Suite by Lacome. The performances were lauded by the reviewers.

Chicago Youth Wins Memory Prize

Chicago, April 28.—Robert Lanyon, a young insurance salesman, won the first prize of $1,000 today in the March Music Memory Contest arranged by the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company. There were thousands of competitors. In his school days Mr. Lanyon, a graduate of the University of Chicago, was an usher at the Auditorium, which experience helped him with the problems of the contest.

To win this prize young Lanyon had to listen over the radio to five concerts broadcast by musical artists, to write a short essay on the voice of Mario Chamlee, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and to identify the different singers who were incognito.

J. A. Daniels, of Butler, Ind., received the second award of $500; Mrs. Iva Hamilton Butler, of Des Moines, Ia., the third award of $300, and Elmina Rupert, a thirteen-year-old Pittsburgh girl, the fourth award of $200. There were ten awards of $100 each and forty of $50 each.

Chicagoans Give Recitals

Local Artists Featured in Windy City Music; Present Girls' Week Concert.

Chicago, April 30.—With the waning of the concert season has come a sudden activity on the part of local artists. Among the few recitalists of last week there were a number of Chicagoans.

Rene S. Lund, Chicago baritone, was heard in a recital at the Playhouse Sunday, accompanied by Edgar A. Nelson. In the words of Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, he "made a decided success with the exposition of his vocal art, his interpretative style, and his musicianship." According to Edward Moore of the Tribune, he seemed "an artist of both talent and industry" whose voice "has quality by nature, resonance, and evenness by development, and he knows how to project both words and melody."

His "splendid tone and attractive art" received the praise of Glenn Dillard Gunn of the Herald Examiner, and Karleton Hackett of the Post said he showed "genuine feeling for his songs, and his voice was expressive. The tone has grown richer in timbre, and with a wider range of tone colors."

* * *

A girl's week concert was given in Orchestra Hall Tuesday night under the auspices of the Musicians' Club of Women. Among the young artists who appeared were Helen Hedges, soprano; Theodora Bliedung and Catherine Wade-Smith, violinists; Helen Walton, dancer; and Marion Roberts, Lillian Jackson, and Margaret Farr, pianists.

Mr. Gunn thought Miss Hedges "has much more than a soprano voice of delicious quality and unspoiled freshness. She has feeling, imagination, the happy gift of making vocal facility a thing of beauty." He considered that Miss Roberts surprised by making the "ponderous moments" of Brahms' E flat major Rhapsody "sonorous without being heavy and its few facile moments bits of glittering technical display."

According to Edward Moore, these two artists gave a "personal glow" to their work. Mr. Hackett commended all the performers, and Mr. Rosenfeld thought that Miss Hedges has a flexible coloratura soprano voice which showed improvement in "vocal style and musicianship." He continued that Miss Roberts played "with Brahmsian energy, musically and with a perfect command of technique." He added his word of praise for the other girls.

* * *

A thirteen-year-old violinist, Marshall Sosson, gave a recital in Kimball Hall Sunday. The Post reported that he played "with comprehension of the music and with surprising technique." To Mr. Moore, his was "good playing regardless of age, with fine tone, excellent poise, and quite unchildish fervor." Maurice Rosenfeld wrote that he played "with a musical understanding which many a mature violinist lacks. He played with a temperamental interpretation which made the music vital and with a clear and unusually facile technique."

* * *

Clara Drew Miller and Louette Riehl Luecke gave a joint recital in the Young American Artists' Series in Fine Arts Recital Hall Thursday. Mr. Gunn thought that Miss Miller brought to her playing "admirable musical intelligence, a well developed sense of the acoustic possibilities of the piano . . . a pleasant tone." He found power and range in Miss Luecke's voice.

Dramatic qualities as well as power were noted in her singing by Mr Rosenfeld, who also liked her clear enunciation and poise. Mr. Hackett found less to commend in the work of the two artists.

* * *

The sixth of her historical recitals was given in Kimball Hall on Tuesday by Clara Clemens. Works by Pizzetti, Casella, Respighi, Bax, Holst, Elgar, Williams, Bridge, Carpenter, Bloch, Griffes, Mason, Foote, Parker, Chadwick, MacDowell, and Beach made up her program.

* * *

Watt Weber, tenor, and Constance McGlinchee, pianist, gave a joint recital in the Young American Artists' Series at Fine Arts Recital Hall April 16. Mr. Gunn asserted that Mr. Weber is "the most promising young tenor that the season has brought to notice."

Mr. Hackett wrote that he has "a sympathetic tenor voice of the true tenor timbre and with gratifying ease in the upper register. He sang with appreciation for the music and with interpretative power." Mr. Weber was credited with "an uncommonly fine lyric voice which has not yet reached its full maturity" by Mr. Moore, and Maurice Rosenfeld said he exhibited a voice "of admirable training and smooth, lyric quality over a wide range." Miss McGlinchee did not receive such favorable mention and most of the reviewers noted that nervousness marred her playing.

* * *

Fritz Renk, violinist, and Otto Beyer, pianist, assisted by Alexandra Carlisle Jenkins, reader, and Carl Renk, violin, Harry Perkins, viola, and Walter Brauer, violoncello, gave a program of chamber music at the Studebaker April 19.

According to Mr. Gunn, Messrs. Renk and Beyer "play together with that perfect mutual understanding which makes fine ensemble." Other writers agreed that they proved themselves admirable musicians, and the Post reported that "the string quartet played well, and Mr. Beyer fitted the piano into the ensemble with good sense of proportion."

* * *

On April 18 in Kimball Hall Louise Fernald, lyric soprano, Louis Victor Saar, composer and pianist, and Maryan S. Rozycki, pianist, were heard in a joint recital. In the words of Mr. Rosenfeld, Miss Fernald "exhibited a high, clear voice of pleasing quality;" Mr. Saar "earned a big success;" and Mr. Rozycki played "with musical understanding."

Samaroff

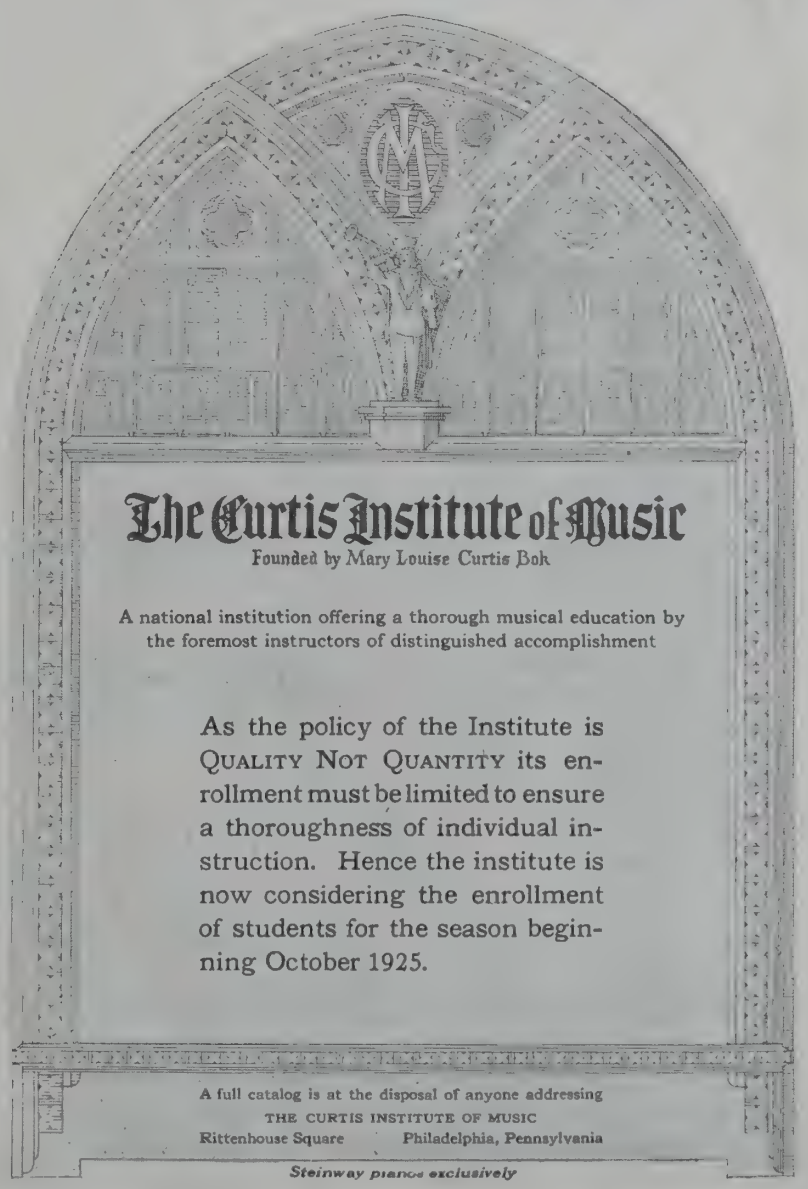
SEASON 1925-1926 NOW BOOKING

under the Management of

WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU, INC.

250 West 57th Street, New York City

VICTOR RED SEAL RECORDS STEINWAY PIANO



The Curtis Institute of Music
Founded by Mary Louise Curtis Bok
A national institution offering a thorough musical education by the foremost instructors of distinguished accomplishment
As the policy of the Institute is QUALITY NOT QUANTITY its enrollment must be limited to ensure a thoroughness of individual instruction. Hence the institute is now considering the enrollment of students for the season beginning October 1925.
A full catalog is at the disposal of anyone addressing
THE CURTIS INSTITUTE OF MUSIC
Rittenhouse Square Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Steinway pianos exclusively

On The Music Highway

ANTHONY PESCI, young American tenor, was soloist with the Beethoven Club of Staten Island last Wednesday evening.

One of the largest community choruses ever assembled in the United States will participate in a three-day Music Festival to be held in White Plains May 14, 15 and 16. Two thousand singers from all over Westchester County, under the direction of Morris Gabriel Williams, will compete for prizes, and programs will be given by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting. Florence Easton, Kathryn Meisle, Paul Althouse, and Arthur Middleton will be the soloists. A negro chorus of more than 150 has been supplied by John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

Prizes will be awarded to the best choir of mixed voices, the best choir of boy voices, the best quarter choir, the best choral society of mixed voices, the best choral society of male voices, and the best choral society of women's voices. There will also be prizes for vocal and instrumental soloists.

On the Festival committee are Harry Harkness Flagler, Felix Warburg, E. F. Albee, Clarence M. Woolley and Kurt Schindler.

At next Sunday's concert of the Sunday Symphonic Society of which Josiah Zuro is conductor a special Music Week program will be offered.

Florence Austral, dramatic soprano, arrived in this country last week to appear in the Cincinnati Music Festival which began Saturday. She is the first artist to be specially engaged to come from Europe to make her American debut in this festival since before the war. Miss Austral will sing the soprano role in Bach's St. John's Passion at the festival.

Roland Hayes, negro tenor, sang by royal command before the Queen Mother of Spain at her palace on Thursday, April 23. The summons came as a result of his public debut in Madrid on Tuesday, April 21. Then, and on April 24, he sang with the Madrid Philharmonic Society.

His Spanish appearances will be followed by a period of rest. He will make a tour of the German cities at the end of the summer and sing for the first time in Stockholm. He will return to America for his third tour of this country next November.

The Flonzaley Quartet was forced by heavy snowstorms to cancel its concert in Butte, Mont., the last point of its Pacific and Northwestern tour. The Quartet left immediately for New York to fulfill Eastern engagements, beginning May 5 in Fitchburg, Mass., and playing in Princeton, N. J.; State College, Pa.; Norwich, Conn., and Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Honors of two national women's organizations, Delta Omicron, national musical sorority, and the Altrusa Club, have been bestowed upon Renee Thornton, soprano, who sang at the Altrusa Club concert, in Memorial Hall, Columbus, Ohio, on Wednesday, April 15.

Miss Thornton was initiated in Delta Omicron and Richard Hageman, her husband, was made a national patron of the sorority.

National membership into the Altrusa Club was bestowed upon Miss Thornton at the Dejeuner given by Mrs. Margaret Parry Hast, chairman, on the morning of Miss Thornton's concert. Dr. Gillette Hayden, national president of the club, presided at the short ceremony. The only other honorary national members of the Altrusa Club are Ida Tarbell and Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Miss Thornton's concert appearances will be made next season under the direction of Concert Management Arthur Judson.

On March 31, Rose Armandie, French soprano, and prize winner of the Paris Conservatory, who made her debut in this country last season, gave a concert at the Salle des Agriculteurs, Paris, assisted by Marcel Ciampi, pianist. Miss Armandie is returning to this country in November for a second tour of six weeks.

Sigrid Onegin, contralto, will return to this country next season for her third American concert tour and for several operatic appearances. Mme. Onegin's tour this season was postponed on account of the arrival of Fritz Peter Pentzold, who was born a few weeks ago to Mme. Onegin and her husband, Dr. F. Pentzold, of Munich.

E. Robert Schmitz is back in New York, resting for the first time since last fall when he left on tour the day after his Aeolian Hall recital on October 23. His season ended the first week in April with a recital followed by four lecture recitals in Birmingham, Ala.

The Elwyn Concert Bureau, Western representatives of the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Inc., have announced a Wolfsohn Innovation Series of ten subscription concerts which will be given on Thursday evenings during the season of 1925-1926 at Exposition Auditorium, San Francisco.

The feature of this course of concerts in San Francisco is the price scale, which will be $3.50, $5 and $8 for the entire series.

The artists to appear on this course are Josef Hofmann, Edward Johnson, Margaret Matzenauer, Hulda Lashanska, Felix Salmond, Thamar Karsavina and her ballet with Pierre Vladimiroff, Maria Kurenko, Vincente Ballester, Toscha Seidel, Olga Samaroff, and the London String Quartet.

A program of music by composers included in its own membership was held by the MacDowell Club of New York Friday evening. Two male choruses, two treble choruses, the Larghetto from her Sonata in D minor for violin and piano, and a song, by Gena Branscombe; Allen Lincoln Langley's Sonata in F minor for viola and piano; and songs by Ralph Cox, Marshall Kernochan and John Prindle Scott comprised the list.

Those appearing on the program included Miss Branscombe, accompanying; Mr. Langley, violist; Julie Ferlen, violinist; Bernard Wagenaar, pianist; Viola Waterhouse Bates, soprano, and the Mountain Males Glee Club, directed by J. L. Houston. Miss Branscombe conducted the treble choruses which were sung by ten women from the Mozart Society Choral, accompanied by a string and woodwind ensemble.

John Bland's boy choir of Calvary Episcopal Church will appear in a program of Liturgical music (a cappella) at the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York, next Saturday afternoon. The choir of forty-five voices will sing O Lord, Our God, Palestrina; Bless the Lord, Ivanoff-Ippolitoff; Bring a Torch, Old French; God Be in My Head, Davies; Cherubim Hymn, Gretchaninoff; Angel Bands, Saint-Saens; O Bethlehem, Old Basque; Salvation Is Created, Tschesnokoff; and Fierce Was the Wild Billow, Noble. The soloist will be Charles Stratton, tenor.

The first program of a two day observance of the memory of Marco Enrico Bossi, Italian organist and composer who died recently as he was returning to Italy from his first American visit, took place in the Wanamaker Auditorium on April 25. It was in that auditorium that Signor Bossi made both his first and last American appearances.

A program of his works was arranged by G. Aldo Randegger and included Piece Heroique, Hora Mystica, and Hora Gaudiosa for organ; the Trio Sinfonico, for piano, violin and cello; three Canti Lirici, for tenor, and four Visioni Pittoriche, for soprano. The assisting artists were Samuel A. Baldwin, organist; Caterina Gobbi, soprano; Nicola d'Amico, tenor; Salvatore dell'Isola, violinist; Rosolino de Maria, cellist; Mr. Randegger, pianist, and Alberto Bimboni, accompanist.

Alexander Russell spoke first on behalf of the Wanamaker Auditorium, where the organist had made his American appearances.

The other event was a free organ recital Sunday afternoon by Professor Baldwin in City College. An all-Bossi program was played.

Oliver Stewart, tenor, together with Daniel Wolfe, composer-pianist, and Helen Chase, pianist, is giving a recital at Rumford Hall, New York, tonight.

A song recital for young people was given at Chickering Hall, New York, on April 26 by Miriam Witkin, who sang only English songs. Her accompanist was Dorothy Longacre, who also played some solo numbers.

An increased schedule of out-of-town concerts is announced by the Philharmonic Orchestra for next season. In place of two tours there will be three. In place of single concerts in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore, the Philharmonic will give a subscription series of three in each of these cities, and the Pittsburgh concerts have been increased from two to four. There will also be two concerts outside the subscription series in Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia and the Philadelphia Forum. Other cities in the Philharmonic itinerary include Boston, New London, Northampton, Holyoke, New Haven, Wheeling, W. Va., Reading and Princeton.

Vittorio Trevisan, basso of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, has been engaged to sing Sir Tristan in Marta at the Music Festival to be held in Evanston, Ill. He will again be heard both at Ravinia and with the San Francisco Opera Company in San Francisco and Los Angeles. Mr. Trevisan has been re-engaged by the Chicago company for next season.

The second annual Music Week was celebrated in Lawrence, Kansas, from April 26 to May 2. The organizations participating in the celebration were the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the Kansas University Glee Clubs, Haskell Glee Clubs, Lawrence Choral Union of 400 voices, High School Glee Clubs, Junior High School Glee Clubs, Children's Chorus, the Kansas University Orchestra, Haskell Orchestra, Kansas University Band, the Haskell Band, F. A. U. Band, Lawrence Music Club, and various churches of the city.

The soloist with the Minneapolis Orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen conducting, was Marie Tiffany, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The soloists in the Manzoni Requiem, sung by the Lawrence Choral Union with the University Orchestra, were Mme. Elsa Harthan-Arendt, soprano; Mina Hager, contralto; Eugene Dressler, tenor, and Herbert Gould, bass.

National Music Week
MAY 3-9, 1925
Give More Thought to Music

Cincinnati Conservatory of Music
INCORPORATED
Founded 1867 by Clara Baur
BERTHA BAUR, President and Director
Burnet C. Tuthill, General Manager

59th Summer Session in All Departments

Master Class in Piano under MARIA CARRERAS
and in Voice under THOMAS JAMES KELLY, including interpretation, pedagogy and repertoire. Private lessons under regular faculty members for students of all grades in all departments.

Cincinnati is attractive in Summer because of its eight-week GRAND OPERA SEASON, by the famous Cincinnati Summer Opera Company, in the Auditorium of the Zoological Gardens.

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC COURSE (Accredited)
for Supervisors and Undergraduates, leading to certificates, diplomas and degrees.

Classes in Instrumental Class Instruction in Piano, Violin, wood-wind and brass instruments.

Dormitories on wooded campus.

Send for Summer Announcement and Catalogue.

Highland Ave., Burnet Ave. and Oak St., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Six Artists Celebrate Auer's 80th Birthday

Heifetz and Zimbalist Give Gala Concert With Aid of Pianists.

A birthday party was given Prof. Leopold Auer at Carnegie Hall, New York, last Tuesday evening by two of his pupils, Efrem Zimbalist and Jascha Heifetz, together with Josef Hofmann, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and Paul Stassevitch, pianists. Professor Auer will celebrate his eightieth birthday June 7.

In spite of the high price of the tickets, the auditorium was packed to capacity, and over five hundred disappointed music lovers were turned away at the doors. It was reported that the receipts totaled over $20,000.

The first number, Vivaldi's Concerto in A major for three violins, was played by Professor Auer and his two pupils, Messrs. Zimbalist and Heifetz, with Paul Stassevitch at the piano. Prolonged applause and cheers greeted the artists upon their appearance on the stage and at the conclusion of the Concerto. Following this was Brahms D minor Sonata played by Mr. Zimbalist and Mr. Gabrilowitsch, after which Professor Auer played some short solos, accompanied by Rachmaninoff.

A Romance and Tarantelle by Auer and Achron's Pensee de L. Auer were played by Mr. Heifetz, with Mr. Zimbalist at the piano, and Mr. Rachmaninoff serving as page-turner. Josef Hofmann played Chopin's F sharp minor Polonaise, Tschaikowsky's Berceuse, and the Wagner-Liszt Liebestod. The program was brought to a close with Bach's double Concerto in D minor played by Messrs. Heifetz and Zimbalist, with Paul Stassevitch accompanying.

Insistent calls for Mr. Auer at the conclusion of the entertainment brought forth the announcement that, fatigued from the excitement of the occasion, he had gone home to rest, leaving his thanks behind him.

Bodanzky Will Lead Novelties

There will be three first performances in next season's series of ten subscription concerts given by the Society of the Friends of Music in Town Hall, New York. At the first concert on November 8 Frederick Jacobi's choral work, Poet in the Desert, will be presented; Gallico's Septet for string quartet, horn, piano and voice will have its first hearing on November 22, and on December 13 Wetzler's Suite, As You Like It, will be given.

Ninth Symphony Ends Minneapolis Season

Gange Sings Bach Arias; Graveure Is Heard in Recital; Apollo Club Concert.

Minneapolis, April 26.—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was the feature of the final Saturday subscription concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen conducting. Fraser Gange was soloist in two Bach arias, as well as in the Symphony, together with Emily Stokes Hagar, soprano; Lewis James, tenor, and Claire Brookhurst, contralto.

Mr. Gange, wrote James Davies in the Tribune, "is that type of finished vocalist who brings to the interpretation of Bach not merely the right kind of intelligence; he has that perfection of vocal technique which makes light of the difficulties peculiar to this kind of music . . . his tone was sonorous, restrained, and even; his breath control was admirable; and his phrasing of such discrimination that every note was made to do its exact duty and nothing more." Mr. Davies continued that the soloists sang their parts in the Beethoven work "with great effect."

The chorus, according to this writer, would have benefited by more rehearsals with orchestra. However, he thought the performance on the whole excellent. Bach's Second Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra opened the program.

The symphony was repeated at the following Sunday afternoon concert, when Mr. James, as soloist, sang an air from Donizetti's L'Elisir d'Amore. The other number was Mozart's Figaro Overture.

* * *

Louis Graveure closed the concert course given by the University of Minnesota with a song recital at the campus armory April 8. Victor Nilsson asserted in the Journal that his singing "was more marvelous than ever" and that he "is easily one of the most expert singing artists now before the public and has developed in technical skill since last heard here some years ago." This writer found some of his high notes lacking in their usual roundness and fullness.

In his first songs, wrote Mr. Davies, Mr. Graveure "re-established himself as one of the leading vocal artists of our time." Mr. Davies thought that, in Schubert's Der Wanderer, which opened the program, the singer "gave a splendid rendering, poetic, dramatic, and finely narrative."

* * *

The soloist at the last concert of the Apollo Club was Ina Bourskaya, an artist new to this city. Mr. Nilsson observed that it was the finest concert of the season.

Mme. Bourskaya, continued Mr. Nilsson, revealed herself as "a temperamentally interesting singer." He thought her lower scale "rich and sympathetic," but found the high notes often sounded shrill. The emotional quality of her work was commented on by Mr. Davies, who however, considered her diction poor.

HENRI VERBRUGGHEN

Closed the Season of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra With a Performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony.

Renee Thornton, Salzedo, and Hageman Heard in Columbus

Columbus, O., April 21.—Renee Thornton, Carlos Salzedo, and Richard Hageman appeared here last week in concert under the auspices of the Altrusa Club. To quote H. E. Cherrington in the Dispatch, Mme. Thornton "achieved some of her finest effects with a resonant middle voice." This writer found her upper voice a "bit tight" at times, "but it is agile, warm, through most of its range, and is handled with remarkable artistry. Personality, beauty, are among her assets."

According to Harold G. Davidson of the Citizen, "her art and personality" won the audience. In the Ohio State Journal, Mme. Thornton was commended for singing with "ease, good taste, and intelligence . . . She is most prepossessing and her voice has unusual freshness and purity."

Mr. Salzedo, continued this writer, "is quite the most remarkable harpist ever heard here." In his hands, wrote Mr. Cherrington, the harp is an instrument of great expressiveness, and his offerings were "masterfully" done. Mr. Hageman's accompaniments were praised.

Singer Stricken on Stage

Emma Trentini, soprano, collapsed in the midst of her performance in the Keith Palace Theatre, New York, last Tuesday evening. She was singing her opening number when she was stricken with an attack of sciatica.

Salmond

from a 'Cellist's Scrapbook

"The violoncello as a solo instrument, in the hands of a consummate artist like Felix Salmond, is a revelation even to an audience of cultured musicians."

—W. Smith Goldenburg, Cincinnati Enquirer.

Management:
Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Inc.
250 West 57th St., New York

An International Agreement

CONCERNING

CLARA HASKIL

Boston: Transcript
"Musical Personality."

New York: Times
"Imaginative and Brilliant."

Montreal: La Presse
"Consummate Artist."

Milan: Corriere della Sera
"Great Artist."

Paris: Le Monde Musical
"Marvellous Fingers."

Brussels: L'Evertail
"Charming Personality."

—YOUR CITY WILL RESPOND THE SAME WAY—

RUMANIAN PIANIST

RETURNS FROM PARIS

MIDDLE OF OCT. FOR 6 WEEK TOUR

NOW BOOKING

Bogue-Laberge Concert Mgt.
130 West 42nd St., N. Y. C.

To Whistle—To Applaud

The Behavior of Audiences and the Abolition of the Claque Are Discussed in Rome

by ALBERTO DE ANGELIS

Rome.

AT the second performance recently of a new opera in our Costanzi Theatre, one auditor in the gallery dared to destroy the unanimity of the applause of the audience by a disapproving whistle. He was ejected from the theatre by the police.

The disturber went away peaceably enough, but the next day his letters of protest appeared in all the leading newspapers of Rome. This spark has burst into a great flame of criticism against Rome's largest theatre. Some of these critics have been the editors of the newspapers themselves, who have printed the letter of protest with unsigned addenda of their own in which they approve of its sentiments. Others have been various private persons.

The considerable correspondence to the newspapers which this incident caused is of two kinds. Some of the letters are general in their subject matter, and discuss the question of whether or not audiences have the right to whistle in the theatre, and the others unqualifiedly disapprove of the action of the Costanzi management in having the disturber ejected because he dared voice his objection to what the majority of his neighbors seemed to like.

It is to be remembered that the question of hissing and whistling in the theatre has been under discussion by the Italian public and newspapers for some time. This sort of behavior has always been considered legitimate in the ordinary non-musical theatre, until lately certain unruly members of the theatre-going public have developed the custom to the extent of abuse, often interrupting the course of new plays with their whistling. The question has followed as to whether the public has the right to whistle at all, whether such can in any case be considered orderly behavior.

Some of the newspapers started a referendum among their readers, to which there was great response, part of it from well-known personalities and writers, part of it from citizens who are honored mostly in their own families only. The opinion is so divided that one can scarcely say that this referendum in any way indicates a definite public sentiment. For the most part the public seems to be in favor of allowing hissing and whistling and other "orderly" signs of disapproval on the part of the audience, provided they are restrained until the end of the play or opera offered, so that opinion is not prejudiced by untimely interruptions.

Heretofore the Costanzi has not been troubled with such abuses of the expression of disapproval as have the other theatres of Rome. The opera audiences have acquired the reputation therefore of being extremely lenient, and the newspaper critics of the capital are even more sympathetic in their attitude towards performers and performances.

The hostility of the newspapers towards the management of the Costanzi is for this reason particularly surprising, since one would expect that editorial policy regarding musical matters would be in the hands of the newspaper critics, who, as is customary with them, would be likely to be sympathetic with the management.

Some of the editorial comment on the other hand has gone so far as to insinuate that the ejection of the particular disturber in the case mentioned above was significant of a general policy of the Costanzi of suppressing criticism in the audience, and of creating successes by means of the employment of a claque.

This brings up another question, that of the legitimacy of hired applause. Here impresarios of theatre and opera companies are not so much concerned, for the matter is usually related to composers of new operas, to singers, and to whoever is able to gain some advantage from bribing persons to applaud.

There is ample precedent for discussion as to the abolition of the claque. During the first months of the Fascista regime, when the minds of Italians were completely turned in the direction of every sort of reform, there were proposed two changes of more or less importance in the structure of music affairs.

One of these was the abolition of the institution of concert and theatre agents and their fees. The other was the destruction of the claque. At that time it was said that Toscanini himself proposed to have La Scala rid of its own paid applauders.

However, although Italians are always quick to be seized with an ardor for reform, they are just as quick to cool their spirits and to forget all about their indignations as soon as they have exhausted their enthusiasm in a storm of articles and pamphlets and resolutions. At that time therefore both questions were allowed to drop without being settled. It is to be expected that the same sort of thing will happen with this present campaign against the claque and in favor of free criticism and disapproval.

The Costanzi Theatre suffers the common lot of all large theatres. It is repeatedly criticized for one thing or another. Some critics have brought up the question of what has happened to the promised production of Ottorino Respighi's opera Belfagor. It is pointed out that the Costanzi management promised a performance of this work in its forecast of plans for this season. The merit of the piece itself is attested by its recent successes in Hamburg and Dresden, Germany.

Other productions originally announced will be neglected, too, it seems, but the Costanzi defenders are pointing out, on the other hand, that the theatre gave this season a number of performances which were not forecasted at all.

Despite these criticisms and newspaper controversies, the present opera season is unfolding itself daily as one of the finest which Rome has had in some time. Italians and foreigners alike have flocked to the Costanzi, and its productions, at least on the whole, are of a high standard, touching such high spots as the presentation of Falstaff with Stabile in the title role.

It is true that with the formidable competition of La Scala and the American opera companies, and with the unfavorable monetary conditions here, the Costanzi is not able to get hold of the cream of present-day interpreters, but it is for the most part making up in ensemble what it lacks in individual brilliance.

Philadelphia Musicians May Quit

Philadelphia, April 26. — Twelve members of the Philadelphia Orchestra have tendered their resignations to the organization, according to recent reports. Among those who have resigned are Michel Penha, first cellist; Philip Schmitz, third cellist; Domenico Bove and Milton Bornstein, second violinists; Romain Verney, solo viola; Horace I. Brown and Clarence Jordan, second violinists; Boris J. Koutzen and Alexander Popoff, first violinists; S. Cheifetz, viola, and Frank S. Watson and Josef Smith, cellists.

According to Thomas M. Rivel, head of the local musicians' union, seventeen vacancies in all will be filled, including nine violins, three violas, four cellos, and one trumpet.

Toscha Seidel's Mother Dies

Mrs. Titania Seidel, the mother of Toscha Seidel, violinist, died suddenly in Edinburgh, Scotland, following an operation for gallstones on April 26. Toscha Seidel was touring the British Isles on a concert tour when his mother became ill in Scotland. Mr. Seidel has cancelled the rest of his European tour and is returning to this country.

Present Records to Library

Washington, April 29.—A special room to contain a large collection of phonograph records is being installed in the Library of Congress by the Victor Talking Machine Company. The room will be administered by the Music Division of the library.

Tetrazzini to Return to U. S.

Luisa Tetrazzini, coloratura soprano, will return to the United States for a concert tour next season, announces W. L. Healy, her American manager.

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

Friedberg
SEASON 1925-1926 IN AMERICA
Management:
S. HUROK
Manhattan Opera House
New York City
Margaret Gordon Pringle
Personal Representative
Spring 8347
9—10 A. M.
Steinway Piano

FOR NEXT YEAR!

ARMANDIE
French BECAUSE Soprano

"She is a singer who is also a musician," CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR; "An interpreter of talent and taste," NEW YORK AMERICAN; as well as "An artist expressing the beautiful soul of France," MUSICAL COURIER.

FALL NOW BOOKING 1925

APPLY
Bogue Laberge Concert Management
130 West 42nd St. New York City

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

Opera-Comique Revives Pelleas

Exposition Attracts Recitalists to Paris; Mary Lewis Scores in Operetta; Lohengrin With Mme. Lubin.

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Paris.

The Easter season, which is usually marked here by a complete cessation of recitals and concerts, was just as crowded with music as any other portion of the season has been. The reason for this is perhaps traceable to the Exposition des Arts Decoratifs, which is to open within a few days and to run for some months.

During the weeks the exposition is in progress every recitalist who can possibly get to Paris, it seems is performing here. Naturally, there is a shortage of concert halls, and that has obliged many artists to appear during the Easter season rather than not appear at all.

The revival of Pelleas et Melisande of Debussy at the Opera-Comique last week is the most important musical event to record. Adolphe Boschot, reviewer for the Echo de Paris, attended a matinee performance of Pelleas and noticed that "during the acts most of the faces expressed astonishment, and from time to time the naiveness of the libretto made them smile. When the curtain went down most of the spectators remained silent, puzzled and perplexed by something with regard to which they did not know what to think."

Voices "Too Beautiful"

Concerning the interpretation, M. Boscot said that the two principals, Mme. Reville and Andre Bauge, "have voices that are too beautiful. too clear and too supple for roles which demand above all mystery, shadows and disquietude." For these roles he would have "bad" voices. Emile Vuillermoz of Excelsior did not regret the beauty of the two leading voices. On the contrary, he was entirely pleased with the "perfect musical execution," praised Mme. Reville's "charming voice, graceful appearance and incontestable musical gifts," and liked M. Bauge because he is "the most agreeable singer" of the Opera-Comique.

The reviewer of the Chicago Tribune gave "lack of atmosphere and mood" as the outstanding shortcoming of the performance of Pelleas et Melisande. "Were Mme. Reville artist enough to make one forget the artist, nothing more could be asked for . . . M. Bauge as Pelleas, by virtue of his superb diction, consummate mastery of lyrical declamation and self-effacement," is in a position to project a characterization of the first order. The other interpreters did not provoke enough comment to call attention to it.

M. Inghelbrecht, who conducted, "had his hands full," according to the Chicago Tribune, for the most part expending a maximum of effort to produce a minimum of atmospheric music. M. Vuillermoz acclaimed this conductor as "the most qualified of all," a "specialist in this music," while L'Echo de Paris called attention to "his great care for detail and his discreet lyricism."

Mary Lewis in Operetta

In lighter vein than "the most perfect of all music dramas" was the revival of The Merry Widow of Franz Lehar, at the renovated Apollo Theatre. This revival created both a society and artistic stir. The composer was in attendance, Mary Lewis, an American songstress, made her Paris debut in the principal role, and everything was done on a lavish scale.

Miss Lewis made her way straight to the hearts of the Parisian public, and, as everybody knows the French consider a fine light opera performance just as important as any other, for art is art, no matter where you find it. The only fault that was found with Miss Lewis' impersonation was with her French diction, but strangely enough, all the critics found so many other virtues in her that they excused and accepted what is erstwhile a cardinal sin.

Andre Messager in Le Figaro commented on "her beautiful voice," "the sweetness and charm" of her delivery, and her "facile and pure" high notes; according to Louis Schneider in Le Gaulois, Mary Lewis "unites the qualities of singer, actress and dancer" which make the role of Missia Palmieri "one of the most difficult in the repertory of operetta." He lauded her "mastery of her instrument." The Comedia chronicler liked her "delicious faults" along with her "brilliant qualities, and as to her accent, "well, what difference does it make anyhow, as long as her voice is as fresh as springtime song itself?"

The dramatic critic of the Chicago Tribune, with an alert eye to the practical aspect of things lyrical, was delighted to report that "Miss Lewis has quite justified the trouble of bringing her across the ocean for the piece," for not only does her voice "carry the authority of grand opera (for which she is headed), but there is a grace about her dancing" that few lyrical artists possess.

Opera Gives Lohengrin

Friday evening, at the Paris Opera, Mme. Germaine Lubin returned to that stage in the role of Elsa in Lohengrin. Mme. Lubin occupies a place of high esteem in Parisian affection and was greeted by a capacity audience. Comedia, the only journal to review her work in detail, remarked that "she acts with much intelligence and feeling" and that in the grand duo of the third scene her "movements were beautifully dramatic." Her voice has "magnificent sonorities," but sometimes a high note "is not there."

M. Franz (Lohengrin), Mlle. Georgette Caro (Ortrud), M. Lanteri (Telramund), M. Huberty (King Henry), M. Dalerant (the Herald), completed the cast of this presentation.

Robert Goldsand, a thirteen year old pianist, gave a recital the other evening of immense dimensions. He did not, however, create a sensation as that word is generally understood in the world of music and musicians, for people here are becoming wary of child prodigies. The sum total of opinion was that Robert is already far advanced in his art. that he "has developed astonishing power and plays cleanly."

Victor Wittgenstein gave a piano recital at the Salle Gaveau to an audience, most of whom had assembled to hear Paul Wittgenstein, the noted one-hand pianist of Vienna. Paul Le Flem in his column in Comedia admired his "delicate touch, virtuosity, and finished interpretation." Another reviewer commended his "sense of proportion," "fine effects in tone and rhythm," but found fault with his "unmusical" right hand in certain melodic passages and his unbalanced conception of the Chopin Sonata, Op. 52.

IRVING SCHWERKE.

Foreign Notes

The New York Herald Tribune reports that the Mexican Ministry of Education is about to begin a fight against the "savage music imported from the United States under the name of jazz," according to El Democrata. A circular will be addressed to the teachers in all national schools ordering an attack upon the American melodies, which, the ministry says, are invading Mexico more and more daily.

The circular, which already has been prepared, calls the jazz songs "degenerating melodies corresponding to the tastes of savage tribes."

Leeds, England.—The threatened discontinuance of the Leeds Philharmonic Society due to the season's deficit has been avoided. The generosity of the members made this possible, and subscriptions ranging from ten shillings to ten guineas have been guaranteed by one hundred members.

Liverpool.—A Women's Symphony Orchestra has recently been formed here. The string section of the orchestra, conducted by Constance le Mesurier, was heard in concert here on March 22 at the David Lewis Theatre. Holst's St. Paul Suite and the Figaro Overture were among the numbers on the program.

Sydney.—Mme. Galli-Curci reached Australia on March 24 and received an unique reception at the landing. The wharf was decorated with huge inscriptions, "Welcome Galli-Curci," and a crowd of several thousand persons waited to catch a glimpse of her.

She made her first concert appearance on Australian soil on March 28. The tickets had been sold out days in advance and hundreds more were turned away. Mme. Galli-Curci is giving eight concerts here within two weeks.

L. DE N.

CARYL
BENSEL
SOPRANO

"Legato singing at its apex." —Pittsburgh Sun.
"One of the best soloists we have had." —Pittsburgh Post.
"Firmness and fluency of tone production." —Newark News.

Management MOLLIE CROUCHER
1425 Broadway, New York

Fleta
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

GRAVEURE
IN LEADING MUSIC
CENTERS

"The 'O del mio dolce ardor' from Gluck's 'Paride ed Elena' was singing in the utterfulness of the word. Fine tonal quality, surpassing control of breath, jointless legato, musicianly phrasing, exquisite nuance, perfect diction and fervent expression combined to make this by all odds the most beautiful and satisfying performance of this often sung air that I have ever heard."—Pitts Sanborn in New York Telegram-Mail.

Management:
Metropolitan
Musical Bureau
Aeolian Hall
New York City

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

Ronald Calls for Concert Reform

English Musician Urges Lighter Attractions to Relieve Strain on Audiences; Complete Opera Plans Announced.

London.

Something of a bombshell was cast into musical circles here by the English conductor and composer, Sir Landon Ronald, who declared publicly that not two per cent of London's concerts pay, and that because of the lack of progressive spirit among managers and artists, concert-giving, if not dead, is at least dying.

Sir Landon made these remarks in response to a toast offered him as president of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at the occasion of their annual dinner on April 3, and was immediately caught up in the press, notably by the veteran critic, Robin Legge, in the next few days' Telegraph.

"You have to accept one great fact as regards London," the conductor said, "and that is that nearly all concerts are a financial failure. There are fifty, sixty, or seventy concerts a week advertised. It is a serious matter when a man in my position can get up and say that out of all of those concerts not two per cent will pay anything like their expenses."

Admitting that such modern innovations as bridge-playing, motoring, cinemas, and wireless have in the past twenty-five years made serious inroads on the time of concert-going people, he continued: "At the same time, I have a very great fault to find with concert-givers. Let me tell you straight from the shoulder—concert-giving is moribund, and it behooves this great society to put its shoulder to the wheel.

Says Concerts Are Unprogressive

"The only thing that has seemed not to progress in the past thirty years is concerts. You have the same uncomfortable seats, the same barren and dingy halls, smoking is not allowed—why, I don't know—and you have almost the same programs that I used to hear as a little boy in the Crystal Palace or in later days in the Queen's Hall under Sir Henry Wood. There is an enormous lack of progress. It wants a man of some imagination, an impresario genius to come along.

"He would, in addition to giving people comfortable seats and permitting them to smoke, provide them with some attraction other than serious music. I cannot see any harm in a beautiful cinema, especially if good music could be provided for an hour in between the pictures. But as long as concerts stop at pianoforte solos and vocal recitals by students people have never heard of, they are never going to attract the public. An average recital costs anything between £40 and £60 to give in London, and the receipts will probably be £2 or £3."

Legge Refutes Assertions

Next day, Mr. Legge, in a leading article in his newspaper, denied that things were as bad as Sir Landon Ronald had painted them. Many concerts, he pointed out, were given—perhaps mistakenly—with no intention of making profits, but only to secure "reclame." These must be counted off, he said. As to the rest, those which "produced the goods" succeeded; the others did not and would not even were smoking permitted quite generally (it sometimes is even now), and movies provided between numbers.

Several managers of concert bureaus next gave their opinions. Frederick Williams was certain that twenty per cent of concerts given, including those whose only object was reclame, paid a profit. Lionel Powell, of the firm of Powell and Holt, Robert Newman, and L. G. Sharpe, all of whom are connected with "celebrity" concerts, insisted that big names and good music continued to draw.

The head of another well-known firm of concert-agents, whose name is not given, admitted that there was indeed a serious slump in the financial support given to concerts at present, but he too was sure that more than two per cent of them paid expenses.

Serious Music Hit

"The really serious music has been badly hit," he said, "for the New Rich do not care for serious music; they are not educated up to it, and the New Poor, who always supported concerts in the past, have not the money now to do it. One can only hope that higher education will bring people back again."

As against this unsatisfactory feature of the present situation, he continued, must be placed the fact that the working classes were now undoubtedly keener on music than they used to be, owing to the spread of education. It was always the cheaper seats which were filled at concerts, and the expensive seats, on which the concert-giver had to rely for expenses, were only sparsely occupied.

All these remarks have their importance for America. The greater and more evenly-distributed prosperity of the country, and the more general interest in and work for education make an opportunity for the artist there which England does not enjoy.

Newman Speaks of America

Perhaps this accounts for the more cheerful impression which Mr. Ernest Newman disclosed in an informal interview published in the Sunday Times on concert conditions across the Atlantic. He finds Americans "A great and very cordial people, who are genuinely fond of music, more interested in music than we [the English] are, and who, though they have not yet produced a first-rate composer, are certain to do so some day. [Among them] there is a great field for the performer; criticism is franker than ours, but there is every chance for a man to make good in music if he has anything in him."

"The orchestras are magnificent," he continued. "'Yes, they have their great endowments,' it will be said. The point to note is that people will go to hear the music, which we don't do here." Further, "The rich men take a pride in giving their money to cultural purposes. . . . Typical of the Americans is the desire to get hold of anything that Europe can give to help them;" the women's music clubs "in themselves offer a field to the performer with which there is nothing to compare here."

Opera Plans Completed

At last definite and detailed announcements for the season of grand opera at Covent Garden are at hand. Four weeks of German opera will commence, as planned, on the evening of May 18, to be followed by a series of Italian works which will carry on until July 10. Five performances a week only are scheduled; the theatre will be closed on Saturdays.

Revivals include Strauss' Elektra, for which a new mis-en-scene is being prepared, Lohengrin, Die Meistersinger, Fedora, Andrea Chenier, and Gioconda; perhaps the new Giordano Cena delle Beffe (The Jest) will be given.

Percy Pitt of the old Syndicate is to be musical director; the conductors include Sergio Failoni, formerly of La Scala, Bruno Walter, Robert Heger of Munich, and Antonio Votto.

New Singers Engaged

The principal new sopranos will be Maria Jeritza, Toti dal Monte, and Margaret Sheridan; others are Gertrude Kappel, Rosa Landwehr, Lotte Lehman, Frieda Leider, Delia Reinhardt, Elisabeth Schumann, and Eide Norena, all of whom were on last year's roster. The contraltos announced include Evelyn Arden, Edith Furmedge, Maria Olczewska, and Bella Paalen.

Among the men there are as tenors Dino Borgioli, Aroldo Lindi (an American), Franco lo Giudice, Hofer, Perron, Rudolf Ritter, Francis Russell (all these new to Covent Garden), Albert Reiss, Fritz Soot, and Luigi Cilla; baritones and basses Cotreuil, Murray Davey. Habich, Pompilio Malatesta, Richard Mayr, Schipper, Friederich Schorr, Octave Dua, Michele Sampieri, Badini, Enzo Martini, Liszt, Benvenuto Francini, and Bettoni.

Besides the quasi-novelties mentioned above, the repertory will include The Flying Dutchman, Tannhaeuser, Rosenkavalier. Tristan, and the Ring on the German side; on the Italian, for the present, Aida, Boheme, Tosca, Butterfly, Rigoletto, and Barbiere.

P. L.

Paul Klenau Conducts Delius' Mass of Life

London.

An important event in London was a performance of Frederick Delius' A Mass of Life, to words from Nietzsche's Zarathustra. The reputation of this composer is spreading apace in well-informed circles, and this concert, one of the Royal Philharmonic series under Paul Klenau, added much to its lustre. Said the Daily Telegraph: "Delius has harnessed new forces, not defied old ones. He never shocks us, yet his idiom is one of the most strikingly individual things of our time."

Mr. Newman, in the Times, though critical, was also commendatory: "We may say what we like about Delius' artistic faults and his technical weaknesses—his monotony of mood, his mannerisms of harmony, his sometimes haphazard writing; the fact remains that here is some of the very finest music of the last twenty-five years."

The performance was considered worthy of the work itself, especially as regarded the interpretation given by Mr. Klenau, and the playing of the Philharmonic Orchestra. There was less commendation for the soloists and the chorus.

P. L.

New Operas Heard in Cardiff

London. — The British National Opera Company has just completed a two weeks season in Cardiff. A special concert performance of Parsifal was given on Good Friday. The repertoire included Holst's new opera, At The Boar's Head, Gianni Schicchi, The Golden Cockerel, and Hugh the Drover, all of which were novelties here, as well as old favorites like Rigoletto, Il Trovatore, Faust, Cavalleria Rusticana, and Pagliacci.

Artists Give Free Concerts

London.—The Newport Corporation in South Wales has arranged for a series of free educational concerts by local amateurs at the Museum and Art Gallery.

IRENE WILLIAMS
SOPRANO
Available Concert, Oratorio, Recitals, After January, 1925
Brunswick Records Personal Address: 15 West 74th St., N. Y. C.

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: D. F. McSWEENEY
CHARLES L. WAGNER
511 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

EUROPEAN NEWS AND VIEWS

Berlin Volksoper Re-opens

Richard Strauss' Intermezzo Produced; Six Operatic Novelties Enliven Provincial Seasons.

Berlin.

The public of Berlin received a musical Easter egg in the form of a fourth opera company. It all came about in this way. Last fall it was proved definitely that the German capital, for all its population of four million persons, could not support four opera companies.

The weakest of them therefore succumbed. The manager of the Volksoper was unable to pay the rent of his theatre, and so the company was dispossessed. In its place the owner let out his house to a musical comedy company.

But man proposes and the god of musical companies disposes, it seems. Within three months the manager of the light opera company could no more handle his debts than could the Volksoper before him. The owner of the house showed him the door in turn, and opened it again to the opera company, whose personnel had remained together by force of hunger and instinct.

Something of the sort happened to a Paris manager about twenty years ago. This ingenious Parisian was asked whether the theatre was a place of art or of business. He answered promptly, "If the house is full, it's business; if it's empty, why then that's art."

Intermezzo Produced

Strauss' Intermezzo, produced by the State Opera a few months after its Dresden premiere was a success, with certain reservations. The reviewer of the Morgenpost liked it very much. He wrote, "The music has not only vivacity and color, but it has weight besides. It is delicate, infatuating, harmonious, and well formed, although at times Strauss' heart seems not to be exactly in the right place.

"Sometimes, when he is clever, it slips down to his wrist. Then suddenly when the plot of the work demands, the music begins to flow warm and pure. At such moments one realizes why one loves Strauss, and why one will continue to love him despite the many disappointments which he has caused in recent years.

"The performance at the State Opera was for the most part good. George Szell was the leader, and throughout the presentation he was master of his resources, although at times he did not seem to be congenial with the spirit of Intermezzo.

"Frau Hussa seemed made for the part of Christine. Her soprano voice, her dark personal charm, and the grace with which she carried her modern dress on the stage, put the audience well at ease. One cannot say as much for Scheidl, who sang the role of Storch, but at least it can be said that he sang well and meant well."

Strauss Called to Stage

Dr. Urban wrote in his review of Intermezzo only words of the highest praise for Strauss: "The Berlin premiere was a spontaneous success. Strauss was called before the curtain many times after each act, including the very first.

"The libretto is based on a personal experience of the composer, and in every lineament of his story and his score there is attested the great love which this composer bears the theatre. This was my third hearing of Intermezzo, and more than ever I carried away the impression that it is the work of a master. Every calculated effect comes off. There are no puny efforts, no ineffectualities, no abortionate strivings after ends which refuse to be reached.

"I should not attempt to say that Strauss is the culmination of music. The developments in music after him are of the utmost interest, and have their own importance. But within his own style he is surely supreme. He has the plastic art of expression. He has the great line of melody, and his themes instantly grasp the heart, and cling in the ear.

"One of the best illustrations of this melodiousness is the Cantilena in the first act. The toboggan scene, the blissfulness of the waltz at the peasant ball, and the great lyric music in the reconciliation scene are masterly."

A Dissenting Voice

In the Acht-Uhr Abendblatt Herr Pisling granted all the technical skill, in fact was inclined to enthuse about it, but the subject matter seemed to him inconsiderable. "Any consideration of a product of this pen," he wrote, "must begin with a deep bow before Strauss' musical mastery.

"How much cunning there is in the treatment of material in the score of Intermezzo! How much wisdom, there is, and with what security is every note put in its right place and is every mood flashed across the screen! But still one cannot get around the main question. The millstones of technique are still rushing about in the old Strauss speed, but they are giving out only scanty corn.

"Maria Hussa won her audience not only by her beautiful singing, but by the understanding and taste with which she played her role. George Szell deserves credit for the care with which he rehearsed the production and for the warmth with which he interpreted the music. Strauss was called to the stage to take his bow with the principals, and finally a thunder of cheers and applause of the kind which one rarely hears in the concert hall or opera house greeted him when he made his appearance before the curtain alone."

In any case although the cast was on the whole rather good, the Berlin performance could hardly be compared for splendor with that of the premiere in Dresden.

Novelties in the Provinces

In the provinces there have lately been six remarkable operatic novelties. Ottorino Respighi's Belfagor was well presented in Hamburg under the leadership of Werner Wolff. The opera is some years old, but this was its first Hamburg performance. Wolff-Ferrari's Gli Amanti Sposi, which some weeks ago was given in Italy for the first time, had its first German performance in Dresden under the leadership of Fritz Busch.

The revival of the 236 year old opera of Henry Purcell, Dido and Aeneas, in Dessau must be counted a failure. The reviewers for the most part considered this a painful evening.

On the other hand Handel's Heracles, revived lately in Muenster, seems to be as alive as ever. The work is musically at least the equal of the same composer's Caesar, and is certainly better as relates to the treatment of the chorus. Schulz-Dornburg, the director of the performance, won large part of the credit for its success.

W. Jacob, music chronicler of the Kolnischen Zeitung, wrote that the production of Heracles was in the spirit of a festival play. "The simplicity and greatness of its expression," he declared, "again strike rock bottom. The popular strength of Handel and the purity of his art were again apparent in this excellent performance."

Young Composer's Opera

The fifth noteworthy novelty was that of the opera Mira, the work of Kurt Overhoff, a composer whose years number about twenty-five. This premiere was given in Essen. The music is much dependent in its style on that of Richard Strauss, but it shows signs of an awakening individuality. Overhoff is not ready to conquer Germany immediately, but it is well within possibility that some day he will.

Prof. Krasselt, manager of the opera in Hanover, brought out an excellent work of Braunfels, his Don Gil. Klaus Pringsheim said of the composer, "Walter Braunfels, in his younger days an artist of moderate advancement, is today at forty dependent upon himself alone. He is not a speculative and extremely calculating musician, but at least he is spontaneously clever. One of his virtues is that he pays no attention whatsoever to such strong men as Stravinsky and Schoenberg, but goes along his own way.

"Among the early composers of this century he would be considered a modern, but he does not share the present-day desire to out-Wagner Wagner. He is a post-Wagnerian romantic, but he is trying to bring new life into Romantic opera by special cultivation of the cantabile-buffa style. Don Gil is perhaps nearer in its manner to Figaro than it is to Die Meistersinger.

Iril Gadescow Dances

Consideration of the recent important events in Berlin cannot be finished without mention of the dancer Iril Gadescow. He is known as the frequent protagonist in performances of Strauss' Joseph's Legend. He gave a recital here not long ago. The precision of his dancing, its grace and expressiveness, were certainly extraordinary. One was inclined to think, after watching him a while, that here is a man worthy to have ballets written especially for him to create.

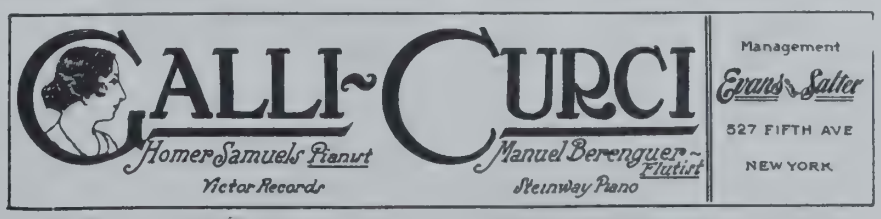
The concert chronicles are adorned with the names of artists of high rank recently returned from American tours. Among those who have lately appeared here in recital are Elena Gerhardt, Elly Ney, Arpad Sandor, Maria Ivogun, Sigrid Onegin, and others. A detailed account of some of these appearances will be sent shortly.

ARTHUR KURSCHNER.

New Works At Trier Festival

Trier.—A chorus of three hundred and an orchestra of one hundred from Coblenz, Saarbrucken and Trier are participating in the Middle-Rhenish music festival which is taking place here May 3-6. Under the direction of Heinrich Knapstein there will be performances of Bach's choral cantata, O Ewiges Feuer, Reger's One Hundredth Psalm, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Straesser's A major Symphony, and Brahms' First Symphony.

There will also be heard works by modern Rhenish composers which won prizes at the special contest preceding the festival, and chamber music by composers of the eighteenth century Mannheim school and contemporary composers.



CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

CLARENCE ADLER
PIANIST
Instruction for Advanced Pupils
137 West 86th St. New York
Telephone Schuyler 3580

GEORGE PERKINS RAYMOND
Tenor
CONCERT—RECITAL—ORATORIO
Exclusive management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG, 1425 Broadway, New York City

MARJORIE MEYER
SOPRANO
Management: Standard Booking Office, 17 East 42d St., New York

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

LAZAR S. SAMOILOFF, vocal teacher, left New York last month for California to take up his duties as director of the Master School of Musical Arts of California with headquarters in San Francisco and a branch in Los Angeles.

The Master School opened April 27 and will continue until August 29, during which period twelve artist teachers will be presented. Mr. Samoiloff stopped off in New Orleans, Dallas, and Fort Worth to deliver informal talks and to meet prospective students. After a few days in Los Angeles, he arrived in San Francisco where a large reception had been arranged in his honor. A number of prominent Eastern artists who were on concert tours in California were present, among them Mr. and Mrs. Tito Schipa, Mme. Helen Stanley, Mme. Charles Cahier, Rudolf Laubenthal, Alexander Kipnis, Alfred Hertz, director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and Gaetano Merola, director of the San Francisco Opera company were also present.

Miss Alice Seckels, manager of the Master School, has announced that all of Mr. Samoiloff's time has now been taken and no more pupils can be enrolled. Josef Lhevinne opens his classes May 11 and indications are that he will have a capacity class. Following him in two weeks will be Cesar Thomson, Sigismund Stojowski, Samuel Gardner, Felix Salmond, Andres de Segurola, Emil J. Polak and Annie Louise David. W. J. Henderson is to give a series of six lectures at the Master School beginning May 25.

The Bush Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Richard Czerwonky, has been engaged for two concerts at the convention of the Illinois Music Teachers' Association at Streator on May 22.

On May 28 Mr. Czerwonky will again conduct the orchestra in the final program of their Chicago series of concerts at Orchestra Hall.

Among the recent public students' recitals at the New York Institute of Musical Art were those given by Charles McBride, J. Henri Bove, Murella Cianci, Louis Kaufman, and Walter Edelstein.

A vocal concert by pupils of Mario Pagano was given in Aeolian Hall, New York, on April 30. The assisting artists were Julian Huarte, pianist, Daniel Scherer, violinist, and Mme. Boccarusso-Pesci, soprano.

Julia Remeltag, contralto and artist-pupil of Vittorio Trevisan, sang the roles of Lola and Maddelena in Cavalleria and Rigoletto with the San Carlo Opera Company in Detroit. She has been engaged for regular appearances next season.

A pupil of Ernest Hutcheson's, Muriel Kerr, thirteen years old, was well received in her appearance as soloist with the St. Louis Orchestra, Rudolf Ganz conductor, on its visit to New Orleans.

The Cincinnati Conservatory Summer School is getting into a well organized routine for an unusually active season. The College of Music will also offer summer master classes.

According to cables from Paris, Hallie Stiles, a pupil of Mme. Schoen-Rene, of New York, has been engaged to sing at the Opera-Comique following her debut there in La Boheme.

Arthur J. Hubbard, vocal teacher, will return to Los Angeles for his third summer season this year. Assisted by Vincent V. Hubbard, associate teacher, he will conduct classes there during July and August.

Camille Decreus, the director of the Fontainebleu School of Music, announces the following series of concerts to be given in the new concert hall of the palace this summer: Organ recital by Ch. M. Widor (inauguration of the new organ), concert by Gabriel Pierne, organ recital by Joseph Bonnet, concert by Paul Paray, concert by Marc Delmas, concert by Philippe Gaubert (conductor of the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory and of the Paris Opera), Saint-Saens program arranged by Isidore Phillip, concert by Paul Dukas, organ recital by Marcel Dupre, program of American compositions, piano recital by Robert Casadesus, vocal and violin concert by Gabriel Paulet and Simonne Hersaut, concert by Rhene Baton, organ recital by M. Jacob, vocal and piano concert by Hilda Roosevelt of the Paris Opera and Marie Darre, and a program of compositions by Gabriel Faure.

The Zeckwer-Hahn Musical Academy, Philadelphia, announces its fifty-fifth Jubilee Concert to be held at Witherspoon Hall on the evening of May 8. The concert will be given by the Students' Symphony Orchestra of seventy pieces, under the direction of Frederick Hahn, and will be assisted by John Quine, baritone; Harl McDonald, pianist; Leo Schulz, cellist. A feature of the program will be the presence of Professor Leopold Auer, Herbert Witherspoon, Leo Ornstein and other musicians as guests of the Academy.

Howard Hanson, Director of the Eastman School of Music, announces that the school will offer for next year several additional scholarships in its operatic department. An audition of candidates for these scholarships will be held in Aeolian Hall, New York City, on Monday, May 18, from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. Candidates for Eastman School of Music opera scholarships must be American citizens by birth or adoption, and must have studied sufficiently to make them capable of finished singing of operatic music. Each scholarship covers all tuition fees and provides a sum of money for living expenses.

Candidates successful in winning an Eastman School opera scholarship will have thorough training in a department directed by Eugene Goossens, English opera and symphony conductor, and will have opportunity when they show capacity warranting this, of appearing as members of opera casts in public performances.

The New York audition will be conducted by a committee from the Eastman School of Music, headed by Vladimir Rosing.

WILLEM WILLEKE

Who Will Conduct a Master Class in the Cello at South Mountain, Pittsfield, Mass., This Summer.

Yeatman Griffith has moved his New York vocal studios. Since May 1 he has been installed at 52 West Seventieth street.

The David Mannes Music School gave its second invitation concert of the season at Aeolian Hall, New York, April 23 with numbers from the string orchestra under Sandor Harmati and vocal and instrumental soloists. Part of the program was given over to original works by members of the school, Leopold Damrosch Mannes, Ernest Zechiel, Carl Bricken, and Max Helfmann.

Supervisors Hear Dunham on Music Appreciation Study

In his address before the last National Supervisors' Conference in Kansas City Franklin Dunham, educational director of the Aeolian Company, stressed the usefulness of music study in the junior high schools as a preparation for living, a necessary training for the human being's emotional life.

Mr. Dunham in his outline of a method for the teaching of music understanding and appreciation in the junior high schools laid particular emphasis on the acquirement by the students of a solid technical foundation for their appreciation. He disapproved of superficial methods of teaching which sacrificed real factual knowledge to an attempt to entertain the students at all costs by making their path too easy.

"Without a definite knowledge of the principles of design, notation, form, tempo as distinguished from rhythm, melody and phrasing, harmony and expression, dynamics and interpretation — without a distinct knowledge of the characteristics of program as against absolute music and a knowledge of how those same characteristics came to be, there can be no music understanding," he told the supervisors, and said further:

"Music understanding must necessarily consist of a knowledge of the form, the emotional and intellectual content, and the relative or development background which music composition possesses. The road to such an accomplishment is not easy. Courses in ear-training will be of value as prerequisties to Music Understanding. Courses in grade appreciation, based on musical experience—and that only—will be invaluable in the conduct of your work in junior music understanding."

Mr. Dunham then outlined a study course in music understanding, pointing out the necessity of defining musical principles and terms, and not avoiding them by too "popular" manners of speaking. The study of instruments and their musical literature, the importance of extensive bibliographies, and the proper grading of study through the various types of music until the classes are ready finally to handle symphonic music, were all touched upon by Mr. Dunham.

The first pupils' recital under Josef Borissoff, violinist, was held on April 4 at the Wurlitzer Auditorium. Mr. Borissoff accompanied his pupils. Among the students who appeared were Stephen Mero, Emanuel Vardi, Tobias Bloom, Blaeslaw Koproweki, Anna Krantz, Rose Carbonaro and Dwight Cameron.

At a later recital held in the same auditorium the students who appeared were Sam Mark, Horton Connell, Hazel Kniffin, Errington Kerr, Arthur Baecht, Ben Listengart, Duncan Stewart, Raschell Merrill, Cesar Algen and Berta Schultz.

DUDLEY BUCK Teacher of Singing
471 West End Avenue, New York City Telephone Endicott 7449
Member of the American Academy of Teachers of Singing

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
11-12 Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

WILLIAM FICHANDLER
PIANO INSTRUCTION
Technic—Interpretation—Teaching Methods
604 West 115th St.
New York City
Telephone: Cathedral 6854

PIETRO CIMINI
CONDUCTOR
Chicago Civic Opera Company
5TH YEAR
PERSONAL ADDRESS: CONGRESS HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILL.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephones: Circle 10117

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

BRAHMS' Five Secular Songs for Mixed Voices, a cappella, have been published by G. Ricordi and Co., New York, in one octavo sheaf. Written with thoughtful consideration for choral voices (in four, five and six parts), these choruses place greater demands upon conductor than upon choirs. Under a skillful baton they would make a gratefully received group.

The publication of Deems Taylor's Through the Looking Glass in miniature score (by J. Fischer and Bros., New York) serves but to remind that this orchestral suite is enjoying a popularity quite unique for an American score.

Mr. Taylor originally fancied his adventures in wonderland through the mirror of chamber music, and in this form the work was introduced to New York by the Carolyn Beebe Ensemble, February 18, 1921. Encouraged by its reception, Mr. Taylor revised the suite for symphony orchestra, and the premiere performance of the revision was given by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society in Brooklyn, March 10, 1923. It was repeated in New York the following day. Within two weeks of its premiere the score was in the hands of engravers for publication.

Altogether fourteen orchestras have given thirty-two performances of Through the Looking Glass in this country . . . a two year record unequalled by any other American score. The first performance of Mr. Taylor's suite outside of the United States will be given by Alfred Coates at the Leeds Festival next October . . . unless Ettore Panizza, who took the score with him to Italy, should schedule the work for earlier presentation.

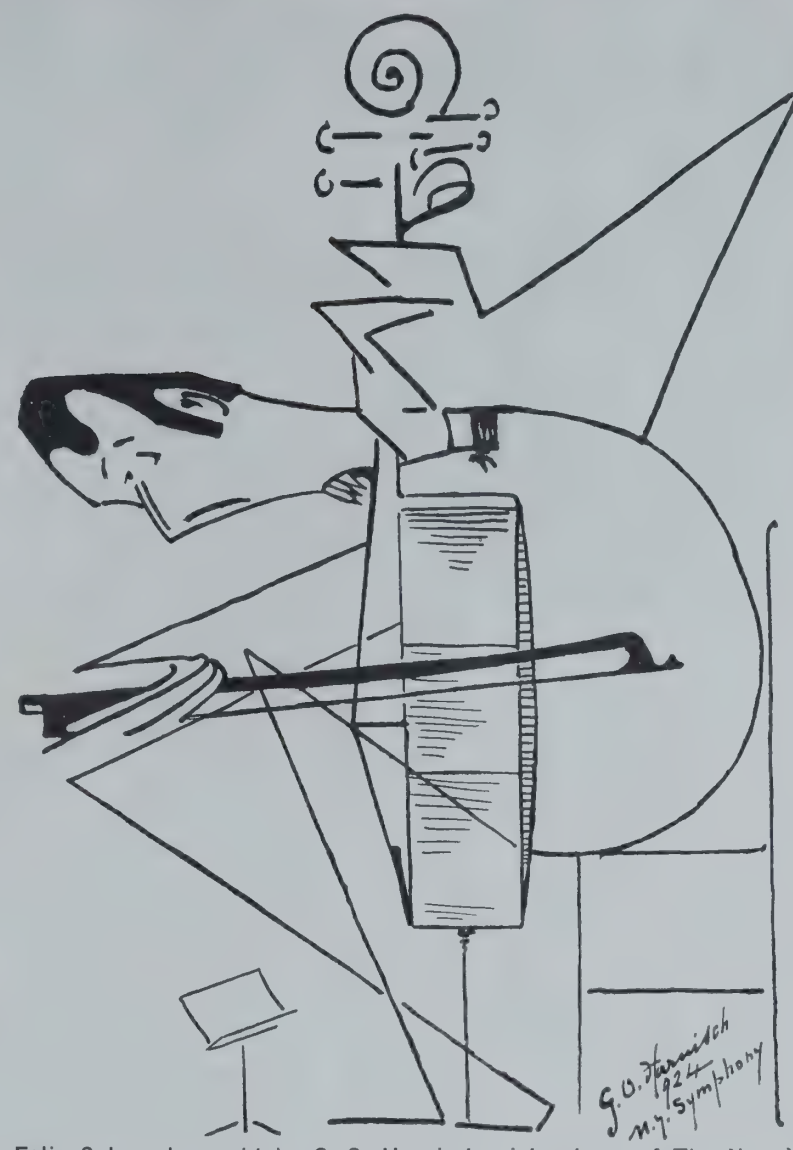
In addition to the miniature score, J. Fischer and Bros. have published an organ transcription of the first movement by Charles M. Courboin. Mr. Courboin has made a faithful and effective transcription which is not technically difficult, although an organ of concert proportions is required to give it adequate coloring.

From G. Schirmer, Inc., come three short songs for medium voice suitable for encores—The Shower by Camille Zeckwer, Once in a While by Henry E. Sachs, and Tonight by Harry J. Pomar. The first is declamatory and the other two lyrical. The accompaniments are simple, likewise the voice parts . . . but interesting.

Stanley T. Reiff's Festival Suite for Organ, dedicated to Charles Heinroth, has been published by Clayton F. Summy Co., Chicago, in four separate numbers—Prelude, Romanza, Scherzo and Toccata. All four lie comfortably beneath hands and feet. The Toccata is a serviceable piece for brilliance with minimum effort.

The Center for Modern Music

J. & W. CHESTER, LTD.
11 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET
LONDON, W. 1
Complete catalogues post free on application



Felix Salmond, caught by G. O. Harnisch, viola player of The New York Symphony Society, in the act of executing a cadenza on his cello.

Music of the Movies

Heading the music program at New York's Rialto Theatre this week is Liszt's Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody, played by the orchestra under Hugo Riesenfeld and Willy Stahl, with Lily Kovacs, soloist, at the piano. Franz Schubert, a film in the Master Music Series, is being shown with appropriate accompaniment of the orchestra. Miriam Lax, soprano, and August Werner, baritone, are singing Schubert selections.

The music program at the Rivoli continues as it has been for two weeks, with the repetition of Madame Sans-Gene. Litolff's Robespierre is the overture, and the Rivoli Ensemble is singing songs of the Napoleonic period.

A special program at the Capitol Theatre is marking Music Week there. Offenbach's Orpheus Overture is being conducted by David Mendoza, and various dance and song numbers are being given by Lottice Howell, coloratura soprano; Doris Niles, danseuse; the Capitol Female Quartet; Frank Moulan, the Male Ensemble, and others.

Miss Gordon Sings for Children

Dorothy Gordon gave a Children's Hour at the Princess Theatre, New York, April 26 of folk and period songs in costume. She sang groups of Breton, French, Spanish, German, and English folk songs as well as a classical group and one of modern American songs. Blanche Fleming was at the piano.

Zuro Conducts American Music

Two new works by American composers were played by the Sunday Symphonic Society on the afternoon of April 20 when Josiah Zuro conducted an invitation rehearsal in the Criterion Theatre. The compositions performed were a symphony by Dr. J. J. Schneider of Brooklyn, and a symphonic poem by Carl Beutel, head of the department of music of Greensboro College, North Carolina.

Both of these works were submitted by their composers to the American Composer's Contest which the Sunday Symphonic Society is conducting. So far, seven manuscripts have been played, publicly or privately. At the close of the season, a $100 prize will be awarded the most popular work.

The April Issue of Henry Prunieres'

La Revue Musicale

Is Dedicated to MAURICE RAVEL

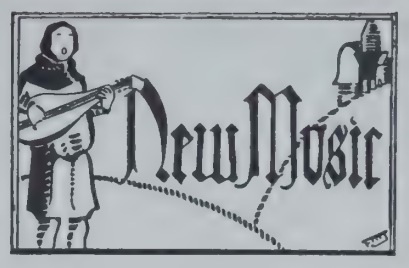
Studies by Andre Suares, Tristan Klingsor, Roland Manuel, Emile Vuillermoz, Alfredo Casella, Henri Gil-Marchex, Arthur Hoeree, Rene Chalupt, Andre Coeuroy.

Music Chronicle by Henry Prunieres. Bibliography—Raveliana.

A Portrait of Ravel by G. d'Espagnat and "dessins" by Favory, Friesz, Galamis.

Supplement: L'Enfant et les Sortileges by Ravel. (fragment).

Address: La Revue Musicale, 35-37 Rue Madame, Paris VI



MUSIC, by Sir W. H. Hadow, published by Henry Holt & Co., New York (No. 109 in the series of the Home University Library of Modern Knowledge).

It is said that the Home University Library editors prepared over 100 titles in many departments of human knowledge before they considered music at all. The story goes that Sir W. H. Hadow, the English music critic, remarked upon this neglect, and he was immediately offered the task of remedying it. The result was his book, Music.

The story may not be true, but it has an excellent climax in the book itself, which of its kind is unusually good.

The little volume is an outline of the development of music. It is a sketch which traces interpretatively, but not in great detail, the progress of music from the earliest recorded examples of the Greeks and Hebrews to the present time.

The book is very much like a Shaw preface. One feels that it ought to be read as an introduction, and then again it has at least equal interest and value as a summary. That is to say, Music may be recommended to the novice in music as an introductory sketch of the whole subject matter of music, and it may just as well be recommended to the connoisseur of music who already has studied the subject a great deal. For the latter it has not only the value of a review, but the interest of a special point of view on what he already knows.

The novice cannot stop his study with this quick summary, but his further research will be much the clearer for his experience with Music. Names and historical phenomena will more nearly have their just proportion in his mind.

Sigmund Spaeth and John Tasker Howard have compiled The Ampico in Music Study, which is issued by the Ampico Corporation, New York. This booklet is planned as a guide to teachers of the history and appreciation of music, with special directions regarding the use of the Ampico Piano in the demonstration of musical illustrations to their teaching.

All the records available for use on the Ampico are classified by Dr. Spaeth and Mr. Howard in groups, for example, of Forerunners of the Classic School, The Classic School, The Romantic School, and the like. There are lists also illustrating nationalistic tendencies in music, and representative of program and absolute music, and the dance, song, rondo, theme and variation, sonata, and free forms. Special educational recordings, such as those for ear training, and recordings of orchestral and operatic arrangements, and of accompaniments for voice and solo instruments are listed too.

Montani Directs Singing Clubs

The Glee and Choral Clubs of the College of New Rochelle, under the direction of Nicola Montani, gave a concert in Town Hall, New York, on April 26 for the building fund of the college. In the words of the Herald Tribune chronicler, "the young women presented a well trained ensemble, with satisfactory unity and ample volume and creditable quality of tone."

Percy Grainger Gives Room-Music Concert

Pianist-Conductor Appears in Intimate Program of His Own Compositions.

A program of "room-music" was offered by Percy Grainger in the Little Theatre, New York, on April 26. The evening was devoted to Mr. Grainger's own works.

He was assisted by Ernest Hutcheson and Ralph Leopold, pianists; twenty-four members of the Philharmonic Orchestra; and a mixed choir, under Frank Kasschau, composed of Marie Langdon Andrews and Mildred M. Ross, sopranos, Florence Frommett and Marian Adam, contraltos, Samuel E. Craig and George E. Bennett, tenors; John B. Hamilton and Charles Southwick, baritones, and Elmer Ross and Wallace Cannon, basses.

Mr. Grainger explained in his program notes that "room-music" is all music, whether for one, few or many instruments, and whether the parts are single or massed, that is intended for performance under really intimate conditions.

The Post writer asserted that Mr. Grainger "provided a splendid entertainment for all the music lovers who could crowd into the Little Theatre." According to the Herald Tribune, the music was, on the whole, disappointing, although "the performance itself, both by singers and instrumentalists, was highly commendable."

An English dance with Messrs. Hutcheson and Leopold at one piano and Mr. Grainger at another, opened the program. The performance was excellent in the opinion of most of the reviewers. Olin Downes of the Times observed that like most other performances of two pianos it sounded much like a mechanical instrument "despite the exceptional ability of the performers."

The next number was Hill Song No. 1 scored for various wind and string instruments, which received commendation. This was followed by a group of settings of Kipling's poems for mixed choir and occasional accompaniment of instruments; My Robin is to the Greenwood Tree Gone, for flute, English horn, and some strings; and a Scotch Strathspey and Reel, Inlaid with Several Scotch and Irish Tunes and a Sea Chanty, for four men's voices, xylophone, harmonium, two guitars, eight strings, and five wood winds. W. J. Henderson of the Sun found much that was praiseworthy in these compositions.

Martha Given in English

The Grand Opera Society of New York presented von Flotow's Martha in English at Wadleigh Auditorium Thursday evening. The orchestra of the Wadleigh Community Centre, George J. Wetzel conductor, assisted. This Society, which was founded six years ago by Zilpha Barnes Woods, musical director, is devoted to the principle of promoting grand opera in English and has given more than a hundred performances during its existence. The opera was given for the benefit of the Wadleigh Community Centre.

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
MARION DAVIES
in
"ZANDER THE GREAT"
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps

PERCY GRAINGER
Whose Two Sunday Evening Concerts of Room-Music in the Little Theatre Have Been an Interesting Feature of New York's Spring Music

Rosa Ponselle Is Heard in Special Atlanta Cavalleria

Atlanta, April 27.—The Metropolitan Opera Company closed its fifteenth season here Saturday night. La Tosca was the scheduled closing performance but, to give Atlantans an opportunity to hear Rosa Ponselle, who had been unable to appear previously because of illness, Cavalleria Rusticana was added to the evening's program. She was greeted with great enthusiasm and the season came to a brilliant close.

Together with Miss Ponselle in Cavalleria were Marion Telva, Henriette Wakefield, Millo Picco, and Armand Tokatyan. Gennaro Papi conducted this and Tosca, in which Florence Easton, Giovanni Martinelli, Antonio Scotti appeared, repeating their triumphs of the early part of the week. The production Saturday afternoon was Tales of Hoffmann, Louis Hasselmans conductor. Louise Hunter, Lucrezia Bori, Kathleen Howard, Henriette Wakefield, Edward Johnson, Giuseppe deLuca, George Meader, Lawrence Tibbett, Louis d'Angelo, Angelo Bada, Max Altglass, William Gustafson, and Millo Picco made up the lengthy cast. All three performances were heartily applauded by public and press.

Feodor Chaliapin sang Mefistofele in Boito's opera of that name on Friday evening and was greeted warmly. Others in the cast were Frances Alda, Frances Peralta, Marion Telva, and Giacomo Lauri-Volpi. Tullio Serafin, the conductor, shared the general commendation with the cast. The Thursday opera was Lohengrin with Elisabeth Rethberg, Julia Claussen, Michael Bohnen, Curt Taucher, Clarence Whitehill, and Lawrence Tibbett. Giuseppe Bamboschek conducted.

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
"THE NIGHT CLUB"
with
RAYMOND GRIFFITH
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
GLORIA SWANSON in
'Madame Sans Gene'
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

Lines o' News AND Chatter

Says Charlie Wagner, anent Will Rogers and the de Reszke Singers: "We're not going to play Debussy, but we'll play Des Moines." Copyright 1925 by C. L. W., all rights (and rewrites) reserved.

* * *

There are so many queens of the May that available space is not sufficient to print their names.

* * *

Meanwhile Mrs. H. E. Talbott's Westminster Choir is continuing its productive pathway.

* * *

Some of Atlanta's frubjous music critics wrote of Antonio Scotti: "That tenor old friend of ours," and, concerning Queena Mario, "the lovely mezzo-soprano of Queena Mario."

* * *

Those bits of pleasantries may have been responsible for prompting a Cleveland newspaper music reviewer to observe: "Rosa Ponselle, the silver-throated coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company." Which would appear to indicate that the longer we live the more we find out.

* * *

She sailed away, some years after her wedding day (did Mrs. John McCormack, with Cyril and Gwennie) for the other side. That was last Saturday. Next Saturday the tenor himself will depart from these shores, to rejoin his family and spend with them a summer's vacation.

* * *

On the same day, last Saturday, Vladimir Shavitch headed eastwards for Paris, where he is shortly to conduct the Lamoureux Orchestra at the Salle Gaveau. Mr. Shavitch has made good emphatically with the Syracuse Orchestra, which, next season, is to go forward under conditions more propitious than ever for its future.

* * *

'Twas rather a large bit of the operatic apple which Cleveland recently essayed. Next time perhaps the eyes will not be larger than the stomach.

* * *

Rudolph Ganz is in New York, and before he sails this week for Europe he will be busy with affairs concerning his own St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, and those touching on his guest conductorship next July at the Stadium.

* * *

Which brings to the fore that Fritz Reiner, who also will be a guest leader at the Stadium, is to hold a daily series of morning auditions, beginning today in Carnegie Hall, for first and second violin candidates for the Cincinnati Symphony, and for viola, double-bass, and oboe players. These places are open to members of the musicians' union.

* * *

A mighty fine soprano sends Lines-o'-Newser a bit of information about her bobbed hair. Can you guess who she is? We'll give this much of a hint: The artiste was the first bobbed haired soprano to appear on a certain concert course in the Sunny South.

* * *

Dr. Sigmund Spaeth's song, Jobberwocky, sung a few evenings in the New York Metropolitan Opera House by some excellent voiced collegians, is a clever composition—characteristic of its composer.

* * *

From the far West comes word of the success Marie Tiffany is having as soloist with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Marie usually meets with success wherever she sings.

* * *

Dr. Howells and Rhys Morgan, the tenor, stopped for a few days last week in New York, just before that young tenor started south to fill a series of engagements.

* * *

Following a dinner given last Thursday by the directors of the American Institute of Operatic Art came a crescendo of activities preceding perparations for launching things this summer up at Stony Point-on-the-Hudson. Life memberships are beginning to roll into the offices of the Operatic Foundation in the Fisk Building, New York.

* * *

What ho! Having nothing at all to do, Arthur Judson has accepted the invitation tendered him by the house of Steinway to manage the new small Steinway Hall auditorium. Incidentally, along about the first of June the offices of Concert Management Arthur Judson, the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and the Stadium Concerts will be housed in that stunning Steinway edifice, which is nearly ready for occupancy.

* * *

Said Mrs. Robert Simon to friend husband, who is publicity director of the Judson forces: "I see you are going out to the ball game to take your accustomed weekly exercise." Which accounts for Bob's steady gain in avoirdupois.

* * *

Have you a summer master-class? Nearly everyone we know has one.

* * *

We heard Horace Britt play the cello the other evening and were again impressed. A distinguished artist whose services are in ever increasing demand.

* * *

Now then Willie Walter, welcome back to the East, to Philadelphia and to the Curtis Institute of Music. And good luck to Bre'r Porter, who succeeds to Walter's former position as manager of the Detroit Symphony.

* * *

Bernard R. Laberge, of the Bogue-Laberge Concert Management, is sailing for Europe tomorrow on the French line to look over the prospects for next year. He has just recently returned from a nine weeks' booking tour in the West in the interest of his most recent importations of French artists.

* * *

The Musical Digest has received cheerful reports from Miguel Fleta via cablegram. The news, which comes from Oporto, is that Miguel has just signed a contract for a series of forty appearances South of the Pyrenees under the management of Senor Casali, Madrid impresario. The contract calls for a fee of some 500,000 pesetas, or about $90,000.

Recently Fleta has given two recitals in Jerez, Spain, and now he is singing for the first time with the Oporto opera. On April 27 he appeared in Rigoletto, and three days later sang in Aida.

* * *

Five solosists—Nina Morgana, Ignace Hilsberg, Zlatko Balokovic, Mischa-Leon, and Julia Hudak—together with the United Norwegian Singers, were the artists in the "international concert" at Town Hall on Wednesday evening.

MUD

Impartiality
Fairness
The Facts

The Musical Digest

The Late
André Caplet
See Page 5

VOL. VII. NO. 30 (Published Weekly) NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MAY 12, 1925 (Copyright, 1925, by MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.) 15 CENTS A COPY

Opera and Concert Schedule Announced For New York's Parks

Bands and Symphony Orchestras to Replace Goldman on Mall; Three Free Operas.

HYLAN IS DEFENDED

Ignoring the 325,000 signatures on the petition to allow the Goldman Band Concerts to continue on the Mall in Central Park this summer, Mayor Hylan recently announced the city's program of free summer park music. The Goldman Band is not included on the schedule issued from the Mayor's office.

In addition to the production of Aida on August 1, Pagliacci and Cavalleria Rusticana on August 5, and Faust on August 8, conducted by Josiah Zuro, at Ebbets' Field, the musical program is as follows:

Five evening concerts a week for fifteen weeks will take place in Central Park with some incidental afternoon performances. The bands that will participate are the Seventh, Twenty-second, Twenty-third and Seventy-first Regiment Bands, under Walter Rogers, Thomas Shannon, Gustave d'Aquin, Lieut. Fred Simpson, Joseph F. Meduna, Patrick Conway, Frank Martin, Dr. G. E. Conterno, Paul E. Clifford, and Amedeo Passeri.

The symphony performances will be given by the New York Symphony Orchestra and the Waldorf-Astoria Orchestra, under Franz Kaltenborn, Dr. Hugo Riesenfeld, Maximilian Pilzer, and Josiah Zuro. There will be vocal concerts by the Associated Glee Clubs, the Oratorio Society of New York and the People's Chorus of New York.

In Carl Schurz Park and Mount Morris Park there will be weekly band concerts, and evening concerts at the same interval are scheduled for De Voe, Poe, and St. Mary's parks. Pelham Bay and Van Cortlandt will have concerts on alternate Sundays. Two evenings and Sunday afternoon will be the concert periods at Prospect Park, and Brooklyn's Ebbets' Field will be the scene of the free opera performances. Weekly band concerts are in the Mayor's plans for smaller parks in Brooklyn, Queens, and Staten Island.

At the meeting of the Park Board and the Mayor's Committee on Free Music, a resolution was adopted endorsing the action taken by the Mayor and Chamberlain Berolzheimer against the Guggenheim concerts following the refusal of the Guggenheims to call them "Mayor Hylan's People's Concerts." Mr. Berolzheimer denied that the city had rejected the Goldman concerts and asserted that the Guggenheims refused to give the concerts this year because they were not allowed to monopolize the Mall. William B. Rouston, representing the Guggenheims, and the Citizens' Committee, flatly denied this.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto, in nearly her fiftieth season before the public next year will appear in German roles with the Metropolitan Opera Company, besides her regular concert engagements.

Bulletins of News

Berlin, May 9.—Beniamino Gigli was enthusiastically received at the Staatsoper last night in Martha. He was compelled to repeat the Romance in the third act. Gigli will sing here the leading tenor roles in Traviata, Boheme, Rigoletto, and Tosca.

Although his scheduled concert was declared postponed on account of illness, a second announcement to the public declared that Feodor Chaliapin would keep his engagement to sing in his last New York recital at the Metropolitan Opera House Sunday evening. He appeared before a capacity audience for the benefit of the Ort Reconstruction fund, and according to reviews he was at his best.

Rochester, May 8.—The Metropolitan Opera Company closed its tour and its entire season here last night with a performance of Boris Godunoff in the Eastman Theatre. The house was packed, as it was the evening previously when the company gave the first of its annual Rochester performances, presenting Falstaff. The cast of Falstaff included Lucrezia Bori, Queena Mario, Marion Telva, Kathleen Howard, Antonio Scotti, Armand Tokatyan, Adamo Didur and Lawrence Tibbett. Mr. Serafin conducted.

Feodor Chaliapin sang the name part in Boris, and Jeanne Gordon, Louise Hunter, Ellen Dalossy, Jose Mardones, Ralph Errolle, and George Meader also appeared. Gennaro Papi was the conductor.

It is announced that the Metropolitan Opera Company will again visit Cleveland next year, appearing in the Auditorium from April 26 to May 5 in ten performances. Although The Musical Digest has at hand information regarding the deficit incurred this year in Cleveland by the visit of the Metropolitan, it is not considered necessary to publish it.

The end of the season of the Metropolitan Opera augmented last week the lists of music artists sailing for Europe. Among those who departed were Mr. and Mrs. John McCormack, with their daughter Gwen, Jascha Heifetz, Tullio Serafin, Giovanni Martinelli, Sophie Braslau, Lucrezia Bori, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi, Giuseppe de Luca, Jose Mardones, Michael Bohnen, Gennaro Papi, Rudolph Ganz, Jean Bedetti, and Kathleen Howard.

May Music Festival Season Begins With Concerts in Many Cities

Cincinnati Ends Week of Varied Programs; Springfield Hears Spring Music.

STRIKE IN NEWARK

The season of May Festivals opened last week with musical events of importance in several cities. Cincinnati, Springfield (Mass.), Spartanburg, and Newark held their Festivals during the past week.

Cincinnati, May 10.—The twenty-sixth biennial May Festival came to an impressive end last night with a Wagner concert in Music Hall. Long excerpts from Tannhaeuser, Parsifal, and Meistersinger were sung by Florence Austral, Mrs. Elizabeth Durland Langhorst, Mme. Nevada van der Veer, Edward Johnson, Robert Maitland, Fred Patton, Dan Beddoe, and Richard A. Fluke. Franz van der Stucken, director of the Festival, was the conductor.

The singing (which was in English) of both the soloists and the chorus received high commendation from the reviewers. Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times (writing for the Enquirer), commented on the brilliance of the soloists, and the "admirable achievements of the chorus." Miss Austral, in his opinion, "again displayed a voice of range and quality which in future seasons should put her in the very front ranks of concert singers." Her reception was enthusiastic.

At the afternoon concert, Alfred Hartzel, chorus master and assistant director of the Festival, conducted a chorus of 800 school children in a children's cantata, Young America, by Lodewyk Mortelmans and adapted by Mr. van der Stucken. Mr. Downes thought it one of the most "thrilling" moments of the week. Mme. Louise Homer was the soloist and her work was praised by the chroniclers. In addition to Dvorak's Husitka Overture, the orchestral numbers consisted of Edgar Stillman Kelley's The Pit and The Pendulum, conducted by the composer.

Pierne's St. Francis of Assisi was sung here for the first time at the concert Friday evening. The soloists were Ethyl Hayden, Mme. van der Veer, Edward Johnson, Dan Beddoe, Robert Maitland, Fred Patton, and Robert Thumann.

The third concert (Thursday evening) was marked by the American debut of Florence Austral, Australian dramatic soprano. Other features of the evening were the performance of Brahms' Requiem under Mr. van der Stucken's baton and the performance of Frederick Stock's Symphonic Variations under the leadership of the composer. Howard Hafford, tenor, was also heard in solos.

Olin Downes reported that Miss Austral has a voice "of exceptional range, of firm and rich texture, well placed and under good control" and he commended "not only the beauty of her voice but the feeling and sincerity of her performance."

On Wednesday the offering was

(Continued on page 20)

Repeat Recitals Fill Boston Halls

McCormack and Chaliapin Make Final Appearances; Whiteman's Orchestra and Apollo Club.

Boston, May 6.—John McCormack and Feodor Chaliapin were heard in recital here last week by audiences equalling in size and enthusiasm those at their previous appearances this season. Mr. McCormack, assisted by Lauri Kennedy, cellist, Edwin Schneider, pianist, and John P. Marshall, organist, sang a request program in Symphony Hall Thursday evening and Mr. Chaliapin's concert took place in Symphony Hall on Sunday. He had the assistance of Max Rabinowitch, accompanist, and Abraham L. Sopkin, violinist.

A recital of folk songs was given in costume by Elizabeth Eddy Parker Sunday at the Copley Plaza. Her performance included dancing, miming, and singing. According to the Transcript, her voice has "pleasing quality" and her acting and costumes were altogether praiseworthy. Evelyn Gerstein (Herald) wrote that Miss Parker "has a pretty manner, a graceful carriage, and a gentle and childish voice of slight carrying quality" but that she lacks the "intense and dramatic imagination that alone makes these entertainments eloquent."

Willard Erhardt, tenor, was heard in a recital of songs at Steinert Hall a week ago Tuesday with Harris Shaw as accompanist. According to the reviewer of the Transcript, Mr. Erhardt sings "to best advantage when his tones remain quiet and unforced, veiled rather than overly harsh in a stiffness that can quickly transform itself into a nasality." This writer thought that some of the shadings of his voice "translucent and full of shimmering lightness."

* * *

Paul Whiteman and his band were heard here for the third time this season on Saturday in Symphony Hall. As on former occasions, the audience which applauded them was large and cordial and the reviewers lauded the originality and virtuosity of the orchestra. Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue and Leo Sowerby's Synconata were on the program. To quote the Monitor, the Sowerby number "shows fine feeling for musical form, genuine inspiration and an innate understanding of the intricacies of modern instrumentation."

* * *

The Boston Chamber Music Trio, consisting of Barbara Werner, violinist, Marion Moorhouse, cellist, and Persis Cox, pianist, gave its first recital at the Copley-Plaza last week. On the program were Mozart's G major Trio and a new work by John Ireland, Phantasie Trio in A minor. Between these, Miss Cox played a group of piano pieces with "her usual deftness of touch" (Monitor). The Mozart Trio, to further quote this paper, received "an excellent performance, careful, painstaking, yet withal spontaneous." The new Phantasie seemed to this writer to be "a well written work, with good material, emotional and possessing sympathetic treatment of the strings, the cello being made to sound weirdly and fantastic, while the violin traced a mood of whimsy."

The Apollo Club gave its final concert of the season in Jordan Hall a week ago Tuesday. The chorus, under Emil Mollenhauer, sang its numbers "admirably," wrote the Transcript chronicler. The assisting artists were Doris Emerson, Frank Luker, Rupert Sircom, Charles E. Boyd, and Louis A. Hanscom.

* * *

A novel and interesting program, in the opinion of the reviewers, was offered by Susan Williams at her piano recital in Jordan Hall on April 23. To quote the Transcript, "she has variety and sureness of touch; her ear is sensitive to quality and measure of tone" and "there is no doubting her musical perception and instinct; her sense of the piano as a musical instrument."

According to the Herald, Miss Williams plays with "singularly" beautiful tone; "makes her scale run with exquisite evenness; she lets her melodies sing; she accompanies them with unusual skill and discretion." This writer thought that if she could add "a broader variety of tonal color, a wider scale of dynamics, a stronger rhythmic urge" to the "charming delicacy and refinement" of her playing, it would add interest to her work. Stuart Mason observed that she is undoubtedly musical and plays with taste, refinement, dexterity, and moments of "felicitous" interpretation. However, he thought her playing lacking in brilliance.

* * *

Another pianist, Agnes Hope Pillsbury, played in the same hall the preceding night. To quote the Transcript, her playing "inclines toward largeness and virility—desirable virility, not mere mannishness. There are solidity of tone, breadth of conception. There is ample technique." Philip Hale commented that "she has facility, her rapid passages are clear when she does not abuse the damper pedal; she has more than sufficient strength." She has more than ordinary technical command, wrote Mr. Mason, "and an unusually clear understanding of its application to the interpretative side of the art."

Bellucci Produces La Forza

John Bellucci has announced for performance tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Verdi's La Forza del Destino, with Caterina Gobbi as Leonora. The Don Alvaro is Gaetano Tommasini; the Don Carlos, Mario Basiola; the Abbot, Giovanni Martino. Antonio dell' Orefice will conduct the orchestra, and a ballet will be presented.

New York Heard Over 1,000 Music Events in 1924-1925

OVER 1,000 formal musical performances of the concert hall type were given in New York during the past season, according to records compiled by F. D. Perkins, assistant reviewer of the Herald Tribune. The exact number of these performances up to the end of last week, exclusive of many free and private recitals, hotel concerts and other programs of less public interest, was 1,124 as compared with 1,193 for last season, say Mr. Perkins' figures.

There were 191 song recitals, an increase of nine over 1923-1924; 154 piano recitals, an increase of twenty-three, and seventy-eight violin recitals, a decrease of thirty-four. Small orchestras and bands gave twenty-five concerts; chamber ensembles gave forty-four; choruses gave twenty-six; dancers, forty-eight (as against 121 the previous season); other instrumentalists, twelve; lecture-recitalists, ten, and joint recitalists, twenty-five.

There were also 220 performances of symphony orchestras, 176 of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and forty-five of other companies. There were meantime about seventy performances of various kinds in Brooklyn.

Negro Singers Refuse to Appear

Washington, D. C., May 5.—Because they asserted that their race had been discriminated against, a group of negro singers refused to appear as scheduled in a program of American music last night before the delegates attending the quinquennial convention of the International Council of Women. The negro music was to share with Indian music a program demonstrating the development of native American music. The singers protested because negro members of the audience of the concert had been segregated from the whites.

Koussevitzky Ends His First Boston Season

Symphony Finishes Twenty-fourth Year; Fortieth Season of Pops Begun.

Boston, May 5.—The twenty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to a close last Friday when Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program consisting of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in G major and Adagio from the Toccata in C major, Scriabin's Prometheus, Debussy's Clouds and Fetes and Borodin's Prince Igor Dances. The Cecilia Society and Alexander Lang Steinert assisted.

Stuart Mason wrote in the Christian Science Monitor that, as a whole, Mr. Koussevitzky's first season with the orchestra has been marked by "interesting and admirably contrasted" programs. The conductor's dynamic temperament was commented on by Warren Storey Smith of the Post, who added that, in his hands, no piece could be wholly dull because of his catholic musical taste and wide emotional range. Similar tributes were paid the Russian conductor by other reviewers.

* * *

The fortieth season of "pops" opened in Symphony Hall last night, with Agide Jacchia at the conductor's desk. On the program were Rimsky-Korsakoff's Flight of the Bumble-Bee; a Fantasia on Giordano's Fedora, in which an incidental piano solo was played by Mr. Sanroma; the William Tell Overture; Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture, and other favorites.

Mr. Jacchia, to quote Stuart Mason, "is again the serious musician he has always shown himself to be in the past." According to the Globe, the conductor "gave to every number a passionate and fiery reading, with wide swings of tone shading and tremendous fortissimo effects." In the words of the Herald chronicler, these concerts "clearly fill a need, and they fill it remarkably well."

JOHN DOANE
Coach, Accompanist,
TEACHER OF ORGAN
7 East 44th Street, New York
Telephone: Murray Hill 8834

JOSIAH ZURO
DIRECTOR
Zuro Grand Opera Company
Will accept a limited number of pupils
744 Seventh Ave. New York
Phone Circle 0100

GEORGE E. SHEA
Member American Academy of
Teachers of Singing
Also Opera Stage Routine
545 West 111th St., New York City
Telephone Cathedral 6149

RATA PRESENT
Pianiste of Re-Engagements
Management of Rata Present: Hotel Ansonia, New York City
AMPICO RECORDS

CARYL BENSEL
SOPRANO
"Voice has warmth, tones are round, finely musical and edgeless."—Newark Evening News.
"Voice is elastic and beautiful."—N. Y. Telegraph.
"Voice of wide range and lovely quality—thorough musicianship displayed."—Richmond News Leader.
Management MOLLIE CROUCHER
1425 Broadway, New York

MARIO CHAMLEE
TENOR
Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau
Fisk Building, 57th St. and Broadway, N. Y.
Brunswick Records

ELSA ALSEN
Famous Wagnerian Dramatic Soprano
Exclusive Management: ANNIE FRIEDBERG 1425 Broadway, New York City

VIRGINIA CARRINGTON THOMAS MUS. BAC. A. A. G. O.
AMERICAN ORGANIST AND COMPOSER
RECITALS ADDRESS: 516 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

Second Spring Festival on Coast

Helen Stanley, Mme. Cahier, Laubenthal, and Kipnis Soloists in Requiem and in Wagner Program.

San Francisco, April 23.—The second Spring Musical Festival opened here Saturday night with a performance of Verdi's Manzoni Requiem, Alfred Hertz conducting. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano; Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto; Rudolph Laubenthal, tenor, and Alexander Kipnis, baritone, were the soloists.

In the Daily Herald, William Foster Elliot wrote that "the great chorus was the stellar performer of the occasion." Mr. Elliot, however, also lauded the soloists and termed Mr. Laubenthal a "discovery." The tenor displayed "a warm yet brilliant voice of exceptional clarity" and invested the music with "a potent emotional appeal and richness of color. His phrasing is admirable, his musical intelligence unfailing." Other soloists exhibited "unusual gifts," said Mr. Elliot further.

An all-Wagner program was the feature of the second concert on Tuesday evening. The San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Hertz, opened the program with the Tannhaeuser Overture. There were also Lohengrin's narrative, excerpts from Walkeure, and two songs, Traume and Schmerzen. The latter were sung by Mme. Cahier "with artistry and with emotional conviction" (Ray C. B. Brown in the Chronicle). Equal enthusiasm was manifested by other chroniclers. Mme. Stanley, wrote Redfern Mason in the Examiner, eclipsed in quality her singing in the Requiem. Mr. Brown thought Mr. Laubenthal "one of the best Wagnerian tenors" heard here, and Mr. Mason commended his "rare vocal eloquence." Mr. Elliot wrote that the tenor "has an ideal equipment" for such music, including "voice, feeling, dramatic understanding, musicianship." He added that Mr. Laubenthal's tone is virile, "yet of great warmth and beauty," and that he has "unusual power and perfect assurance." Mr. Kipnis, according to this writer, sang "with splendid voice and dramatic emphasis," and Mr. Mason reported that he sang with a "depth of feeling that captured every heart."

Mr. Hertz, the orchestra, and the chorus again were highly commended.

* * *

The annual concert of the London String Quartet was greeted by a large and cordial audience. Mr. Brown wrote of these artists: "They balance their dynamics with so fine an adjustment, blend their tones with so sensitive a feeling for color shades and collaborate with so keen a sense of expressive nuance that the result is a constant satisfaction to the discriminating ear." Similar praise was found in other reviews.

* * *

Reinald Werrenrath's concert in Scottish Rite Hall was applauded vociferously by an unusually large audience. "In excellent voice, he revealed in both the new things and the old favorites a depth of understanding and a knowledge of tonal value that would be hard to excel." Charles Woodman of the Call thought he suffered from a cold at first, although his voice became more natural as the program progressed. Mr. Mason wrote in laudatory vein.

* * *

A concert was given here Sunday by Tito Schipa, accompanied by Jose Echaniz. Redfern Mason observed that the traditional Italian art of song, in Schipa, "is about as perfect a thing as humanity knows." Accordting to Mr. Brown, he "was in fine voice and sang with every resource of his finely developed artistry." The other reviewers echoed this praise, and Mr. Echaniz was praised both as accompanist and individual artist.

* * *

The last concert this season of the San Francisco Chamber Music Society had Germaine Schnitzer as assisting artist. In Mr. Mason's words, "she is a rare spirit, an exquisite artist." Mr. Elliot said her playing in the Mozart number was conspicuous "for its delicacy and precision of touch and sensitiveness to musical values." According to Mr. Brown, "delicacy of touch, and beauty of subdued tone, plastic firmness and airiness of outline were combined in her reading."

This writer continued that Louis Persinger's "refinement of style and sweetness of tone fell naturally into the Mozart idiom." He was praised by other writers, and Mr. Elliot concluded that in the Saint-Saens Quartet the society "was rather above its usual form."

Judson Moves Offices

The offices of Concert Management Arthur Judson and the New York Philharmonic Society will be moved to the new Steinway Building on West Fifty-seventh street as a result of a lease closed last week for space on the fifteenth floor of that building.

The Steinway Company will move up from its old Fourteenth street quarters about the same time. The new building will open with a large list of tenants, many of them musicians and musical organizations, such as the American Orchestral Society, the Studio Guild, the National Music League of America, the American Musical Guild, the Oratorio Society of New York, Boosey & Company, and Harold Flammer, Inc.

Photo by Cornwell

MRS. H. E. TALBOTT

THREE prizes amounting to $500 for American choral compositions are being offered by Mrs. H. E. Talbott, chairman of the board of the Westminster Choir Association of Dayton, Ohio, and foremost among the supporters of the Dayton Westminster Choir. The works submitted must be sacred in character, and arranged for a chorus of mixed voices. The competition is open to all American-born composers. The names of the members of the board of judges will soon be announced.

Mrs. Talbott and John Finley Williamson, conductor of the choir, are desirous of adding to its repertory a number of worthy American compositions. The prizes, which are considered to represent bonuses for the exclusive use of the compositions chosen for one year after the award is made, are respectively $300, $150 and $50.

The compositions will remain the property of the composers, who may have them published for general use after the expiration of the year. Choice of subject (except that it must be suitable for a Protestant choir), words, form of composition, employment or non-employment of solos, are all left to the composers' choice. The contest will close May 1, 1926, and manuscripts must be sent before that date to Mrs. Talbott, Callahan Bank Building, Dayton, Ohio.

GRADOVA
"One by one the young pianists smoke and smoulder past. Then, at last — say in Gradova—DARTS THE FLAME."—H. T. Parker, Boston Transcript.
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Bldg., New York
Steinway Piano Duo-Art Rolls

WINIFRED BYRD
America's Pianist
"Miss Byrd is that rara avis among American pianists of her generation — a personality. Her playing was of superlative quality and deserves ever wider recognition."—New York Tribune.
Season 1925-26 Now Booking
Management: MARIE GOULED
25 West 42nd St. New York City

ROSA PONSELLE
Exclusive Management
NATIONAL CONCERTS, INC.
1451 Broadway—New York City
Victor Records Knabe Piano

JOHN McCORMACK
EDWIN SCHNEIDER, Accompanist
MANAGEMENT: D. F. McSWEENEY
CHARLES L. WAGNER
511 Fifth Avenue, New York STEINWAY PIANO

The Boice Studio
THE ART OF SINGING
SUSAN S. BOICE, Soprano
57 West 75th Street New York City
Phone: Trafalgar 1057

Elena GERHARDT
Management: GEORGE ENGLES—Aeolian Hall, New York City
STEINWAY PIANO

EDOARDO PETRI
Master of Arts Columbia University
TEACHER OF SINGING
Studio: 1425 Broadway
Phone Pennsylvania 2628

FLORENCE MACBETH
Leading Coloratura Soprano
Chicago Civic Opera Company

The Musical Digest

Printed in U. S. A.

First to Last—The Facts. News—Editorials—Advertisements.

TUESDAY, MAY 12, 1925. VOL. VII. NO. 30

Owned and Published Weekly by

MUSICAL DIGEST, Inc.

243 West 39th Street, New York, N. Y. Phone Longacre 3257

Pierre V. R. Key, Editor

Walter E. Koons, Executive Editor Alexander Fried, Managing Editor

Entered as second class matter Aug. 31, 1921, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879

Subscription $5.00 a Year, U. S.; Canada, $6.00; Foreign Countries, $7.00

Subscriptions will be continued on expiration unless there is notice to the contrary

Bruno Zirato, Business Manager

The Musical Digest will seek unswervingly to serve only the best interests of music. It will build up; it will support steadfastly musical progress and just reform; it is pledged to the cause of whatever is musically meritorious in both composition and interpretation, regardless of nationality; it will stand firm for justice; it will belong to no musical "party" or "movement," but remain independent.

The Hard Road of Music

Statistics covering the number of singers, pianists, violinists, and cellists who gave recitals in New York during the 1924-25 season place the total at a round five hundred.

An analysis of those musicians discloses a minimum of exceptional ability amongst them. How many merit being designated "great artists" it is difficult to state. That, after all, may sometimes be a matter of opinion. But it is indisputably true that few of the singers heard in New York in recital stand upon supreme heights. The violinistic and pianistic fraternities reveal a more commendable standard, as does that to which our solo cellists belong.

What must sadden the expert listener is the struggle excellent interpretative musicians undergo; men and women who play an instrument or sing in superior fashion, yet who find the profitable engagements fewer than their resources and conscientious endeavors deserve.

There is, of course, one outstanding reason for the foregoing situation: the concert-giving profession is so overcrowded that competition is made heart-breakingly severe. If it happened that the undeniably meritorious were unvaryingly the ones recognized there would be nothing to regret. Such, unfortunately, is not the case. For all too often it is due to some twist of fortune, or element of appeal quite outside sheer musical excellence, which catches and holds public interest for an artist manifestly inferior to some less successful confrere.

But that, unfortunately, is one of the factors to be reckoned with in a profession fraught with uncertainties and susceptible, it is clear, to the public's whims. As in any other calling, that of music presents its hazards. Ability, if it be rare, generally comes into its reward. Which should prompt those dependent upon their individual efforts for a livelihood to make sure, before embarking upon music seas, that their qualifications rate high.

Nothing save sympathy can be felt for the host of young folk who come yearly before the New York public in recital. Ninety-nine per cent of them have no special talent. Almost without exception they are not equipped to appear in public as serious musicians.

They are usually ill-advised; and even where a restraining effort is put upon their unwarranted ambitions they are not altogether to be blamed. One should not heap censure upon youth deficient in a knowledge essential to a proper estimate of an existing situation. As that manner of youth seems unable to learn save at the price of disappointment and bitter experience, it appears hopeless to supply enlightenment through any other means.

Haste, the spirit of commercialism, and a lack of conscientiousness are three of the elements responsible for the mass of music mediocrity New York is asked to hear. One day conditions may improve. In the meantime it is the exceptionally gifted and the intelligent and industrious artist who succeeds. When the matter is pondered it will be seen to correspond to almost every worth while effort in life.

. . . TEMPO RUBATO . . .

THE common way of tracing the development of music is in terms of personalities. The historical critic includes in his tome a chapter on Mozart and Haydn, one on Beethoven, another on Wagner, three lines apiece on contemporary figures, and so on and the work is done.

There is a less obvious, and perhaps a better method. That is to treat the art as an individual organism itself, and to study some of its fundamental features as they persist and change throughout its development. In such study the achievements of single composers become illustrations of the progress of music.

It is such a scheme that Dr. C. Hubert Parry follows in his splendid critical work, Style in Musical Art (lately republished by MacMillan). Briefly Dr. Parry's thesis is: "The perfection of style is adaptation of diction to conditions."

More or less directly this is the theme of all the essays in his book. He describes the styles of the early choral and instrumental music in terms of the conditions under which they were composed, the traditions and experience by which composers could work, the stage of development of the various instruments, and the customary manner of presentation.

In such terms also he considers the crystallization and growth of the thematic unit in music, the gradual changes in texture, and the development and ultimate abandonment of the classical forms.

THE conception of ideal style in music as being the perfect adaptation of its general characteristics to the conditions for which it is composed is for Dr. Parry a standard of taste and judgment. He can thus condone and enjoy the theatricalism of operatic music because it is written for the theatre, and at the same time he can condemn music-drama mechanisms when the composer employs them in a music which aims to be sympathetic with a mood of religious fervor.

There is a fault in this standard. Styles, even in music which is incontestably good, do not remain pure. They overlap and influence each other, and sometimes they change completely. In theory it is all very well to say, as Dr. Parry does, that it is a mistake on the part of the symphonic composers who are influenced by Wagner to suppose that his principles of procedure are applicable to independent instrumental music of any kind. In fact simply by persistence they have made Wagner's style suitable to the concert hall. The result and proof of their success is that excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas themselves are continually played as independent instrumental music.

In the same way the contrapuntal style of the sixteenth century persisted into the organ music of the following years. Of course there were changes and adaptations, but certain fundamental factors in the old style for a long time continued to be influential.

SAYS Dr. Parry: "The use of phrases and types of thought which do not belong to the period or locality of art, but which suggest associations which are at variance with its pretentions, is one of the most fruitful sources of vulgarity, which always resolves itself in the end into being a mean form of lying. Associations pervade the whole range of art, and no man whatever can escape them. The music of any period or place cannot escape the associations of that period."

One can reply that these associations change as time passes and experience varies. If a re-incarnated Palestrina were to hear Parsifal, he might consider the music (for more reasons than one) ungodly. A modern audience with its different training has no difficulty in making religious associations with the very same music.

THERE are two undercurrents in Style in Musical Art which have not the surety and strength that has Dr. Parry's main thesis. One is the criticism of program music (Dr. Parry wrote his beliefs in 1911) and the other is the attempt to establish a moral standard and function of music.

Dr. Parry writes, "Those who are at all awake see on every side the encroachments of what is called materialism. Materialism is merely the preference for the lower pleasures of sense rather than for the higher pleasures of mind. The peculiarity of the material sensuous pleasures is that they induce every kind of falseness and vulgarity, and seem to evoke the most odious qualities of humanity. . . .

"Music at the moment is one of the most hopeful antidotes to such materialism, but only so when it is of the highest quality. Trivial and false music debases the minds that take their pleasure in it. Real music appeals to the higher faculties and also enhances them."

The difficulty with this standard is the practical test of it. One cannot take the subscription list of a symphony society and feel sure that it is made up only of virtuous names. One may go to a good concert, and find one's most criminal enemy in a box, and what is more he may enjoy the music as fully and sincerely as anyone in the hall. And then again we have continually the spectacle of musicians of unquestioned standing professing even more than interest in a popular music which Dr. Parry seems to abhor.

IT would be a great convenience for justice if virtue and vice, innocence and guilt could be decided by musical test. One can imagine a situation in a court of law. The lawyers have made their pleas, the judge has summed up their reasoning, but the jury remains undecided. A phonograph is rolled before the defendant, and consecutively strains from the slow movement of the Eroica Symphony, Yes We Have No Bananas, and Liszt's Les Preludes are poured into his ear.

Solemn appreciation of the Beethoven is written in every lineament, and cutting pain at the blatant song of the bananas' lack. Immediately the defendant is acquitted, and an unsuspecting member of the jury who has yawned at the symphony and tapped his feet to the jazz rhythm is immediately hanged.

Lawyers are wise men. Perhaps they would know the correct judgment on the virtues of a defendant who would like the Liszt.

ALEXANDER FRIED.

The Late Andre Caplet

Henri Prunieres Writes of the Composer, Conductor and Man Whom French Music Has Lost.

THE death of Andre Caplet has cast the French musical world into mourning. One can name perhaps greater musicians in his generation, but one cannot point to a greater artist. He was the artist in every sense of the term, a man of refined culture who knew all the secrets of his own art, who loved poetry and painting as well as music, and who was ever sensitive to the experiences of nature and to the emotions of life.

He died at the age of forty-six, in the prime of his creative ability, after a desperate six weeks' struggle against his fatal illness. The poisonous gases which he breathed during his activities in the war, probably were the final cause of his succumbing to his attack of pleurisy.

Andre Caplet was born in Havre, Normandy, in 1879. He first studied music with Woollett, and in 1898 entered the Paris Conservatory. Three years later he won the Prix de Rome.

Upon his return from his studies in the Italian capital, he immediately devoted himself to the career of orchestral conductor. He made his debut in a concert at the Odeon Theatre, and followed this appearance with a tour abroad. He conducted with marked success the orchestra of the Boston Opera, and in London that at Covent Garden.

Together with Pierre Monteux Caplet at the time of his death was the best of the contemporary French symphonic leaders. Not only was his technique remarkable, but he was gifted with a true musical sense. The music of Debussy was his specialty, and his performances of it—and particularly of Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien—was an unforgettable musical experience.

Dominated by the sheer spirit of the music itself, when he led it, one forgot the presence of the orchestra and the singers themselves. Experienced musicians and critics whose duty it is to hear music daily found themselves moved emotionally and with rare intensity by Caplet's interpretations. Personally I owe to Caplet some of my most vivid musical experiences.

There emanated from his person, from his blue eyes, at once dreamy and mischievous, an impression of force, intelligence, and generosity which was strengthened when he spoke. His personal influence on those who were close to him was immense. Debussy himself, defiant and self-contained as he was, loved Andre Caplet with rare tenderness. It was Caplet who was closest to the French master when he died.

Caplet followed the tendencies in music marked by Faure and Debussy, both of whom he admired equally. His earliest works particularly bear their impress. Some of his early songs, a suite for wind instruments, and a violoncello sonata, all composed in his youth, attest his mastery more than his creative originality. The latter quality was slow to affirm itself in his music. This was partly because he was at first occupied with orchestral conducting, and then—from 1914 to 1918—with his war duties.

After the armistice he commenced again to compose. Most of all he wrote songs, for he had an especial love of the voice, and understood its resources as well as any musician alive. (He demonstrated this knowledge in his book of method for singers, entitled The Daily Bread.) In these early post-bellum works one sees going on the struggle between the styles Faure and Debussy and that of more modern composers, notably Stravinsky.

He finished by finding his own manner, and began to build up his music stroke, each more powerful than the one before. His Epiphanie, a concerto for cello and orchestra, was entirely novel in form, and made unprecedented demands upon the virtuosity of the soloist. He composed more songs, some of them of broad loveliness, like the Prieres, some of them charming ingenuity, like the Trois Fables de la Fontaine. Finally he produced what seems to be his masterpiece, the oratorio, Le Miracle de Jesus, based on the mystic poem of Henri Gheon.

Here he renounced instrumental color, limiting his orchestra to string instruments and using them in their simplest terms. With this support the voices of the soloists and the chorus sing a music of the soul simply and directly to the audience.

The success of this oratorio was immediate and considerable. It was sung in six successive concerts at the Vieux-Colombier.

Caplet himself conducted, and he drew from the amateur choir effects which would not have been easy for a chorus of professionals. Attendance at one of these concerts alone was sufficient to make one understand what was Caplet's power in the creation of a semi-religious mood in which all present must share.

Then he went to Italy. At Siena he sketched out an opera, which he began to write with enthusiasm, but which he described to friends only with reserve. The fragment remains unfinished.

In 1922 Caplet was named a member of the jury of the Societe Internationale de Musique Contemporaine, and he displayed such skill and understanding in the reading of the most complex and modern scores which were submitted for performance that his judgment immediately dominated that of his colleagues on the jury, and this was a domination to which they submitted with pleasure and willingness. The next year Caplet was compelled to refuse the unanimous nomination to this position because he wished to set again to work on his opera.

During these three years he worked with superhuman diligence, as though, sensing the approach of his end, he did not wish any moment of his remaining hours to be lost.

HENRI PRUNIERES.

MME. STELLA DE METTE,
Mezzo-soprano, Whose Singing and Acting Were a Large Factor in the Successes of the Recently Finished Tour of the San Carlo Opera Company.

Cleveland Hears Last Opera and Symphony

Aida Ends Metropolitan Visit; Serafin Conducts Parsifal; Orchestra Series Closed.

Cleveland, May 6.—A sold-out house here by the Metropolitan Opera Company last evening. The ovation which followed the production of Aida sends the Metropolitan artists from Cleveland "with the pleasing consciousness of having scored their greatest popular success with their final offering." (James H. Rogers in the Plain Dealer).

Tullio Serafin conducted and the cast included Elisabeth Rethberg, Julia Claussen, Charlotte Ryan, Jose Mardones, and Giuseppe Danise. Mr. Rogers thought it a "stupendous" production and had words of praise for the members of the cast, the chorus, the conductor, and Florence Rudolph's solo dance.

On Monday evening, the production was Tales of Hoffmann, conducted by Mr. Hasselmans. Individual members of the cast were highly commended and Mr. Rogers wrote that the audience was held "spellbound" and that "no more perfect representation has adorned Cleveland's longest and best season of grand opera, now near its conclusion." In the cast were Mmes. Bori, Sabanieeva, Howard, and Wakefield, and Messrs. Tokatyan, de Luca, Meader, Gustafson, and Tibbett.

The gala concert took place on Sunday afternoon before an audience of 8,000. Those who participated were Mmes. Rethberg, Mario, and Gordon; and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, Tokatyan, Tibbet, Picco, Rothier and Gustafson; and Messrs. Serafin, Papi, Hasselmans, Bamboschek, and Setti conducting. The Saturday evening performance, Traviata, drew the largest audience of the season at that time. Lucrezia Bori's work was applauded by public and reviewers alike. Messrs. Lauri-Volpi and de Luca also appeared. Parsifal, given Sunday afternoon, drew a crowd of almost equal proportions. Archie Bell considered it a "magnificent rendition" of the work and, together with other writers, lauded Mmes. Easton and Telva, and Messrs. Taucher, Whitehill, Bohnen, and Didur. Mr. Serafin conducted, and was highly commended in the press for the manner in which he developed the religious mood of Parsifal and sustained it for the entire performance. The double bill Friday evening combined Pagliacci and Coq d'Or, with Mr. Papi conducting the former and Mr. Bamboschek the latter. In Pagliacci were Mme. Rethberg and Messrs. Martinelli and Danise, Mmes. Sabanieeva and Galli, and Mesrs. Diaz, Didur, Bonfiglio, and Kosloff.

At the annual luncheon of the Fortnightly Musical Club yesterday, several members of the Metropolitan were guests. Among them were Messrs. Bamboschek, Errolle, and

(Continued on page 19)

Elisabeth Rethberg
SOPRANO
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
FISK BLDG. NEW YORK
PACKARD BLDG PHILA., PA.
BRUNSWICK RECORDS
HARDMAN PIANO

MARION TELVA
Contralto Metropolitan Opera Company
Management: Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, Fisk Building, New York City

ETHEL GROW
CONTRALTO
A Singer Who is a Musician
Builder of Novel and Effective Programs
"Program draws most enthusiastic response."
"Tone of very agreeable smoothness and Softness."
N. Y. Tribune, January 24, 1924
Studio: 200 W. 57th St., N. Y. City
Telephone Circle 10117

MARIE TIFFANY
SOPRANO METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
CONCERT MANAGEMENT ARTHUR JUDSON
Fisk Building, New York — Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia
Brunswick Records

MARIE SUNDELIUS
SOPRANO—METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY
MANAGEMENT
Haensel and Jones — Aeolian Hall, New York
Aeolian-Vocalion Records

Women Composers Hold Festival

Eighteen Musicians Meet in Washington; Bach Mass and Opera Performance Win Approval.

Washington, D. C., May 3.—It is only the expected that happens when a month extending beyond the routine musical season takes on an unusual character. The gathering of some eighteen of America's women composers in a Spring Festival, arranged by Mrs. Dorothy DeMuth Watson under the auspices of the League of American Penwomen, beginning with the closing week of April—is a case in point.

Three formal programs were given, presenting songs by Mrs. Mary Turner Salter, Mabel W. Daniels, Virginia Roper, Karolyn Wells Bassett, and Florence Parr-Gere; story-poems by Phyllis Fergus; sonatas for violin and piano by Mary Carlyle Howe, Gena Branscombe and Florence Marion Ralston; quartets for soprano, violin, cello and piano by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; a Concert Prelude and Fugue for two pianos by Ulric Cole; a fantasy for piano and orchestra by Helen Sears; a Suite for chamber ensemble by Ethel Glenn Hier; orchestral pieces by Mabel Wood Hill and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend; and choral numbers by Mary Carsisle Howe, Mrs. Beach, Miss Branscombe and Harriet Ware.

In addition to these an interesting and entertaining "music fair" was carried on during three afternoons, where the composers and their friends had opportunity to become more intimately acquainted each with the other, and with their various work. The musical value of the offerings ranged from a creditable mediocrity to an assured expression of individual and well worth while ideas, demanding no favors on the score of sex. Adequate means for the presentation of the more elaborate compositions were not always available but it was recognized that in every case the best possible was given.

* * *

Noteworthy in another sense was the performance of Bach's B Minor Mass by the Bach Choir of Bethlehem, under the auspices of the World Fellowship Through Music. Jessie MacBride of the Times wrote that April 16—the date of the performance—"will stand out as the pinnacle of Washington's noblest dedication to music. Never have we heard such choral singing! . . . The impression of voices is lost. Doctor Wolle plays upon his choir as upon violins. The soloists, (Mildred Faas, Mabelle Addison, Nicholas Douty and Charles Trowbridge Tittmann) are so much a part of the whole that it breaks the mood to separate them."

Helen Fetter of The Star noted the festive character about the thousands who swarmed into the Auditorium, pausing on their way to listen to the famous Moravian trombone choir on the lawn outside the building.

Fifty players from the Philadelphia Orchestra gave full and firm support, and the solo obbligatos of Mr. Lorenz at the first violin desk, of Anton Horner and of the players of the oboi d'amore and trumpets came in for universal praise.

The effect of the Mass as given by this body of singers is cumulative, through the two sessions, and overpowering in the end. Dr. Wolle's conception of Bach's music is one alive with sincerity and poetic insight aided by the ability to command exactly the expression required.

* * *

Another event of major importance was Easter Monday's The Barber of Seville by the Washington Opera Company, Edouard Albion, director. Helen Fetter of The Star reported Mr. Chaliapin as saying after the performance that it was "the best he had ever sung in or seen."

It had indeed a rare quality of sparkle. Each of the principals seemed the happiest possible selection for his part, or hers, and even Chaliapin, to his eternal credit, did not permit his presence to overthrow the balance. Helen Fetter of The Star thought him "of course the dominating figure of the cast," and mentioned particularly the expressive play of his hands and the manner in which he colored his tones with chuckling laughter.

Jessie MacBride of The Times thought the role "far too small for his stature, though bringing out a new Chaliapin with the hoydenish spirit of a comic opera comedian." She thought Paolo Ananian, as Dr. Bartolo "captured comedy honors, and found in Jose Mojica a " 'prima donna' tenor of consummate art, added to which is the charm of his personality and a dramatic art that holds a rare finesse beneath an abounding youth and exuberance." Devorah Nadworney as Bertha "gave her one aria effectively."

Ivan Ivantzoff she thought " a convincing factotum, a vital force at all times, with elegance added to his comedy. All the reviews spoke well of him, as of Tina Paggi, the Rosina. E. P. Poe of the Post wrote that "next to Chaliapin the honors were scored by her," and noted the surpassing beauty of her voice, its artistic handling and the petite and quaintly garbed figure. The same writer found the ensemble work "more than fair, showing the results of intensive practice under the direction of Kurt Hetzel of Munich."

According to W. T. in The News, Jacques Samossoud, at the desk, "read the score sympathetically and had his orchestra in the best shape it has attained this season. The whole presentation marked another step forward.

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra concluded its season on the last day of March "in a blaze of glory" to quote Helen Fetter of The Star. The effulgence, however, came rather in the latter half of the program—which was made up of Germaine Tailleferre's Concerto and of Albeniz' Fete-Dieu a Seville—orchestrated by Stokowski—than in the Chausson Symphony and the Saint-Saens Concerto in C minor, excellently played as these last-named were. Alfred Cortot was the pianist.

* * *

Efrem Zimbalist, in the Wilson-Greene series, "delighted an appreciative audience." The dashing surety of his bowing was noted, and his improvisation of a Japanese tune found particularly interesting. Under the same local management appeared Mieczyslaw Munz, in whom Helen Fetter of The Star found "decided individuality of tone, exquisite command of softest shadings in interpretation and marvellous flexibility and accuracy of touch."

Jascha Heifetz, under the Peggy Albion direction was the first to appear as recitalist in the big Auditorium, before an audience numbering over four thousand. He "played his

(Continued on page 14)

"THEY KNEW WHAT THEY WANTED"

SO THEY BOUGHT

The AMPICO

Whenever a careful analysis is made, and particularly when a direct comparison is possible with the performance of other so-called "reproducing pianos," The AMPICO is the inevitable choice of the discriminating music-lover.

Ampico Supremacy Is Today an Established Fact

Not only in actual performance, but in the strength of its library and the prestige of its recording artists, The AMPICO stands alone.

Some new and significant literature of interest to clubs, students and teachers of music, is available through the

Ampico Educational Department
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

PIERRE KEY'S OBSERVATIONS

A PUBLIC SPIRITED and constructive act was performed in giving those seven young American composers the chance to hear an orchestra perform one new work each of them had written. In so doing George Eastman moved once again to mould an opportunity that would react beneficially upon mental creativeness. Incidentally, he made it possible for Rochester to make another large mark upon the nation's music map.

According to so capable a judge as Olin Downes, of the New York Times, Messrs. Rogers, Copland, Porter, and McKay contributed "compositions of substance and merit." He felt that Messrs. Tweedy, Weiss, and Silver offered "less individual and interesting" works.

Circumstances prevented my being present when the manuscript performance was played last Friday week in the Eastman Theatre, but I place reliance on the opinion of Mr. Downes. He has knowledge, the judicial temperament, and restraint. I cannot call to mind half a dozen music reviewers in all the world who present in their copy so fair a sense of estimation or who impress as being so sincere.

IT MUST BE glorious to have money enough to perform such a service as Mr. Eastman performed. After the rent is paid, the grocer and marketman satisfied, necessary clothing purchased, and all the rest of life's essentials made secure, the average man of means is moved to think primarily of his own desires. Generally they run to the gratifying of personal pleasures, and rarely do they incline in the way of doing substantial good to others.

I say "rarely" in spite of the monetary gifts forthcoming for one purpose or another, for there is far less constructive disposition of money in our country than there should be. Even some of our very best benefactors write a check with a string tied to it. Where they do not seek publicity in some form the giving is done to gratify social ambitions; or because some friend of influence says "give."

Most men, and some of the women also, "follow the leader." Let one such come forward in an impressive way and the rest is easily accomplished. What many wealthy persons have yet to learn is that the acquisition of much money carries with it definite obligations to put a considerable portion of it to fine uses. And I repeat: It is all too seldom done by the many who can do it and who ought to do it.

THE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS transferred to Foundations, other educational institutions, churches, hospitals, art museums and art forms delude the average person. Conceding the total to be a huge sum, and the annual dispensations to worthy organizations and to individuals, the whole represents, nevertheless, a far smaller amount than might be written down.

Music fares less well than it should. For it receives pennies instead of dollars; and compared with other cultural mediums is really treated badly. Don't assume that the deficits supplied for our symphony orchestras represents enough to take up all the slack in the music fabric monetary needs. Or that that sum, coupled to what else is given here and there, is more than a fractional part of what has gone and is going in other directions.

The one outstanding endowment for music was provided for by the late Augustus D. Juilliard. The Juilliard Musical Foundation will have ultimately the income of something like $20,000,000 to spend, and it may work out a plan for doing widespread good. Save for this large bequest the beneficence in behalf of music has been supplied by relatively few men and women—great souls, most of them, who realized and seized gladly their opportunities.

BUT the United States is still young, culturally. Numerous men who have acquired fortunes lack the finer fiber. Their natures are attuned to the commonplace; their thoughts are generally in the direction of costs, disbursements, income, and surpluses. Larger minded men too often have no music in their beings. One tune is to them like all other tunes. And because they cannot themselves understand they are not easily led to the music water trough and made to drink.

Even where such men admit the civic and human welfare influences of music they are slow to analyze the merits of a project which may be brought to their attention. Conditions in this respect are improving, and they will continue to improve; but it will be some time before the musical arts attract the monetary attention they deserve.

The United States needs music more than ever before; and music enlightenment and certain institutions for bringing to the nation factors for its safeguarding. These are dangerous times. Men of big business, and men active in other large ways, would better look into music, and ascertain those ways in which it may be harnessed to pull its share of the load to be drawn.

SHE is the grand dame of singers, and an artiste. She is sixty-five and more, which is an age ten years later than most singers sing and twenty more than many of them are able to. This person, who is a personality, is one of the few vocalists now before the public who respects and adheres to the technical singing line; and her communicative power is of the rarest. Just for that her name ought to be mentioned: it is Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

Mme. Ernestine seems not unlike the well-known brook, in the matter of running on. She has been round and about for longer than most opera and concert patrons can remember, performing with artistic fidelity. Her public she both loves and admires, and she seeks to do her duty by it.

Her engagement as a 1925-26 guest artiste by the Metropolitan Opera Company seems to have been one of those happy affairs which occasionally in this too-tense world will occur. There is a sentiment side to appeal; and I hope to be present when Mme. Ernestine reappears and causes the scene her presence should cause.

This contralto has her mind made up to retire, and before long. If my memory serves me accurately she expects to linger with her public for two seasons more (or did Mme. Schumann-Heink tell me three?) Then she will settle down in her California home, financially well provided for to spend the remainder of her days with her children and friends about her.

NATIONAL MUSIC WEEK has come and gone. I anticipate receiving presently from C. M. Tremaine a mass of statistics gathered by the alert and pertinacious Kenneth Clark, who is like a sunbeam in both his fittings and disposition. Ken is a digger, a hustler, and a go-getter. Ask Mr. Tremaine about him.

From the tip of Maine to the southwesterly corner of California there have been held during the seven days so recently finished music celebrations in impressive array. Thousands of the musically inclined have sung and played instruments, and increased thousands have listened with a good will.

Prizes have been offered and won and bestowed, and the country is better off for the undertaking. What began in a few communities has developed, in a half dozen years, into a nation-wide movement which reflects the hold music has upon the people and its influence with staid business men who once thought it a fad.

A pianoforte or violin in the home has come to be a symbol of domestic culture and family enjoyment. Or mayhap it may be a cello, or some other musical instrument. In one instance it is the mother or father, or both, who have started the music ball to rolling about the fireside. In anoanother instance it is a child who, fresh from participation in the public school music hour, has enthused the parents to becoming interested—if they have not actually been moved to go and do likewise.

So America's National Music Week appears well on the road to permanency. Which is a good thing, and will be a still better thing as time goes on.

ABOUT THE TIME this is being written Mrs. J. J. Carter will be arriving in New York, after a jaunt across the country during which she stopped off at Kansas City, Cincinnati and several other cities.

Mrs. Carter is of Hollywood Bowl distinction. Her enthusiasm and persistency made possible the Bowl concerts. In her letter announcing her Eastward coming she expounded as she is known to do before the men and women of Hollywood who dig into their pocket-books and guarantee that if there happens to be a margin between receipts and expenses that the financial obligations incurred shall be met.

By a twist of circumstance I expect to be en route for California about the time Mrs. Carter is riding into New York. So we will not meet at this time. But some member of the Musical Digest staff will doubtless engage the lady in a chat, so the readers of this publication may receive first hand information about the approaching Hollywood Bowl concerts, and what conductors are likely to wave a baton over the orchestra recruited from the Los Angeles Philharmonic in addition to Fritz Reiner.

LOOKING THROUGH a recent copy of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle I ran across a review on the playing of John Corigliano. When last I listened to this talented violinist he sent me away from the concert-room with the consciousness that I had heard a fine and conscientious artist in whom there burned a genuine fire. What the Brooklyn Eagle wrote was a tribute to youth and ability, sufficiently restrained to merit a word of praise. Because of that, and because of my belief that merit deserves to be recognized, the review is reproduced herewith:

"Among violinists of the younger generation three only at the moment seem marked by talents of an extraordinary nature. There are twenty, perhaps more, who show a development of style and personality that is well above the average, yet three only come to mind as artists on whom some finality of judgment may be risked. Of this trio is John Corigliano, whose recital at the Academy recently afforded another opportunity to admire musicianship remarkably matured, remarkably well balanced. Mr. Corigliano is a resident of this borough and has appeared often before, both with orchestra and in recital. His debut, as we recall, took place during the season of 1922-23—it was, in any case, during that year that we first heard him, as soloist at a concert given by the City Symphony. Since then, of course, he has made remarkable progress, both in the mastery of his instrument and in the development of a musical personality.

His technique is unusually sophisticated, for there is nothing that seems to dismay or confuse him in the mechanics of fiddle-playing. He plays with ease, with eloquence—the tone that he produces is never hard, never shrill, but always of an even quality, warmest and most expressive in such music as the second movement of Grieg's C minor Sonata, brilliant in such music as the finale of the Tschaikowsky Concerto. It is a pleasure to note, also, that he does not insist on the virtuoso note: his programs are well balanced and avoid insistence on the display of technique for its own sake. The music he offers—at least that of last evening—may be of a familiar order, but it does not consist of two hours carefully divided among Sarasate, Wieniawski, Pagnanini and Vieuxtemps. Mr. Corigliano was accompanied at the piano by Samuel Chotzinoff."

THAT GREAT ARTIST John McCormack, was in a reminiscent mood just before he sailed last week on the Olympic. We spent an hour and more together in his New York apartment; and commenting on those days when we were preparing John's book the tenor reminded me of his daughter Gwennie's tendency to sing, and the altitudinous character of her voice.

Gwennie is now sixteen, and she is determined on a career. Her voice, declares John, is a coloratura soprano, with marked facility. I listened to a record she made, with her two years older brother Cyril, who has a light, high baritone voice of charming quality. The piece was the duet from Reynaldo Hahn's operetta Ciboulette. The young McCormacks sang it with a simplicity of style, and a rhythm indicating how much of their father's talent has been given them.

Then came another record, made by Cyril. The boy sang it with a natural instinct for good taste, without forcing of his tones, and a diction as clear as anyone would ask to hear. Who knows that Cyril may eventually do a little serious singing on his own account.

THE BALANCE OF OPINION

American Orchestral Society

Olga Samaroff and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who played together Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianos, were the soloists at the final concert of the third season of the American Orchestral Society in Town Hall, New York, on the evening of May 5.

Chalmers Clifton conducted the orchestra, which played also Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture, Tschaikowsky's Romeo and Juliet, and the overture to Lalo's Le Roi d'Ys. Mr. Clifton made a short address on the aims of the organization as a training school, and said that this year twenty-five students, experienced in the playing of at least seventy-two standard symphonic compositions, would be graduated.

A large audience heard the "well arranged" (Post) program. The reviewer of the Mail-Telegram said: "Of the performance of the orchestra in this concert it can be said without reservation that it was characterized by admirable earnestness. As for the soloists, of course, they were a delight to hear."

W. J. Henderson wrote in the Sun that the entire concert "reflected great credit on the instructors and their pupils as well as on Mr. Clifton."

Olin Downes in the Times and the reviewer of the Herald Tribune wrote similarly, congratulating the members of the orchestra and the conductor on the spirit and skill with which they played, and praising without reserve the playing of the soloists. The former spoke of the "eloquent ensemble" of the soloists, and the latter declared that they played as one.

Anton Civoru

A Russian basso, Anton Civoru, who has sung and taught in various cities in the United States, made his first New York recital appearance in Aeolian Hall last Tuesday evening. The pianist was Gregory Ashman.

"He showed a just discrimination of serious style, as between Beethoven's In Questa Tomba, and Scarlatti's O Cessate, while temporary hoarseness did not check the more playful spirit of the catalogue aria from Mozart's Don Giovanni," reported the Times. German, English and Russian songs made up a large part of the program.

The Herald Tribune chronicler said: "With some expressive ability, Mr. Civoru's singing seemed rather a matter of extremes." Pitts Sanborn expressed the opinion, in the Mail-Telegram, that Mr. Civoru's singing needed improvement in tone production and in choice of tempo.

Federation Holds Contest

Minneapolis, May 2.—The Northern Lights District contest for young professional musicians took place on April 25 in the assembly room of the Nicollet hotel. Winners of previous state contests in Montana, North and South Dakota and Minnesota were entered. Mildred Perkins, soprano, and Paul Oberg, pianist, Minnesota entries, were among the winners. Other successful competitors were Dean F. McSloy, baritone, of Sioux Falls, S. D., and Hjelmer Huseth, violinist, of Jamestown, N. D. The contest was arranged by the Minnesota Federation of Music Clubs.

Room-Music Concert

The second of Percy Grainger's concerts of room-music in the Little Theatre, New York, took place on the evening of May 3. Mr. Grainger conducted twenty-four musicians of the Philharmonic Society in a program of modern music. He was assisted by Erik Bye, baritone, Ralph Leopold, pianist, and the Hampton Institute Choir. The latter group sang two groups of Negro Folk Song Derivatives, conducted by the composer, R. Nathaniel Dett.

The remainder of the program included Franz Schreker's Kammersymphonie; two Memories of New Mexico, by the late Natalie Curtis; Grieg's Lost in the Hills, a song for baritone and orchestra; and Paul Hindemith's Chamber Music.

The reviewers were unanimously grateful to Mr. Grainger for the interest of his program. The Post writer was enthusiastic regarding the Grieg music, and reported that Mr. Bye sang it "with an exquisite art and dramatic fervor." This writer added that Mr. Grainger "Vividly brought out the solemn medievalism and haunting charm" of the New Mexico Memories.

"Mr. Grainger throughout gave a deftly subdued plasticity to ensembles analogous to sculptured cubism," reported the Times writer, referring particularly to the Shreker and the Hindemith music. Mr. Peyser of the Telegram Mail was not enthused over the Grieg piece, which he considered below that composer's standard, but he added the opinion that it was "excellently sung" by Mr. Bye.

The most enjoyable parts of the program were the negro songs, thought Mr. Henderson. He said also, "Mr. Dett proved himself to be a musician of ability and ingenuity."

Emil Friedberger

Emil Friedberger, an American pianist, gave his first New York recital in Chickering Hall on the evening of April 30. His program included Brahms' Variations on a theme of Handel, Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 111, and pieces of Chopin, Debussy, and Wagner-Liszt.

"He played with clear tone and fluent style," reported the Sun, and the Herald Tribune writer said: "He seemed to be a most skillful and well versed player, with thorough technique and marked expressive ability, finding many and varied degrees of shading." Other newspapers did not report the concert in detail.

Emma R. Steiner's Concert

A large audience was present at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on the evening of April 30, at the concert given as a testimonial to Emma R. Steiner to mark the fiftieth anniversary of her activities in the musical world as composer and orchestral director.

For some years Miss Steiner has been working for the benefit of the Steiner Foundation, which aims to establish homes in each State for aged and infirm musicians. The proceeds are to be devoted to the fund.

Miss Steiner led an orchestra of 100 musicians in a program of her own music. She has conducted 6,000 light opera performances in this country, and once, in 1894, she directed Anton Seidl's orchestra in her own music. At the anniversary concert there were vocal solos and an oboe selection, besides excerpts from Miss Steiner's operettas, Fleurette, The First Kiss, and others. Soloists included Giuseppe Leoni, Le Roy Weil, Wing Wetmore, Dorothy Adrian, and Agnes Robinson.

"An American Singer Singing to American People Songs Which They Can Enjoy"

—Los Angeles Times, March 11, 1925.

"There are not many American concert singers who combine vocal skill and interpretative power to the same extent as Royal Dadmun. Mr. Dadmun's recital was a fine exhibition of artistic singing."
—Paul Morris, New York Evening World, April 28, 1925.

"There is a tremendous quality in Dadmun's singing—a trumpet call of truth. It is so luscious, so golden, and the art of his work is that of the highest kind—'the art that conceals art'."
—Portland Oregonian, March 19, 1925.

"He is one of the most refined among popular baritones."
—Los Angeles Express, March 11, 1925.

"Mr. Dadmun displayed freedom and buoyance beyond the usual dexterity of baritone voices of his powerful timbre."
—New York Times.

"His good voice served him well in the expression of sentiments, and his finish in phrasing was a valuable asset in his general work."
—W. J. Henderson, New York Sun, March 28, 1925.

"He swept his audience into clamorous demands for encores."
—Portland Telegram, March 19, 1925.

"In truth, he is an actor of songs as well as a singer and his gifts are many and varied."
—Seattle Daily Times, March 17, 1925.

ROYAL DADMUN

Exclusive Management
DANIEL MAYER
Aeolian Hall
New York
VICTOR RECORDS

SEASON
1925-1926
NOW BOOKING

THE CRITICAL SCALES

Young Men's Symphony

Led by Paul Henneberg, the Young Men's Symphony Orchestra ended the activities of its twenty-third year with its annual concert in Aeolian Hall, New York, on the afternoon of May 3. Ethel Best, soprano, was soloist with the orchestra in an aria from Massenet's Herodiade, and sang also a group of songs with the piano accompaniment of Pauline Gold.

The Herald Tribune reviewer reported that the concert approached the professional standard. Mr. Henneberg, who is also leader of the Police Band, conducted Mendelssohn's Fingal's Cave Overture, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Grieg's Sigurd Jorsalfar Suite, and Massenet's Phedre Overture. "Admirable precision, fine spirit and good tone," for the most part were found in the playing of the orchestra by the Sun observer, and he called Miss Best's voice "pleasing."

The "exhilarating spirit" of the players pleased Pitts Sanborn, the Telegram-Mail writer, and he said that evidently Mr. Henneberg is "an inspiring leader." The string sections of the orchestra Mr. Sanborn found technically more finished than the brass.

Of Miss Best he wrote, "though she is not yet a finished vocalist, she has to recommend her a voice of good quality and considerable strength, a generally free emission of tone, and sound notions as to style . . . she is a singer of distinct promise." The Times reviewer found Miss Best's voice "agreeable," and lauded the spirit and precision of the orchestra. He made particular mention of the unusual size of the audience.

Miss Elizabeth Forkois

An audience composed mainly of her compatriots heard Elizabeth Forkois, Czecho-Slovakian soprano, in her Town Hall recital in New York on the afternoon of May 3. Her program ranged from Puccini to Brahms, Strauss and Dvorak. Karel Leitner was the accompanist, and Anna Daly, violinist, and Anton Schimek, organist, also assisted in the program.

The Times report said that Miss Forkois' voice quality could not be said to match her musicianship, while Pitts Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail thought that her voice was too small and too restrained, although from time to time it seemed "of pleasant quality." Other papers did not report the recital in detail.

Montclair Orchestra Plays Again

Montclair, N. J., May 2.—The third concert of the Montclair Orchestra, Philip James, conductor, ended the third season of that organization in the High School Auditorium here last evening. James Friskin, pianist, was the soloist in Bach's D minor Concerto, and he played also Brahms' Waltzes, Opus 39. The program included Mozart's Symphony, No. 6, in F; Bridge's Lament, Kramer's In Elizabethan Days, Andrews' Devotion, and Holst's Fugal Concerto for flute, oboe, and strings.

Mrs. Frances Whittington

Accompanied in several two-piano numbers by her husband and teacher, Dorsey Whittington, Mrs. Frances Whittington made her New York recital debut in Rumford Hall on the evening of May 2. Bach's A minor Prelude and Fugue in the Liszt arrangement, Schumann's Papillons and compositions of Chopin, Goossens and Balakireff were included in the program.

The reviewers who reported the concert analytically felt that Mrs. Whittington was a player of distinct talent and promise. According to the Post report, she disclosed "intelligence and commendable finger technique," but he saw room for an increase in poetic sense and stylistic understanding. "She has talent and should go further," this reviewer concluded.

The chronicler of the Herald Tribune likewise found "undoubted talent," and commented on Mrs. Whittington's "considerable degree of technical skill. . . . Her interpretations suggested understanding of the music and expressive ability."

Miss Maria Mugavero

Assisted by Luigi Costantino, pianist, who played a number of solo pieces, and Antonio dell' Orefice, accompanist, Maria Mugavero, coloratura soprano, appeared in recital in Aeolian Hall on the evening of May 3. Her program included selections of "an amazing variety of composers" (Mr. Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail) from Proch through Cadman and Donaudy.

Mr. Sanborn said, "She revealed a fresh voice of unmistakable capacity, but her singing last night was largely vitiated by a faulty adjustment of tone to breath." Nevertheless Mr. Sanborn commented on the singer's youth, and saw promise in her work.

The Times report also stressed the fact that Miss Mugavero's youth leaves time for maturing of her talents. He suggested the necessity of "time and study and the self-direction of the singer's own riper, more animated personality," before she will be at her full powers.

Jersey Singers Visit New York

The University Choral Clubs of Rutgers College and the New Jersey College for women, Howard D. McKinney conductor, came over to Town Hall on the evening of May 1 for their second annual New York concert. Bach, Tschaikowsky, Speakes, and Elgar were on the program, and the singers presented also a cantata of Deems Taylor, The Highwayman. A string quintet assisted in this composition. "The tone of the young singers was agreeable and their ensemble generally praiseworthy," reported the Sun. The Times observer declared, "Few returning ensembles have brought more sterling pleasure or fuller proof of their progress."

Miss Isolda Bernhard

Isolda Bernhard, a young Russian soprano who has been heard with the Ukrainian Chorus, introduced herself as a recitalist to New York on the evening of May 4 in Town Hall. She was accompanied by Nicholas Voinoff.

Miss Bernhard opened her program with German Lieder, and sang also a Russian group, and selections of Wagner, Puccini, Heckscher, and Debussy. The Times reviewer thought her better in the Schubert than in the Schumann, "where her voice became shrill." Some of the songs, reported Mr. Sanborn in the Telegram-Mail, she delivered "with feeling and some appreciation of their style. . . .Her voice, however, is of limited power." He thought that at times the soprano forced it disadvantageously.

Vocal assets of "modest type" were attributed to Miss Bernhard by the Sun observer, but he lauded her "admirable interpretative sense." The opinion of the reviewer of the Herald Tribune was much the same. He said in part, "Miss Bernhard showed zeal and considerable expressive ability, with a voice not without its assets, but not used to best advantage."

Paul Robeson

A capacity audience in New York's Greenwich Village Theatre again greeted Paul Robeson, negro baritone, in his second song recital on the evening of May 3. The program again consisted of negro spirituals, in which Mr. Robeson was assisted at the piano by Lawrence Brown. Mr. Brown supplied the tenor voice obbligato where it was called for several times during the program.

"Mr. Robeson's singing made stirring appeal," reported the Sun. "His voice was massively rich and his use of it remarkable in the expression of the songs voicing the moods of the negro." "A remarkable demonstration of dramatic power," on the part of the singer-actor (Mr. Robeson has lately acted in various plays of Eugene O'Neill in New York), the Times observer said of this concert.

The singing supplied the Post reviewer with an "exquisite thrill," he wrote. "For," he added, "Mr. Robeson combines with a gloriously rich and mellow voice a dramatic restraint and power that seems to hold unheard thunder behind each song."

In the Herald Tribune, F. D. Perkins referred to Mr. Robeson's recital as "another very successful performance."

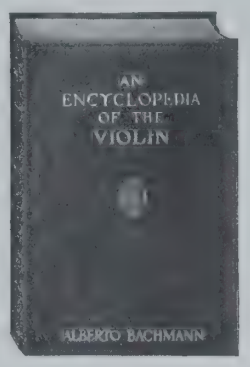
Tenor and Pianist Divide Program

Oliver Stewart, tenor, and Daniel Wolf, pianist, appeared in a joint recital in Rumford Hall last Tuesday. Mr. Stewart, reported the Herald Tribune, accompanied by Helen Chase, "sang in a voice of full resonant quality, except for a slight suggestion of effort in some top notes." Mr. Wolf played some Chopin and several of his own compositions.

Just Published!

AN ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE VIOLIN

By ALBERTO BACHMANN



With Introduction by EUGENE YSAYE

Translated by FREDERICK H. MARTENS

Edited by ALBERT E. WIER

This is a unique work, being the only encyclopedic treatise on the violin ever published. It is written by the eminent musicologist, Alberto Bachmann, with an introduction by Eugene Ysaye. The following synopsis of the contents gives an excellent idea of the value of this book to professional violinists, teachers, students, or merely enthusiasts about this instrument:

SYNOPSIS

The Origin of the Violin—Violin Makers in Europe—Violin Makers in America—Construction of the Violin—Colors and Varnishes—Bow Makers and Construction—Violin Bridge, String and Rosin Making—Violin Teaching and Study—The Evolution of Violin Playing—How to Practice—Tone and Its Development—Tone and the Various Bowings—The Evolution of Violin Technique—The Use of the Bow—Accentuation or Emphasis—The Glissando or Portamento—Analyses of Master Violin Works—Violin Collecting in Europe and America—Chamber Music—The Phonograph and the Violin—Glossary of Musical Terms—Biographical Dictionary of Violinists—Literature Relating to the Violin—The Development of Violin Music—A List of Solo and Chamber Music for the Violin.

There are 80 full page illustrations, several color plates and more than 400 musical examples in its 488 pages of fascinatingly instructive reading.

PRICE $5.00

For sale at all music and book shops or of the Publishers

D. APPLETON AND COMPANY

35 West 32nd Street New York

Illustrated prospectus sent on request.

Serenaders Strum in Recital

The Serenaders, an amateur organization of players of the mandolin, banjo, guitar and similar instruments, appeared in recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on the evening of May 2. "The players, soloists and ensemble were skillful, and their entertainment had its pleasing features," reported the Herald Tribune, and the Sun chronicler wrote similarly.

Willem Willeke

'Cellist

BRUNSWICK RECORDS STEINWAY PIANO

Management: EMMA JEANNETTE BRAZIER, 100 W. 80th St., New York

WALTER GOLDE

TEACHER OF SINGING

Available for accompanying in the East

Studio Address: Steinway Bldg.
109 West 57th St., New York

STELLA de METTE

MEZZO-SOPRANO

Formerly with Metropolitan Opera

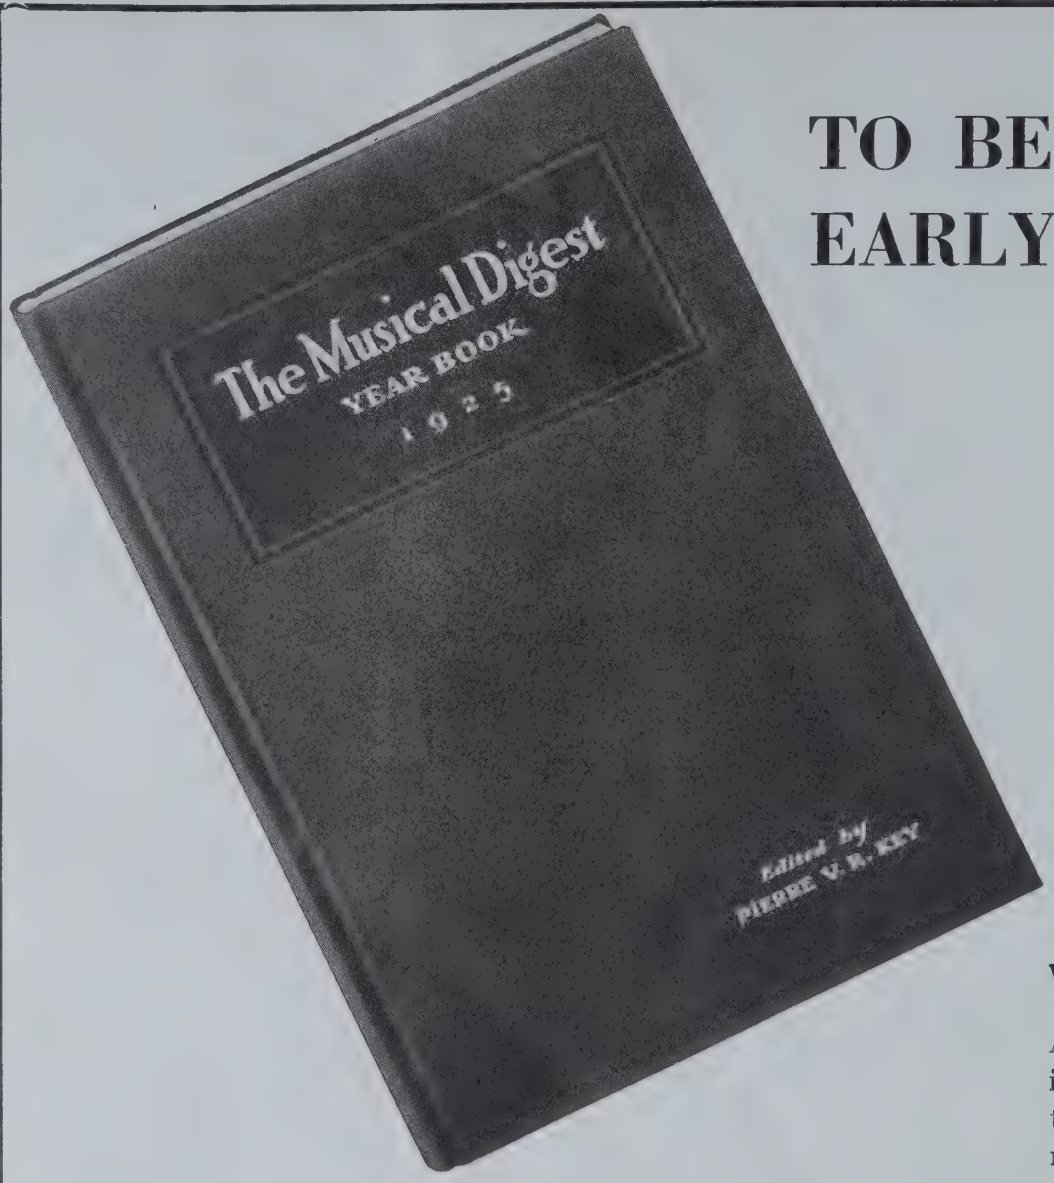
Touring with San Carlo Opera Co.

Exclusive Management of
ANTHONY BAGAROZY

Aeolian Hall New York

RAYMOND HAVENS Pianist

Solist with BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 8 performances
Soloist with CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 2 performances
Soloist with MINNEAPOLIS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 3 performances
For Dates and Terms Address:
EVELYN LIGHT, Sec. 87 Pinckney St., Boston, Mass.



TO BE ISSUED EARLY NEXT AUTUMN

Something New

and

Invaluable

for

Musicians, Managers, Critics,
Educators, Students,
Music Patrons

—:—

Who "They" Are
What "They" Have Done
Where "They" Will Be in 1925-1926

A fund of useful, interesting, necessary information about artists, organizations and music events which no musical person will want to be without.

A WORLD ALMANAC OF MUSIC — that's what The Musical Digest Year Book is to be. Unique and well nigh indispensable to managers of concert courses, music critics, musicians, music patrons, educators, students, publishers, manufacturers, and dealers.

Seeking detailed information about the resources of an artist, his management, and when he is available—you will find that information in The Musical Digest Year Book.

Or, if you require facts concerning a symphony orchestra, choral society, festival, chamber music ensemble, or other music organization — they will be in The Musical Digest Year Book, with their 1925-26 plans, dates, and all else of pertinent moment.

This invaluable volume will contain the names of the great artists and conductors who have appeared in this country during the past fifty years. And, desiring to know what the leading cities are doing musically . . . you will find it in The Musical Digest Year Book.

There also will be assembled data concerning music conservatories, university and college music departments, and private teachers.

Exclusive, conclusive, definitive. The last word for those who appreciate it, and who want it—ready for instant use, and conveniently accessible between two covers.

Artistically Bound in Dark Red Cloth
Panelled Cover with Gold Lettering

Price, postpaid, $2.00

Harvard Singers Visit Philadelphia

Six Choruses Head Quaker City Concert Program; American Music Heard; Varied Recitals.

Philadelphia, May 4.—Choral music has come to the front during the closing weeks of the music season here. During the past fortnight six singing organizations were heard in concert.

The Harvard Glee Club, led by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, met with marked success at its recent concert. To quote the North American, it sang "as a unit, with sweet clarity in the most legato of tender passages, with technical excellence, but without fire and without spontaneity." Stanley Muschamp of the Inquirer commended the tonal of the Club and the expert conducting of Dr. Davison.

Mendelssohn's Elijah was sung in the Academy of Music Thursday evening by singers from the Choral Society, the Fortnightly Club, the N. Snellenburg & Co. Choral Society, and the Phoenixville Choral Society, under the direction of Henry Gordon Thunder. Among the soloists were Florence Kinnaird, Marie Stone Langston, Royal P. MacLellan, Henri Scott, E. Marie Townsend, Blanche Steitler, Sadye G. Kaplan, Margaret Kremer, Esther Endicott, Charles Hunsberger, Charles W. Munder, and Frances Sheridan. The principal soloists were highly commended in the press as was the work of the chorus and the conductor.

* * *

The third and final concert of their fifty-third season was given by the Orpheus Club, Dr. Arthur D. Woodruff conducting, in the Academy Wednesday. According to Sidney L. Laciar of the Public Ledger, "the organization has rarely sung better. . . . The club in its singing showed its usual fine balance of parts."

Lillian Gustavson was the assisting artist and, in Mr. Muschamp's words, her voice has "unusual beauty. The tone is clear and generally well managed." He also commented on her excellent taste and musicianship. Mr. Laciar wrote in the same vein.

Under the leadership of Fred Lyman Wheeler, the Atlantic Choral Society gave its eleventh semi-annual concert recently. Mr. Laciar commented on their "excellent singing" although he did not think their tonal balance all it should be. The soloists, members of the society, were Jean Benge, Arthur Catnach, Phyllis Stalker, Madeline Patton, and J. Brooks Greenwood.

* * *

The Main Line Choral Society was also heard in its first spring concert, William T. Bentz conducting. The sixty singers proved themselves worthy of the high standad they have set for themselves, according to the Ledger, in an interesting and varied program.

Moniuszko's opera, Flis, was presented at the last concert of the Polish Choral Society. The chorus, wrote Mr. Laciar, "sang with much spirit and good tone, although none too great in volume" and Walter K. Giggaitis conducted "admirably." The vocal and histrionic honors were carried off by Valentine Figaniak, added this writer, and other members of the cast were Philomena Vysocka, "whose charming stage presence as well as her singing made her characterization effective," Edward Rylewicz, Thaddeus Gorecki, John Zuchlinski, and Leon Cortilli. In the concert which preceded the opera, Messrs. Cortilli and Figniak and Mme. Janina Stanska took part.

* * *

Among the recitalists of recent days were Charles McCabe, "a talented young violinist" who, to further quote the Ledger, showed "a pleasing tone of fair size and an excellent rhythmic sense" in his recital; Fabien Sevitsky, assisted by Boris Koutzen, violinist, and Marie Dormont, soprano, who again displayed her "masterful technique and fine tone;" Franklin Riker, dramatic tenor, whose voice, barring an occasional throaty quality at the start, "is of beautiful quality, of ample power and is under perfect control in all the details of technique" (Mr. Laciar); and Frank Oglesby, who sang five airs by local composers and received the hearty applause of the large audience.

* * *

The Philadelphia Music Club gave its final bi-weekly concert of the season with a program made up entirely of the works of American composers. The assisting artists were Eugenie Miller, Caroline Wagner Greene, Florence Haenle, Irene Hubbard, Margaret Hughes Holmes, John B. Clothier, Raymond Vetter, Emily D. Moore, Mary Brooks Thompson, Ruth M. Barber, Dorothy Johnstone Bassler, and Mrs. Edward Phillips Lynch.

The seventeenth public concert of the Symphony Club took place not long ago in the Academy of Music. The Junior String Orchestra, the Senior String Orchestra, under the direction of Herman Weinberg, and a one hundred piece symphony orchestra, led by William F. Happich, took part in the program.

Photo by Mishkin

MME. THALIA SABANIEEVA, Greek Soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Was Heard in a New York Recital at Aeolian Hall Last Saturday Evening.

A program of music and dancing was offered by the Philadelphia Music Club at its "premiere Revue Nouvelle" on the evening of April 23 in the Academy. Several numbers were played by the Women's Symphony Orchestra, J. W. F. Leman conductor, and the chorus of the club sang. Ballets, recitations, a representation of the Death of Eurydice from Gluck's Orpheus, and excerpts from the opera Mireille completed the program.

* * *

The opening concert of the constructive art concerts was held in the Benjamin Franklin Hotel the next morning. The assisting artists were Edwin Swain, American baritone, and Princess Atalie.

Ohio Teachers Convene

Columbus, April 30.—The Ohio Music Teachers' Association held its convention here from the 20th to the 24th. Among the speakers were Herbert Witherspoon and Cecil Fanning. Social events, concerts, meetings and demonstrations occupied the period of the convention.

Will Honor Victor Herbert

Under the auspices of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, a concert in memory of the late Victor Herbert will be broadcasted through station WEAF on the evening of May 24. Various speakers and musicians will take part, and the program will include the performance of many of Herbert's compositions.

Philadelphians Close With Request Program

Franck Symphony and Scheherazade Popular Selection; Civic Orchestra Concert.

Philadelphia, May 4.—The annual "request" program was played last Friday and Saturday at the concluding pair of concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conducting.

Cesar Franck's D minor Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade Suite shared the program. "That they were made to go well together was due to the masterly guidance of the director and the superb playing of the orchestra," wrote Linton Martin in the North American, "not to any programmatic affinity." Stanley Muschamp (Inquirer) commented that the series of concerts this year have been directed "with marvelous interpretative power by Leopold Stokowski." The work of the orchestra and the conductor shared the plaudits of the other reviewers and both were accorded an ovation at the conclusion of the program.

* * *

The Civic Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Meyer Gorodetzer, gave a concert in the Academy of Music Sunday evening. The ambitious program included the Rienzi Overture, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

The soloist was Herman Weinberg, on of the first violins of the Philadelphia Orchestra, who played Wieniawski's D minor Concerto. Sidney L. Laciar of the Public Ledger thought "his technique was fluent, his rhythmic sense excellent, and his intonation perfect, besides which his conception of the work was admirable." Mr. Muschamp was agreed that "his temperament fits the music admirably and his technical equipment is ample to cope with the difficulties of the work."

This chronicler thought the program "well played with sincerity." Commendation of this organization, composed of one hundred Philadelphia musicians, was also forthcoming from other reviewers. Mr. Gorodetzer was presented with a loving cup on behalf of the members of the orchestra, and Edwin A. Fleisher, benefactor of the orchestra, was given a silver cigarette case.

CECILE de HORVATH
PIANIST
Management: Clarence E. Cramer, 1102 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.
Season 1925-1926 Now Booking
Baldwin Piano — De Luxe Welte-Mignon Records

GALLI-CURCI
Homer Samuels Pianist — Victor Records
Manuel Berenguer Flutist — Steinway Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE NEW YORK

SCHIPA
Victor Records — Mason & Hamlin Piano
Management Evans & Salter 527 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK

Julia Claussen
Mezzo-Soprano, Metropolitan Opera Company
MANAGEMENT: HAENSEL & JONES, Aeolian Hall, N. Y.

Friedberg
SEASON 1925-1926 IN AMERICA
Management: S. HUROK, Manhattan Opera House, New York City
Margaret Gordon Pringle, Personal Representative, Spring 8347, 9—10 A. M.
Steinway Piano

On The Music Highway

SAN FRANCISCO is celebrating its Fifth Annual Music Week from May 17 to May 23. One of the features of the activities of the week will be a series of concerts under the auspices of the Community Service and the Recreation League, who are arranging the observance of the Week, in one of the larger rooms of the San Francisco Public Library. These concerts will be in the nature of solo and ensemble recitals and of lectures on musical subjects with musical illustrations. The hall chosen seats between four and five hundred persons.

Henry Hadley will conduct for the remainder of this season the rehearsals of the Alliance Symphony Orchestra, an organization whose purpose is to give advanced students and semi-professional musicians an opportunity of acquiring orchestra routine. Richard Hageman, regular conductor of the orchestra, has accepted the invitation to conduct the summer concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra this season, and he will follow that work with the direction of Los Angeles opera in the fall.

On leaving the Alliance Symphony for this season Mr. Hageman was presented by the members with a leather music case in appreciation of his efforts in the development of the organization. The orchestra is still accepting members, who are not required to pay any fee and whose membership depends only on their musical ability and on their constant attendance at rehearsals. Rehearsals take place every Sunday morning, and the affairs of the orchestra are directed by the Educational Alliance, New York.

Lucy D. Bogue and Bernard R. Laberge announce the following list of artists under their management for the season of 1925-26: pianists—E. Robert Schmitz and Clara Haskil; organists—Charles Courboin, Alfred Hollins (Management East of the Mississippi, Alexander Russell, Concert Direction Wanamaker, New York; West of the Mississippi and Canada, Bogue-Laberge Concert Management); harpist—Marcel Grandjany; violinist—Robert Imandt; sopranos—Marya Freund, Rose Armandie and Laurie Merrill; tenor—Fernand Francell; conductors, composers, lecturers—Eugene Goossens, Clarence Gustlin, Darius Milhaud and Vladimir Golschmann.

Josiah Zuro selected for the eleventh free concert of the Sunday Symphonic Society on May 10 a special Music Week program. With the exception of Liszt's Les Preludes, the program was made up of American music, including one composition never before played.

Varying the arrangement of his concerts, Mr. Zuro offered an extra orchestral piece instead of the customary soloist. MacDowell's Indian Suite opened the program, and two excerpts from Cleopatra's Night, by Henry Hadley (the Intermezzo, with a flute solo by Paul Siebeneichen, and The Dance of the Desert Girls) were also given.

The work which had its first performance at the concert was a prelude by A. W. Binder, a New Yorker by birth and education. Mr. Binder in choirmaster of the Free Synagogue and director of music of the 92nd Street branch of the Young Men's Hebrew Association. He studied music at Columbia University with Daniel Gregory Mason and Cornelius Rybner. While there, he was awarded the Morganthau Fellowship for composition.

Frederic Warren will give his only ballad concert of the season at Aeolian Hall, New York, Thursday evening, with the co-operation of Olga Warren, coloratura soprano, Elizabeth Lennox, contralto, James Price, tenor, Edgar Schofield, baritone and Francis Moore at the piano. Mr. Warren's policy for the past five years, since he began giving this annual series of musical events, has been to give these songs in English. Last season five semi-monthly concerts were given. The present program will include solos, quartets, and a special song cycle for four voices.

Cecil Arden of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appeared in Princeton, N. J., on the evening of April 28, as soloist with the Princeton University Orchestra.

The London String Quartet sailed recently from Montreal after its season in this country. It will return here next January.

Florence Easton, Richard Crooks, the Cherniavsky Trio, Ethel Leginska and Julia Claussen have been booked for the Montgomery, Ala., concert course for next season.

After thirty-one weeks of grand opera presentations in over a hundred cities from coast to coast, Fortune Gallo brought the tour of his San Carlo Grand Opera Co. to a close on May 3, in Newark, N. J.

According to Mr. Gallo's statement, this was the most successful season in the history of this organization. The company will now disband. It will reassemble at the end of the summer for its season of 1925-26, which will begin with five weeks in the Century Theatre, New York, beginning on September 21.

A departure from Mr. Gallo's former policy was the presentation of opera in English for the first time by this company, the most important of which was the production of Bizet's Carmen in the vernacular in the Auditorium Theatre, home of the Chicago Civic Opera in Chicago. Mr. Gallo has announced his intention of establishing other operas in English in his repertoire for next season, including Faust, Haensel and Gretel and others, and while his Italian presentations will predominate, at least one performance in English will be given in each weekly engagement in the coming year.

Mrs. J. J. Carter, president of the Hollywood Bowl Association, is leaving Hollywood on her second tour across the United States at the invitation of about twenty cities. She will address audiences in these communities on the subject of the Hollywood Bowl and its achievement in the development of symphony music among the general public.

Mrs. Carter will return home in time to open the fourth season of the series "Symphony under the Stars," conducted by Fritz Reiner. The season will last eight weeks, with all admissions at twenty-five cents, and will probably present a number of guest conductors.

Allen McQuhae, tenor, has signed a contract to appear in concerts under the management of the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau for five more years. He is concluding his season this month with a number of festival and oratorio appearances.

Feodor Chaliapin gave his last New York recital of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday evening.

On the occasion of their second appearance before the Bohemian Club this season on April 6, each member of the New York String Quartet was presented with a silver loving cup inscribed: "With Expression of Highest Esteem to their Colleague—from the Bohemians, April 6, 1925."

At this meeting the Quartet assisted in the performance of Paolo Gallico's Septet for string quartet, piano, horn and contralto voice, with the composer at the piano. They have been engaged for the first public performance of this work on November 22, 1925, by the Friends of Music. On February 21 they played Kreisler's Quartet in A minor at the dinner given by the Bohemian Club in honor of Fritz Kreisler.

The Metropolitan Musical Bureau announces its list of artists for next season as follows: sopranos, Maria Jeritza, Anna Case, Queena Mario, tenors, Giovanni Martinelli, Tandy MacKenzie; baritone, Louis Graveure; pianists, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Harold Bauer, Ignatz Friedman; violinists, Jacques Thibaud, Bronislaw Huberman. Paul Whiteman and his orchestra are also being booked for a transcontinental tour under this management.

Harriette Mittelstaedt, soprano, was heard in recital in Chickering Hall, New York, yesterday evening with Edward Rechlin as accompanist.

America is to have a visit next season from Alfred Hollins, English blind organist and composer, who has not been in this country since his tour as pianist and organist in 1888. It is expected that Mr. Hollins will arrive about October 1, and remain until the middle of December, and will play recitals from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast, the tour to be under the direction of the New York Wanamaker Auditorium, which has presented Messrs. Dupre and Courboin in their tours.

Harold Samuel, English pianist, whose Bach recitals were heard here this season, has been engaged to appear as soloist with the Friends of Music next season in New York, playing a Bach concerto with orchestra.

Nina Morgana has been re-engaged for her sixth season at the Metropolitan Opera House, and in recognition of her achievements at this institution, her season has been extended from twelve to sixteen weeks. Miss Morgana has also been busy with concert appearances, her most recent concerts having been at Salem and Medford, Mass., on April 16 and 26 with the International concert at Town Hall, New York, on April 29 and Brooklyn on May 2.

Ernest von Dohnanyi, conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra, will present to the New York public a novel seating arrangement of the orchestra; his past experiences have convinced him that the following placing of the different instruments gives much better results than the traditional grouping. The violas will face the first violins, and have on their right the cellos; the second violins will be alongside of the first violins; the trombones and tuba will be placed at the conductor's left in the rear; tympani and percussion next to the tuba; string basses will be off the right centre rear; the balance of the orchestra in their usual positions.

For their third season the State Symphony Orchestra will give twenty subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall, divided into eight Saturday evenings, six Tuesday evenings, five Wednesday evenings and one Sunday afternoon included in the Wednesday evening series.

The first concert of the season will be conducted by Mr. Dohnanyi on the evening of October 21. Alfredo Casella will direct the second half of the season.

Jerome Swinford, American baritone, returned to New York to appear as soloist with the University Glee Club of New York at the Metropolitan Opera House on April 23, his fifth appearance with that organization in two years, after which he departed immediately for his second Southern tour this year.

On April 29 he sang at the University of North Carolina for the third time this season—incidentally his tenth engagement with the Glee Club of that institution this season. On May 2 Mr. Swinford sang at the Alabama College; on May 4 at the University of South Carolina; and tomorrow he sings his third recital in Norfolk, Va., within four seasons. The University of Florida has also booked Mr. Swinford for a recital.

WILLIAMS. BRADY
Teacher of Singing
Studio: 137 West 86th St., New York
Telephone: Schuyler 3580

CALVIN COXE
Tenor and Voice Teacher
Tone-Production, Diction
Complete Repertoire
570 West 156th St., New York City
Billings 1593

J. HENRI BOVE
FLUTE SOLOIST
Joint Recitals and Musicales
191 Claremont Ave. New York

BONCI
VOCAL STUDIO
For particulars regarding lessons apply directly to Signor Bonci at the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and 72nd Street. Telephone Endicott 1900.
New York City
Knabe Piano

Reviewers Applaud Rochester Concert

The critical verdict on the seven new American compositions played the morning of May 1 under the auspices of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, Howard Hanson conducting, was, on the whole, highly favorable.

Olin Downes of the New York Times wrote of the undertaking that "the general quality and technical standards of the compositions performed would appear to justify such a course. They would stand very favorable comparison with an average program of the modern musical societies who function during the season in New York." None of these works, continued Mr. Downes, "disclosed hitherto unknown masterpieces, but they were written by young men of talent and of considerable mastery of their medium."

According to F. D. Perkins (New York Herald Tribune), "the general impression was most encouraging—unexpectedly so." Mr. Perkins also commented that, "compared with the European novelties offered in New York in the season just closed, these American scores held their own remarkably well."

Aaron Copland's Cortege Macabre, to quote Mr. Downes, is the work of a young man with imagination, "experimenting with tonalities and instrumental timbres" with the distinction of "clarity and definiteness of development" and the defect of too great length. Mr. Perkins suggested that this young composer, whose symphony for organ and orchestra was heard in New York and Boston this winter, "should well bear watching." A. J. Warner of the Rohcester Times-Union considered his work "the most challenging" of the program. The composition "has something to say that is honest, straightforward and rhythmically free," added Mr. Warner. He was called a "frank ultra-modernist" by Mr. Perkins.

The Soliloquoy for Flute and Strings by Bernard Rogers, a pupil of Hans van der Berg, Ernest Bloch, and Percy Goetchius, showed "a soundness of taste and technique that would have commended the music on any concert program," wrote Mr. Downes. Mr. Rogers, continued this reviewer, has written simply and melodically and has contrived also to be personal and poetic. In Mr. Perkins' opinion, it seemed "one of the best adapted works of the morning's list for a regular symphony program—a simple, ingratiating melody over a well wrought background." Mr. Warner thought the work well written and that it created a definite sentiment.

The writing in William Quincy Porter's Ukrainian Suite, wrote Mr. Downes, is "concise and finished, and there is beautiful employment of modal harmony . . . the melodies have in themselves much distinction and poetry." According to Mr. Warner, the composer's sense of form is admirable.

George F. McKay's short symphony, From the Black Hills, was "tuneful" in Mr. Perkins' opinion, and Olin Downes observed that there were "youthful enthusiasm" and "a real breath of the hills" in the work, although it proved diffuse and indicative of outside influences.

Writing of Donald Tweedy's symphonic study, L'Allegro, F. D. Perkins commented that it showed effective use of orchestral coloring in spite of its length and lack of variety. Mr. Downes agreed that it was too long and spoke favorably of the orchestral coloring. Mr. Warner found it melodious. Adolph Weiss' I Segreti was, added Mr. Downes, "better concentrated and more modern in style" although lacking in congruity. Mr. Perkins considered it diffuse although skillfully orchestrated. This same defect of too great length was found by the reviewers in Mark Silver's Peace and War.

Mr. Perkins remarked on the excellent orchestral performance and asserted that "marked credit is due to Mr. Hanson for his skillful reading of the manuscript scores." In the words of Mr. Warner, he conducted "with a contagious conviction and an authority which he communicated to his musicians who gave him excellent support." Mr. Downes agreed.

Photo by Underwood

HOWARD HANSON,
Director of the Eastman School of Music, Conducted the First Rochester Philharmonic Concert of Manuscript Works of American Composers on May 1.

The W. W. KIMBALL CO. have added to their list of great artists

GEORGE LIEBLING

WORLD FAMOUS PIANIST-COMPOSER

who made such a sensation by his playing in New York and Chicago, the press calling him "the younger Paderewski" and "a Chopin player like de Pachmann."

Mr. Liebling will hold
MASTER CLASSES
from June 1st to August 1st at Kimball Hall, Chicago, Ill.

ONE FREE SCHOLARSHIP
Application should be made to Mr. Liebling's Secretary, Kimball Hall, Chicago, Ill.

PRESS NOTICES
"Rare faculty of re-creating the idea."—Olin Downes, New York Times
"One of the most interesting pianists of the season."—Edward Moore, Chicago

Management: HARRY & ARTHUR CULBERTSON
Aeolian Hall, New York 4832 Dorchester Avenue, Chicago
Mr. Liebling uses the KIMBALL PIANO throughout his tours in 1925-26
Welte-Mignon (Licensee) Reproducing Records

Musical Chicago En Courant

Music Week Activities Start With Meeting of Federation of Women's Organizations; Spring Concerts.

by HAZEL H. MOORE

Chicago, May 5.

CHICAGO'S MUSIC WEEK started its official activities with a breakfast and artists' revue at the Morrison Hotel on Monday noon, under the auspices of the Chicago Federation of Women's Organizations and with the endorsement of Vice-President Dawes and Mayor Dever, its two honorary chairmen. A long list of music reviewers with a sprinkling of theatrical confreres expressed opinions as to the most effective work possible of accomplishment by the women's clubs towards a more musical Chicago.

The artists' revue program, which followed, enlisted the services of Elizabeth Stokes, soprano; Robert Duenweg, tenor; Stella Wrenn, dramatic soprano; Joel Lay, baritone; Ebba Frederickson, violinist; Fred Wood, tenor; Edith Frost, coloratura soprano, and Harold Morris, baritone as well as various accompanists.

"Give more thought to music" has been adopted as the slogan of the week and as a start in the right direction the affiliated clubs of the federation have planned daily programs to take place in hospitals, institutions, community centers and clubs. Churches, schools, theatres and radio stations are active in cooperation. Prizes amounting to $50 will be awarded to Chicago boys and girls, between the ages of twelve and eighteen, for the best essay on What Music Means to Our City. The winner is invited to broadcast his essay.

A PARTICULARLY appealing benefit performance was given on Saturday by five hundred pupils of the Sherwood Music School, all between the ages of seven to fourteen years. The concert was for the benefit of children left destitute by the tornado in Southern Illinois. The funds realized will be distributed by the Illinois Children's Home and Aid Society. Daniel Protheroe conducted the chorus, in which tuition is free, and whose object is to train children's voices in preparation for the larger choral bodies of the city. Two young solists played piano numbers accompanied by the Sherwood Symphony Orchestra.

CHORAL SOCIETIES continue to exhibit their spring wares. Instead of the usual oratorio, the Swedish Choral Club offered an attractive program of part songs under the direction of Edgar Nelson, who has welded his small forces into a flexible and good-toned whole. The program included Latin sacred works and some a cappella singing in a Swedish group. Edna Swanson Ver Haar was a soloist to please the eye and ear, in her version of Donizetti's O Mio Fernando.

An interesting, if not entirely convincing, dramatization of oratorio was that of Elijah given at Orchestra Hall on Friday, by the united choirs of the new First Congregational Church, under the direction of George L. Tenney. There have been some thirty performances of this version in the churches throughout the city, and the capacity audience of Friday evening bore witness to the continued interest of the public.

The Orchestra Hall stage does not lend itself completely to such an undertaking, yet there was illusion and dignity to the performance. That the continuity of the oratorio might be unimpaired, occasional selections were read by Dr. Gilbert Wilson. The solists were Rollin Pease, as Elijah, Mrs. George L. Tenney as the widow, Lucy J. Hartman as the angel, Leon Jones as Obadiah, Dorothy Wilkins as Jezebel, Mary Crowther as the youth, and Tenney Ford as Ahab. The costumes were said to be direct from Syria.

CHARLES MARSHALL proved himself a best seller when he appeared as soloist in the Grand May Concert given by the Bellman and De Svenske Choruses. This was his first appearance as a singer of songs in Chicago's loop, but should not be his last.

The American wing of the Chicago Civic Opera tenors has been busy this week. Forrest Lamont furnished the program for the May meeting of the Friends of Opera, particularly converting the friends of opera to friends of Lamont in his English group, which included a new song by Mrs. Eleanor E. Freer, How Can We Know. The words were by Mrs. Edith Rockefeller McCormick.

Its performance by Mr. Lamont, with Isaac Van Grove at the piano, was the signal for prolonged applause for all concerned. The first edition of the song is to be sold as a benefit for the David Bispham memorial fund.

A RECENT ENGAGEMENT of the Chicago Civic Opera is that of Stella Norelli, who classifies as a lyric coloratura and brings considerable experience to her future duties at the Auditorium. Last season Miss Norelli made a coast to coast tour with her own company in a revival of Von Flotow's L'Ombra, under the auspices of the Associated Musical Bureaus of America. In private life Miss Norelli is the wife of Forrest Lamont. Thus is added another to the connubial pairs listed with the Chicago Opera.

A VERY YOUNG pianist played a very big program when eleven-year-old Rosalind Kaplan gave her recital at the Playhouse on Sunday. In fact Rosalind was the only small thing in evidence, as both her success and her audience were large. Maurice Rosenfeld proudly claims the young lady as his pupil. She has already had appearances with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Theatre Orchestra, and given several full length recitals.

CHICAGOANS lately stopped long enough to weep a tear at the fate of Pocahontas. Pocahontas was a highly intelligent dog. She was also the eyes of her blind master who for years has played the fiddle for all who would listen at the corner of the Auditorium Hotel, at Congress and Michigan.

At the appointed time Pocahontas, observing the traffic signal warily, would lead her master safely across the street. Last week she started on the correct signal, but now she is dead, struck by a car turning the corner. And the blind fiddler is no more at his post—his eyes are twice gone.

Sing Dramatized Elijah

Chicago Choral Performances Are Praised; Organist, Pianists, and Singers Give Recitals.

Chicago, May 7.—Two choral concerts had a prominent place on the list of musical attractions during the past week. Mendelssohn's Elijah was given in dramatic form by the united choirs of the New First Congregational church, under the direction of George L. Tenney, and the Bellman and de Svenske choruses, Otto C. J. Carlson conducting, sang in Orchestra Hall Sunday afternoon.

Among the recitalists were Hugh Porter, Zinaida Joelsohn, Benedict Saxe, Emilie Fulner, Rosalind Kaplan, Grace la Rocca and Clara Clemens, who concluded her series of historical song recitals.

The assisting artists who appeared in the dramatized form of Elijah were Rollin Pease, Mrs. George L. Tenney, Lucy J. Hartman, Leon Jones, Dorothy Wilkins, Mary Crowther, Tenney Ford, William Lester and Mrs. Walter Schmidt. Edward Moore of the Tribune thought the performance interesting, although Mendelssohn's music is not adapted to dramatic purposes. According to Maurice Rosenfeld of the News, he was spellbound by "the beauty of the performance, the imaginative talents of the director and his associates and by the work of the soloists and large chorus." Mr. Pease both sang and acted well, wrote Mr. Moore, and the other soloists were highly praised by both Mr. Moore and other reviewers.

* * *

The soloists at the other choral concert were Charles Marshall, Ebba Frederickson and Elsa Soderstam. The chorus, led by Mr. Carlson, showed "a commendable ensemble and a tone quality which, with further training, will develop into higher musical grades," wrote Mr. Rosenfeld.

Mr. Marshall, according to this writer, sang "with beautiful tone, musical style and interpretative art of the first order." In Mr. Moore's opinion he sang with "gorgeous tones," but Karleton Hackett of the Post thought his style a bit heavy. Glenn Dillard Gunn wrote in the Herald Examiner that Mr. Marshall's diction, tone and style were excellent, although his songs were unworthy of his voice. Miss Frederickson's playing of Wieniawski's Polonaise Brillante received commendation.

* * *

Hugh Porter's organ recital in Kimball Hall Monday evening was marked by variety of coloring, sure technique, power and brilliance, in Mr. Hackett's opinion. "Excellent knowledge of the technique and the color possibilities of the organ" were evidenced in his playing, according to the Tribune. His talent, appreciation for the capacities of his instrument and excellent technique were praised by Mr. Gunn.

* * *

Zinaida Joelsohn, pianist, and Emilie Fulner, contralto, were heard in joint recital at the last concert of the Young American Artists' Series. The young pianist, to quote Mr. Gunn, "played with dramatic intensity, as well as with evident knowledge of the text, its musical and poetic meanings, its pianistic opportunities and disadvantages." Mr. Rosenfeld asserted that she played with "brilliant technique, with a full, round, musical tone and with uncommonly fine interpretative force." Mr. Moore was less enthusiastic.

Miss Fulner's voice, said Mr. Rosenfeld, "had depth and a warm quality phrasing which showed intelligence and clear enunciation of the text." The native quality of her voice was thought attractive by Mr. Gunn.

* * *

A piano recital was given in Kimball Hall by Benedict Saxe Thursday evening. Mr. Gunn found him the "fortunate possessor of a great talent," although he is unschooled and lacks the skill gained through expert training. The writer in the Post commented that Mr. Saxe "evidenced musical temperament and will gain in accuracy and self command with further study and experience." According to Mr. Rosenfeld, he disclosed musical talent and good technique.

* * *

Another pianist of the week was eleven-year-old Rosalind Kaplan, who appeared at the Playhouse Sunday. To quote the Post, she showed "comprehension of the music and the beginnings of individuality" as well as an instinct for playing the piano. Mr. Moore observed that she has "highly developed keyboard facility and an imperturbable poise." In the opinion of Mr. Rosenfeld, she is endowed with appreciation for the music and puts into its production "vitality, clear and intelligent articulation and interpretation." Mr. Gunn admired her mechanical facility and dramatic power.

* * *

Helen Peterson Barth, contralto, was heard April 23 in a joint recital with Robert Lyle Malone, tenor. Mr. Gunn wrote that she displayed a voice "of much richness and ample power" and that Mr. Malone "has much style but little tone, fine diction but limited breath control."

In Mr. Rosenfeld's opinion, Mrs. Barth "disclosed a deep, well colored contralto voice which has both power and range. She sang seriously and effectively." He thought that the tenor's voice "proved pliable and well produced." Karleton Hackett commented that she has good quality and range and sang "with musical feeling." The individual timbre and the interpretative power evidenced in Mr. Malone's singing were admired by this writer. "Excellent tone and a fine feeling for the dramatic in song" were attributed of Mrs. Barth's singing, wrote Mr. Moore, who thought that Mr. Malone disclosed a pleasant voice and good enunciation.

MME. TAMAKI MIURA

Lyric Soprano, Just Returned From Her Season's Tour With the San Carlo Opera Company, Will Sing in New York in an Aeolian Hall Recital Tomorrow Evening.

Washington Music

(Continued from page 6)

instrument as the violin seldom has been played here before."

The Harvard Glee Club was perhaps more effective than ever before, reported the Star. The program "varied greatly in mood and period," according to the writer in The Star, who found the religious music as done by the choir particularly impressive.

Mention must also be made of the concluding concert of the series by American composers for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony, made up of works by Bruno Huhn, who was assisted in their presentation by Raymond Moore, Gretchen Hood and the Monday Morning Music Club; of the third and fourth of the series of Promenade Concerts at the Hotel Mayflower, featuring respectively Frederic Dixon, pianist, and James Stanley, baritone, and Grace Devine, soprano, Caryl Bensel, mezzo, Rubby Gerard, violinist, and Walter Mills, baritone; of a violin recital by fifteen year old Milton Schwartz, recently winner of the grand prize for violin offered by the Music Week Association of New York City, and formerly a pupil of Josef Kaspar of this city; and of a recital by the De Sayn String Quartet, consisting of Elena De Sayn, Frieda Irwin, Lydia Brewer and Herman Sevely.

M. G. S.

Soloists in Minneapolis While Orchestra Tours

Minneapolis, May 3.—Varied recitals and musicals have attracted music lovers here since the departure of the Symphony Orchestra on its spring tour. Mr. Verbrugghen's forces, assisted by Marie Tiffany, soprano, began their outside series of thirty-three concerts in Aberdeen, S. D., on April 20, and will return to this city on May 25.

The Civic Music League ended its season in the ballroom of the Leamington on April 27. Paul Oberg, pianist; Otto Jellison, tenor; George Klass, violinist; Elsie Wolf, pianist; Agnes Rast Snyder, contralto, and a piano trio consisting of Karl Scheurer, Abe Pepinsky and Clyde Stephens took part.

The final Thursday Musical of the season presented at the Garrick Theatre Annette Yde Lake, soprano; Margaret Hicks Schmitt, pianist; James A. Bliss, pianist, and Mrs. John F. Dahl, accompanist.

An unusual concert was that of Martha Swensson, pianist and composer, assisted by the Beethoven String Quartet in a concert partly made up of her own music. This program was given in the MacPhail School Auditorium on April 22. Other recent recitalists were Alma Mehus, pianist; G. H. Fairclough, organist, who dedicated the new organ of the University of Minnesota, and Ethel Adams Sherman, soprano, together with Else Jache, pianist.

Baltimore Musicians Win Prizes

Kansas City, May 6.—Three prizes offered by the Friends of American Music, founded by N. Derubertis, for compositions by American citizens have been awarded to two Baltimore composers. Gustave Strube won a prize of $1,000 for his Violin Concerto, and another of $400 for his Arlequinade, a scherzo for string quartet. Theodore Hemberger also won a $400 prize for a chamber composition. Both these composers were born in Germany. Gustave Mehner of Grove City, Pa., won honorable mention for his Romantic Suite, a piece of chamber music. The judges were Henry Hadley, Chalmers Clifton, and Rubin Goldmark. No songs or piano compositions submitted were considered worthy of prizes.

Rothwell Offered Many Novelties

Twenty-three compositions new to Los Angeles and twelve new to Philharmonic audiences were offered by Walter Henry Rothwell on his programs of the Los Angeles organization during the season just closed. These novelties were included all in the fourteen pairs of subscription concerts and the twelve pops. Ravel's La Valse, Honegger's Pacific 231, and John Alden Carpenter's Perambulator Suite attracted most interest among the new works.

Geni Sadero Sings in Costume

Costumed as a Southern peasant girl, Geni Sadero, Italian soprano, gave a recital at Columbia University a week ago Saturday. She sang a number of folk songs, playing her accompaniments herself, and spoke briefly before each of these numbers. All of them were songs which she herself gathered among the peasants and sailors of Italy.

ADELA VERNE
DISTINGUISHED ENGLISH PIANIST—IN AMERICA: SEASON 1924-1925
Management George Engles, Aeolian Hall, New York STEINWAY PIANO

MUZIO
CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: Harrison & Harshbarger, 1322 Kimball Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Personal Representative: Ottavio Scotto, Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK
PIANIST—AN AMERICAN ARTIST
STEINWAY PIANO
Management: MARGARET RICE, 414 Milwaukee Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

FORREST LAMONT
TENOR CHICAGO CIVIC OPERA COMPANY
Management: Harry and Arthur Culbertson 4853 Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Aeolian Hall, New York

IN CONTINENTAL CAPITALS

Orchestral Leaders Visit Milan

Scherchen and Foch Conduct Symphony Concerts; Raisa Returns to La Scala; Other Operas.

The Musical Digest Foreign Correspondents:
J. B. BAUER, Damenstiftstrasse, 16-3 MUNICH, Germany.
VICTOR BELAIEV, Novinsky Boulevard 117, lodg 4, MOSCOW, Russia.
FEDERICO CANDIDA, 12 via Palermo, MILANO, Italy.
ARTHUR KURSCHNER, 48 Hauptstrasse, BERLIN, Germany.
PAUL LEWINSON, 21 Maresfield Gardens, LONDON, N. W. 3, England.
PAUL STEFAN, Hamerlingplatz, VIENNA 8, Austria.
IRVING SCHWERKE, 22 Rue Copernic, PARIS, France.

Milan.

Ermanno Scherchen and Dirk Foch were the two conductors of the latest symphony concerts here in the Salone Gallignani. Walter Gieseking was soloist in the concert of the latter, and Salomea Krusceniska assisted in the program of Scherchen two weeks later (April 17). Meantime on April 11 the latter conductor had made his first Milan appearance in a program without a soloist.

Signora Krusceniska sang four Lieder of Richard Strauss and Cesar Franck's Nocturne. The rest of Scherchen's program consisted of Handel's Concerto No. 26 (Feuerwerkmusik), Schubert's Second Symphony, Arthur Honegger's Pacific 231, and Alfredo Casella's Italia. Strangely enough the Schubert performance was an Italian premiere!

Signora Krusceniska displayed the same style and purity of voice which she has shown La Scala audiences in the past. Concert-goers in Milan have not forgotten her Isolde.

Audience Interested

The performance of the orchestral part of the program aroused interest in the audience, although enthusiasm is hardly the word to describe the reception of the music. The Handel, the Schubert, and the Casella (a youthful work of this composer) were all pleasing to the audience.

The same must be said of Pacific 231, as far as most of the listeners were concerned. A number of those who were present were surprised by the nature of this music, and began to hiss it violently. The rest applauded. There was a short struggle between the applause and the disapproval. Honegger won the day, without a doubt.

The reviewers of the newspapers were not inclined to like the music as much as were the members of the audience. They attacked Honegger regardless of his popular success in the Salone Gallignani. They did not criticise him on the ground that he was going beyond the bounds of the art of music by his attempt to portray the romantic feelings engendered in him by a locomotive in its midnight flight. They found fault with the result, although the approval of the audience in a way was evidence that Honegger had pictured his impressions in music with full success. Scherchen's first concert offered the Stravinsky Pergolesi Pulcinella Suite, and other familiar numbers.

Foch's Concert

Walter Gieseking was greeted by press and audience as one of the most important pianists whom Milanese have had an opportunity to hear in some time. He played with Dirk Foch and the orchestra Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, and assisted also in de Falla's Nuit Dans les Jardins d'Espagne.

The reviewers commented in a laudatory vein on his velvet touch and the finesse and ease of his technique. He showed no tendency to bang the keyboard beyond its capacity to resound clearly and musically, but displayed in every range of dynamics a studious care of pure pianism. He avoided sentimentality, but played his music with a contagious spirit and sense of its mood.

The de Falla piece was new to Milan at this concert. It made the impression of a certain monotony in its color and in its melodic style, but was attractive none the less. The Debussy influence was marked.

The rest of the program, which was long, included a novelty of Malipiero, his La Bottega da Caffe, and Sior Todero Brontolon; Franck's D minor Symphony, and Wagner's Rienzi Overture.

The Malipiero pieces are two short items based on the Commedie Goldoniane. The brilliant rhythm of the first of them was particularly effective. The other chose as a subject for portrayal a stout man with a grouch. Of course it was funny.

Dirk Foch was warmly applauded, but his reception was not extraordinary. Gieseking, on the other hand, won quite an ovation.

Rosa Raisa Returns

Rosa Raisa, who created the leading soprano role of Boito's Nerone at La Scala a year ago, returned here on April 13, and sang Asteria again. The word "create" is particularly in point in this case, for Milanese opera-goers are of the unanimous opinion that vocally and dramatically she has already become inseparably connected with the interpretation of Boito's heroine, and no one can quite take her place.

A capacity audience flocked to La Scala on this occasion and obviously was astonished to find it was enjoying the same sensations of enthusiasm and pleasure that it had experienced at the premiere of Nerone a year ago. The reviewers exhausted their vocabularies in praise of Mme. Raisa's singing and the manner in which she molded her voice to the style of Boito. Their conclusion was that Raisa is for the present, at least, the one and only Asteria.

Very much the same sort of thing was said in praise of Marcel Journet (Simon Mago). The reviewers felt that hardly any other interpreter of this part is conceivable. They lauded the way he dramatized every line of his part, whether it was melodic or declamatory, and the variety of his characterization, convincing in whatever situation Mago finds himself. Raisa and Journet were called by one writer veritable collaborators of Boito.

Although there was so much praise for these two artists the newspaper observers and the audience were not blind to the virtues of the rest of the production. Signora Bertana was the same Rubria as of last year, and the tenor Pertile similarly maintained the high standard that was the rule at the premiere of Nerone. The baritone Franci sang the part of Fanuel, and the basso Autori took the place of Pinza as Tigellino.

The scenery was as effective as ever, and Toscanini's strength dominated the entire ensemble. The rhythm, power, and interpretative abilities of the chorus and orchestra were molded by him into a general effect which was perfectly precise and ordered.

Gluck's Orfeo Presented

Oddly enough it took an opera of Gluck, his Orfeo, to show the scenic resources of La Scala at their best. The public was surprised at this phenomenon when the opera was revived there on April 4. It seemed queer that at a time when La Scala has not the resources to present a perfect Manon of Puccini it can put on such an excellent Orfeo.

The explanation of the miracle is simply that there was available for Gluck's masterpiece an adequate contralto, Fanny Anitua, whose voice has not only an original beauty and power, but also training of the first order. Perhaps it is not to be compared with the great voices of once upon a time, such as those of Fabbri, Guerrini, Delma, and Vidal, but in these days one must learn not to ask too much.

The direction of the opera by Toscanini was typical—which is to say that it was all that can be asked in vigor, clarity, rhythmic surety, and beauty of tone. The remainder of the cast was largely responsible for the success of Orfeo. Maria Zamboni was well adapted to the soprano role of Euridice, which cannot be said of her appearance recently in Manon Lescaut. Cesarina Valobra was a good Amore. The ensemble effect of the stage work, the costumes, and the scenery was of the best.

Rigoletto a Modest Success

The single annual performance of Rigoletto took place on April 9. The success of the performance was at best modest, although as far as Toscanini was concerned the performance was worthy of a better lot.

More than one of the elements of the production approached very closely to absolute mediocrity. The tenor de Paolis has not the vocal means and art for a sufficient portrayal of the part of the Duke of Mantua. Signora Capsir had some good moments during the evening, and some that were not so good.

The main trouble with this performance of Rigoletto was that the public could remember only too well some of the singers who have been in it in recent years, for example Toti dal Monte, Lauri-Volpi, and Fleta. Signora Capsir's voice has agility and range, but the tone quality is imperfect, and her phrasing not impressive.

The baritone Franci sang well for the most part, and acted with skill and conviction, but his voice was not all that it might have been in the mezza voce passages. At any rate he was rather the most successful of the cast as far as the audience was concerned. The secondary parts were competently sung, and the mise-en-scene much admired.

Panizza Stands Out

In the production of La Wally at La Scala at the end of March the conducting of Ettore Panizza stood out in high relief against the other elements of the presentation. The protagonist, Valeria Manna, has a voice that is clear and limpid enough, but it cannot be said that she is of the great line of sopranos even of recent years. Franco Lo Giudice, who was successful with the leading tenor role in I Cavalieri di Ekebu, was not so well placed in La Wally in the part of Hagenbach,

(Continued on page 17)

Estelle Liebling
SOPRANO
145 West 55th St. Telephone
New York City Circle 8815

GUSTLIN
American Opera
Interp-Recitals
BOGUE-LABERGE CONCERT MANAGEMENT
130 West 42nd St., New York City
CHICKERING PIANO

The Cleveland Institute of Music
ERNEST BLOCH, Director
SIX WEEKS SUMMER SCHOOL JUNE 22—AUGUST 1
Complete courses in all branches of music under regular faculty
Master Class under ERNEST BLOCH
in Pedagogy, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form and Fugue
Master classes in piano, violin and cello under Beryl Rubinstein, Andre de Ribaupierre and Victor de Gomez
For Summer Catalogue write: Registrar, 2827 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

OLD-WORLD HIGHLIGHTS

London Awaits Opera's Coming

Music Activity Lulls; Native Compositions Performed by Philharmonic; a New Coloratura Soprano.

London.

For the end of April, as for the next few May days, there is not much activity to report from London—the "lull before the storm" has come, to be broken into when the grand opera season, attended on by many recitals, begins on May 18. However, the British National Opera Company is in the midst of a suburban season at the Golders Green Hippodrome, as near as it will get to London this year. Evidently the revival of foreign opera at Covent Garden, begun last year, has had its effect on the smaller organization.

The B. N. O. C. still keeps up its tradition of good repertory, having on its bills for this week, April 27, Pelleas and Melisande, the first London production of the new At the Boar's Head, Gianni Schicchi, and Hugh the Drover as well as more usual items from the French and Italian lists.

All-British Program

At the last concert of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, an all-British program was presented, conducted by Dr. Malcolm Sargent. Harold Samuel assisted in the premiere of a Piano Concerto by Herbert Howells. The other numbers included the previously, if not often, heard Garden of Fand by Arnold Bax, John Ireland's symphonic fantasy Mai-Dun, Vaughan Williams' Pastoral Symphony, and Lord Berners' Spanish Fantasy.

"Naturally," says the Daily Telegraph, "the new work was the principal event, and was the most discussed. In form it is conventional enough, being cast three movements, although there is no actual break. In matter it is probably as English—as we understand the definition musically—as any work that has been produced since the war. In spirit it impressed one as being honest, vivacious, healthy, and free of affectations (if not free of influences, which is another story). Its quality, if not throughout of fine-spun gold, is individual and highly personal. This young composer has been inclined to run a theme to earth, to chase it through one movement into another, altering its character or accent to suit the mood required. It is not really a good scheme, unless it is carried out with the psychological purpose and skill of an Elgar. What Mr. Howells has done is to delight us with a very fresh and lively tune and play variations on it."

New Viola Concerto

Another English premiere occurred at an earlier London Symphony concert; a Viola Concerto by Yorke Bowen, given a performance "simply beyond praise" by Lionel Tertis. George Schneevoigt conducted, and his readings were "notable chiefly for high colors and strong emphasis," says the Telegraph. A Haydn symphony suffered from this rather incongruous treatment, although the Eroica came through "exceedingly well."

This procession of nationalistic programs was added to by the Bach Choir, at whose concert a first performance was given the Lyke-Wake Dirge of W. G. Whittaker. Trying to the chorus, this was still a dramatic setting of a traditional Northern poem by itself most impressive. Palestrina's mass Assumpta Est Maria, not often heard, was welcomed by the critics, although not as carefully prepared as its difficulties require.

Two recitalists have appeared. Frederic Lamond made a reappearance which greatly added to his laurels as a technician and an earnest and sincere interpreter. And Aida Poggetti, a coloratura from Brazil, chose the Capitol Theatre, a great new cinema hall, to make a debut under conditions so difficult that her technical adeptness was all that could be sufficiently judged. P. L.

British Musicians Aid Schools

London.—British musicians have formed an Educational Council to cooperate with the schools in the teaching of music. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, former Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, is chairman of the Council, and Percy Scholes, music critic, is Honorable Secretary. Mr. Scholes conducted a series of four Saturday morning lecture-recitals for children in Aeolian Hall as a first step in the activities of the Council. The lecture-recitals took place between March 14 and April 4.

Present Adapted Mozart Opera

Glasgow.—The Carl Rosa Opera Company presented Kingsley Lark's adaptation of Mozart's The Impresario at the Theatre Royal on March 26. Mr. Lark has added three airs from other rarely heard operas by this composer and reduced the number of characters to five. The cast included Kingsley Lark, John Kelly, W. Parkyn Newton, Maud Neilson, and Evelyn Birks. Excerpts from Lucia di Lammermoor were given the same evening.

ALFREDO CASELLA,
Italian Pianist and Composer, Who in His American Visit Next Season Will Not Only Make Solo Appearances, but Will Also Conduct the State Symphony Orchestra in a Number of Its Concerts.

La Cena Wins Naples Success

Naples.—Following its premiere in La Scala of Milan, Giordano's newest opera, La Cena delle Beffe, triumphed in its first production in this city at the San Carlo Theatre on March 25. The author of the book, Sem Benelli, and the composer were present. There were nine curtain calls for the principals at the end of each of the first three acts, and eleven at the close of the final act.

The performance, under the direction of Gino Marinuzzi, revealed all the beauties of which Giordano's score is capable. The tenor Capuzzo displayed a voice of power, good tone, and clarity, and Mariano Stabile, baritone, sang always with aggressiveness, good style and expression. Signora Cervi-Caroli was as fresh and lively in bearing as in voice, in the role of Ginevra. F. C.

Wales Hears Beethoven Cycle

London.—Herbert Ware's orchestra is providing South Wales with the opportunity of hearing all of Beethoven's Symphonies. The "Immortal Nine" are being presented in rotation by Mr. Ware, with prefatory lectures by Professor Rowsby Woof of the Royal Academy.

Foreign Notes

Prague.—The Prague Music Festival will start on May 15 and end May 20. There will be three concerts by the International Society for New Music, one choral concert, and two operas. The Society's concerts will take place on Friday, Sunday, and Tuesday, with programs that have already been announced.

The choral program on Sunday will include works for male voices by Axman, Foerster, Janacek, Jeremias, Ostreil, Vomacka, and Zich; and Ladislav Vycpalek's Kantante von den Letzten Dingen der Menschen, for soloists, mixed chorus, and orchestra. The Monday opera performance will be Janacek's three act work, Das Schlaue Fuechslein. The final opera performance on Wednesday will be that of Dukas' Ariane et Barbe-bleue.

Rome.—Madeleine Keltie, American soprano, made her Roman debut on April 26 in the title role of La Tosca at the Costanzi Theatre.

London.—Pavlowa will begin a month's engagement in Covent Garden at the end of September.

Rome.—Paderewski played an all-Chopin program at the Augusteum on May 4 for the benefit of the war orphans.

Milan.—Georgette Leblanc sang songs of Debussy and recited verses of d'Annunzio on April 1 at the Milan Conservatory.

Madrid.—Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner have been recent orchestral conductors here.

Brussels.—Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire had this season its local premiere. The audience was both for and against.

Vienna.—The Philharmonic Orchestra will tour Europe in June under the direction of Bruno Walter.

Utrecht.—The four days festival which is to be held here in October in honor of the jubilee of the Nederlandsche Toonkunstenaars Vereenignig (Dutch Musical Artists' Association) which was founded in 1875, will be devoted to music by Dutch composers.

Turin.—A tablet in honor of Gaetano Bavagnoli, conductor of the Teatro Regio, and formerly of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, was recently unveiled in the Camera di Commercio here.

Berlin.—After an interval of twelve years the Schleswig Music Festival will take place again this year at Goerlitz. Willem Furtwaengler is to conduct, and the Schleswig Choral Society and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra will take part. Works of Bach, Brahms, Beethoven, Bruckner, Mozart, and Strauss will be performed.

Berlin.—The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra will extend its German tour this year to Holland.

"Music & Letters"
FOUNDED 1920
The British Musical Quarterly
100 pages: 20s per annum post free to any part of the world
"Music and Letters is the best thing of its kind that is published, and forms a valuable addition to the library."—Musical Standard, August 23rd, 1924.
LONDON: 22, ESSEX STREET, W. C. 2

ABBY MORRISON
SOPRANO SAN CARLO GRAND OPERA COMPANY
Concert Management: H. J. ANDERSEN, 67 East 55th Street, New York City
Telephone Plaza 7147

Ethyl HAYDEN
Lyric Soprano
Management: Loudon Charlton—Carnegie Hall, New York

FOREIGN MUSIC ACTIVITIES

French Notables at Benefit Opera

Claudia Victrix Sings in Massenet's Sapho; American Pianists and Soprano Give Paris Recitals.

Paris.

A charity performance for the benefit of the Maison des Journalistes was given at the Opera Comique on the evening of April 24. The president of the French Republic, Gaston Doumergue, was among the many notables present.

The opera chosen for the occasion was Sapho, libretto by MM. Henri Cain and Bernede after the famous novel of Alphonse Daudet, music by Massenet.

The principal feminine role was interpreted by Claudia Victrix, who, according to the New York Herald (Paris edition) is "endowed with a very fine voice and real dramatic feeling." The Herald also remarked that "the voice of Mme. Victrix is very soft, rising with ease to the sharpest notes; her articulation is clear and expressive, and her gestures are always appropriate to the action."

The reviewer of Le Petit Journal declared that her voice is "warm, pure, wide in range, managed with consummate artistry," and that the singer "made child's play of all the difficulties of the score." Le Figaro was none the less enthusiastic in praise of Mme. Victrix: "Gifted with a voice of sumptuous beauty, she impersonated Daudet's heroine with extraordinary emotional power, tenderness, charm and melancholy." "Sapho by her," said the observer of Le Petit Parisien, "is intense," and at one and the same time are enjoyed "her exquisite voice, her histrionic art and the ovations she received."

The orchestra for this performance of Sapho was conducted by M. Andre Balbis. The role of Jean Gaussin was sung with "ardor and feeling" by the tenor Devries; Divonne was sung by Germaine Baye, Cesaire by M. Azema, Caoudal by M. Sauvageot and Irene by Mlle. Coiffier.

American Pianist Impresses

Of the many piano recitals given the past week none made a deeper impression than that of the American, Jacques Jolas. His program ranged from ancient to modern music and was played, Paul Le Flem wrote in Comoedia "with breadth and a fine feeling for plans and values. . . . His tone is ample and ringing," and in his interpretation of a Scarlatti sonata and the Toccata of Pasquini, Mr. Jolas played with "finesse," and set off their "details with delicacy."

The Chicago Tribune writer, commenting on Mr. Jolas' reading of the Bach-Busoni Fantaisie in G minor, called attention to his "scrupulous care in the shaping of his phrases" and the mightiness of his "left hand thunder." The Schumann Fantaisie (Op. 17) was "splendidly accomplished technically," and was "beautiful in color, romantic glow and bizarre passion." The last movement was "a song of infinite sweetness."

Another piano recital was that of Willard MacGregor, also an American. The New York Herald found this youthful artist "an excellent musician," capable of putting "swing and energy into his playing, although he might be reproached with too great a use of the pedal."

Comoedia admired his "supple technic," "delicious sonority," and "artistic style," while to the Chicago Tribune reviewer his tone was "dry," his rhythms lacked "control," and his music without "meaning." The Tribune, however, predicted a good future for him, provided "he could be persuaded of the foregoing wants of balance."

Florence Bowes Sings

Florence Bowes, an American soprano, who gave a song recital one evening last week, "has a charming voice," wrote Comoedia. That journal after calling attention to certain technical faults and the fact that her French was pronounced "with a certain love of fantasy," commended her style, which is of a "delightful and cordial freedom." The Chicago Tribune praised her Italian diction, but called her French pronunciation "bad," and adjectived her voice as "agreeable, well trained" and "discreetly" used.

For her first seance Maud Allan, who is giving a number of dance recitals in Paris, had only a small audience. She interpreted music of Chopin, Rachmaninoff, Albeniz, etc., in all of which, according to the Chicago Tribune, "she seemed to please her clients." The plasticity of her hands and arms was much admired.

JACQUES JOLAS
American Pianist Who Made a Favorable Impression in a Recent Paris Recital.

The New York Herald reported that "her claim to distinction rests more on beauty of facial expression and harmony of action than on proficiency in the art of dancing." The Excelsior chronicler wisely remarked that there was only one thing wrong with Miss Allan's ambition to conquer Paris, namely, "the attack is a bit late; in art one must not finish, one must commence, with Paris."

He termed the dancer "an Isadora Duncan for the music hall," that is, the music hall of England, not the French variety. . . . "In gracefulness and charm Miss Allan revealed precious qualities," and the ensemble of her performance is a spectacle "of a very pretty quality of art, and it leaves a harmonious souvenir for the eye."

Two Piano Recital

Mlle. Amparo and Jose Iturbi played two-piano compositions the other evening at the Salle Gaveau. In some of their numbers they were assisted by a double string quintet directed by the famous young Spanish composer, Manuel Infante.

In the Mozart D major Sonata, the pianists were admirable in the first and last movements, "but in the second," complained the Tribune, "they revealed what practically every modern pianist reveals when he gets to a Mozart Andante or Adagio:—that he is in water beyond his depth."

Comoedia was much in favor of the "personal style of playing" of the two artists, "their good taste in tone and their frank rhythms" which give such a special interest to their evocations.

IRVING SCHWERKE.

Mediocre Casting Mars La Scala Presentations

(Continued from page 15)

where the tonal thickness of his voice was oppressive.

The third member of the cast, who did not raise the standard of the evening appreciably, was the baritone Carlo Morelli, the Gellner. Of average merit were the Afra of Signora Masetti-Bassi, and the Walther of Signora Valobra. Better were the basso Autori (Strominger), and the baritone Baracchi (Pedone di Schnals).

Besides the conducting of Panizza the other outstanding feature of the production were the settings of Edoardo Marchioro.

La Wally Suffers

All of the descriptive poetry and the elegiac sense of the score of Puccini were clearly brought out under the baton of the conductor. It was fortunate that he was the helmsman in the difficult passage of the evening, otherwise the entire production of La Wally might have gone astray. One is inclined to wonder nevertheless whether the management did not make a mistake in putting on this performance in view of the interpretative material it had at hand. The opera requires and merits a stronger cast than La Scala gave it on this occasion, and even if one concur that Panizza's conducting was a noteworthy feature of the season, the question still remains whether he would not have spent his efforts better in the direction of an opera which circumstances would permit to be better presented.

There is the question also of the danger which the reputation of the opera itself is forced to undergo in such presentation of its qualities. La Wally judged on the basis of the recent Scala performance is a different opera from what Panizza could make it if he had the materials with which to work.

FEDERICO CANDIDA.

Anton BILOTTI Pianist
Management: Lionel Powell & Holt, London, England
Steinway Piano Welte-Mignon Records Exclusively

Each issue of The Musical Digest in PARIS and MILANO will be found in MILANO, Italy
at the news stands of
ALCANI E TERRAZZI
Piazza della Scala
and
NATALE DONISELLI
Piazza Duomo
(opposite Santa Radegonda) in PARIS, France
at the Messagerie de Journeaux
LIBRARIE HACHETTE
111 Rue Reaumur
and all its branches

D'ARLE
Metropolitan Opera Company

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS
BARITONE
MANAGEMENT R. E. JOHNSTON 1451 Broadway, New York
KNABE PIANO BRUNSWICK RECORDS

Fleta
METROPOLITAN OPERA COMPANY

THE STUDIO EASY CHAIR

RAYMOND C. ROBINSON, of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, gave an organ recital in Jordan Hall, Boston, last Friday evening. His program included works of Bonnet, Bach, Widor, Mulet, Karg-Elert, Mozart, Dunham, and Vierne.

Siri Engman, a pupil of Richard Czerwonky, of the Bush Conservatory of Music, won the Junior violin prize offered by the Chicago Artist Association in their annual prize competition.

Henriette Blackwell, contralto, was awarded the $200 scholarship of the Bush Conservatory Chapter of Sigma Alpha Iota, national musical sorority, last week. The contest which was held under the direction of Lyravine Votaw, member of the sorority, was entered by a large number of contestants, of whom Miss Blackwell was chosen. The judges were Charles La Borge, Emerson Abernathy, and Mrs. W. S. Bracken.

Mae Graves Atkins, soprano of Bush Conservatory, reports many activities by her pupils. Among them are Villas Johnson, baritone, Helen Smith, soprano, and William Balhatchet, tenor, who sang several trios from The Creation for Radio Station WMAQ, April 25.

Genevieve Dunn, former student of Mrs. Atkins, is coaching with Mrs. Atkins preparatory to a concert tour. She is soprano soloist at the First Methodist Church of Jackson, Michigan, and besides many concert engagements she has a large class.

Under the auspices of the Department of Fine Arts of Athens College, Athens, Alabama, a certificate piano recital was given on the evening of May 6. This was the nineteenth recital of the season at the College. Lorine Henderson and Sarah Orman took part. They were assisted by Marie Talley, violinist, and Benjamin Peck, tenor.

Two days later another piano recital was given by Myra Courington and Willie Mae Johnston, assisted by Miss Orman and by Minnie Manson Godsey, violinist.

Cornell University, in Ithaca, N. Y., has announced its thirty-fourth summer session from July 6 to August 14. The courses in music offered are: Harmony, Professor H. D. Smith; Musical Appreciation, Form, and Design, Professor Kinkeldey; History of Modern Music, Professor Kinkeldey; Music in the Public Schools, Mr. Seitz; and General Problems of Music Supervisors, Mr. Seitz. The Department of Music will organize and maintain a choir for the services in Sage Chapel.

The sixth concert of the Music Students' League was held in the chamber music auditorium of Carnegie Hall, New York, last Saturday evening. Those who appeared were Alma Dormagen, soprano; Shirley Portnoi, violinist; Giuseppe Leone, baritone, Victor Trucco, pianist.

At the annual meeting of the League held for the election of officers, the following were elected for the year 1925-26: J. Fletcher Shera, President; Dr. Eugene A. Noble, Vice-President; Viola Sherer, Student Vice-President; Helen Fountain, Treasurer; Susanne Gambardella, Secretary and Acting Treasurer; Alice Gates, Recording Secretary. The Secretary was ordered to cast one ballot electing the officers unanimously. It being impossible to hold the annual business meeting the first Sunday in April, as required by the By-Laws, same was adjourned to April 14th.

The Lyric Club of Utica, N. Y., a group of sixteen young women, under the direction of Frank Parker of the Utica Conservatory, presented two cantatas on the French program of the B Sharp Musical Club Wednesday, April 15, Ste. Mary Magdalene by Vincent d'Indy and The Blessed Damozel by Debussy. The accompanists were Alice Newman, pianist and Margarethe Briesen, organist.

Vernon Williams, a son of the late famous tenor, H. Evan Williams, and for many years a pupil of Herbert Witherspoon, has been engaged as one of the leading tenors for the season at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, London, in May and June. Mr. Williams will sing the part of Radames in Aida and other roles which he has already done in Italy.

A normal course in piano teaching will be given during the Summer Session of 1925 at Boston University by Professor Clarence G. Hamilton of Wellesley College, the editor of the Music Students' Piano Course. The course will include pedagogical principles, technique, interpretation, ear-training, transposition, sight-reading, theory and history of music as applied to piano pupils. Special attention will be given to the subject of teaching for school credit, and the Music Students' Piano Course will be used as a text-book.

Registration Day is July 6, the first class meeting on July 7, and the final examination on July 25. The class will meet daily except Saturday. A number of free scholarships are available, and application for these scholarships should be made to the Director of the Summer Session, Boston University.

A program of violin arrangements of Fritz Kreisler was played by Peter Meremblum of the faculty of the Cornish School of Music last Sunday evening. The recital included Kreisler's own Recitativo, Scherzo, and Caprice, Valse, and Caprice Viennois, and transcriptions of works of Paganini, Francoeur, Tartini, Gluck, and Cartier.

An all-Russian program, with numbers by Nicolaieff, Glazounow, Tschaikowsky, Auer, Gliere, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Wieniawski, will be given by Mr. Meremblum at the Seattle school on the evening of May 24. A German program and a French precede these two concerts.

WILLIAM QUINCY PORTER

AMONG the seven selected compositions chosen for performance by the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra at its special concert of new American music on the morning of May 1 in the Eastman Theatre were two by composers connected with the Cleveland Institute of Music. William Quincy Porter's Ukrainian Suite and Bernard Rogers' Soliloquy for flute and strings. Both of these pieces had unofficial performance in the "laboratory" at the Institute as soon as they were composed, just as do all the compositions of the members of the faculty and of the student body.

Mr. Porter has for four years been associated with the Institute as an instructor in theory. He studied music at Yale University and in Paris. When Mr. Rogers composed his Soliloquy he was a pupil of Ernest Bloch, director of the Institute.

A pupil of Mme. Pamplin of St. Petersburg, Fla., Ruth Shirley, has just won first prize in the Florida State Music Contest in the competition for coloratura sopranos. Miss Shirley has been a pupil of Mme. Pamplin for four years, and has prepared a repertory of Italian, French, Spanish, and English songs and operatic roles.

Walter Leary will conduct a summer vocal class in the Herbert Witherspoon Studios until August 1.

A feature in connection with the courses in Music to be given during the coming summer at Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh, a recent announcement points out, is the engagement of Dr. Will Earhart, Director of Music in the Pittsburgh Public Schools, who is to give a series of five lectures June 29 to July 3 on the Principles of Music Education. It is expected that teachers and supervisors of public school music will be especially interested in Dr. Earhart's presence on the program as a lecturer.

Dr. Earhart is Chairman of the National Research Council of Music Education, Chairman of the National Music Committee for Platoon Schools, and is nationally known for his contributions in the field of music educational problems.

The eighth annual Summer Session at Carnegie Tech will open courses of six weeks for professional musicians and for teachers and supervisors of music, on June 29. In addition to individual lessons in voice, organ, piano, violin, violoncello and all other instruments of the symphony orchestra, courses will be given in elementary harmony, practical harmony, elementary counterpoint and form, history of music, Dalcroze Eurythmics, technique of orchestral instruments, chorus conducting, elements of orchestration, methods in teaching music appreciation, rote songs, and principles of music education.

There was a concert given by the pupils of the Bronx House Music School on May 2, at Morris High School, New York. Under the leadership of Edgar S. Stowell, director of the Music School, an orchestra of fifty pieces played and there were selections by members of the piano, vocal, and cello departments.

A piano recital was given by Ira Pendler, artist pupil of Gustav L. Becker, in old Steinway Hall, New York, on May 3. His program included numbers by Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, Brahms, Borodin, Sibelius, and Liszt.

Edwin Hughes has been re-engaged to conduct a Master Class Session in piano at the University of Minnesota on June 24 during the annual convention of the Minnesota Music Teachers' Association. His Summer Master Class in New York City begins June 29.

HERBERT MUSTARDE
TEACHER OF SINGING
11-12 Metropolitan Opera House Studios
Tel: Pennsylvania 2634

V. TREVISAN
VOCAL STUDIO
Basso of the Chicago Civic Opera Co.
74 Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill.

ARTHUR J. HUBBARD — VINCENT V. HUBBARD
Teachers of Singing in All Its Branches
246 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, MASS.

SOUSA AND HIS BAND
JOHN PHILIP SOUSA, Conductor
Now Booking Season 1925-1926
HARRY ASKIN, Mgr.
1451 Broadway New York

The Washington Heights Musical Club
MISS JANE CATHCART, President
200 West 57th Street, New York City Telephones: Circle 10117

INSTITUTE OF MUSICAL ART OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK
FRANK DAMROSCH, Director 120 Claremont Avenue
Endowed. All Branches of Music. Faculty composed of distinguished artists
Catalogue on application Address Dept. V

PIANO music has a large place in the recent issues of the various publishing houses. To the compositions of H. Balfour Gardiner already mentioned in this column G. Schirmer, Inc., have added his Humoresque and A Sailor's Piece. The music of the former is original in harmonic coloring and catching in its rhythm, although it is by no means obvious. It is of moderate difficulty, yet perhaps suited to a lighter group in a recital program. Percy Grainger has edited the music in this issue. The nature of the latter work is indicated by the title, although the suggestiveness of the music is far from commonplace.

Mr. Grainger is the editor also of the piano setting of Gabriel Faure's Nell, from the song of that name. The work is freely transcribed, but the Faure in it is not forgotten. This also is published by Schirmer.

From the same house come Two Concert Studies, by N. Louise Wright; The Afterglow, by Charles Huerter; and A Whim, by Kathleen Blair. The Studies are not beyond the capacity of the intermediate student, although to play them perfectly is an accomplishment. That in C major is a study in arpeggiations with a melody above them divided between the right and the crossing left hand. The D major Study gives a bel canto melody to the left hand, while the right supplies an incomplete triplet accompaniment.

The Afterglow is a revery of warm melody simply, but effectively presented. This piece and The Whim, a capricious bit of music with clever rhythm and imaginative melodic structure, are not too difficult for the student of a little more than intermediate advancement.

Carl Fischer, Inc., are the publishers of Moriz Rosenthal's Carnaval de Vienne, a humoresque on waltz themes of Johann Strauss. This music is familiar because of its frequent performance in concert by the pianist himself. It was originally composed thirty-six years ago this month.

Published by Fabbri & Company, of Trieste, Italy, are Gastone Zuccoli's Three Impressions for the piano. The three works, included in one cover or available separately, are Humoresca, Dansando, and Piccolo Studio.

The Scouts' Trip to Fairyland, by Ruth Stephens Porter, (published by Hinds, Hayden, and Eldredge, New York) is an operetta intended for the pleasure, entertainment, and training of younger school children. It consists of twenty songs from the Teacher's Book of Accompaniments, arranged successively with some spoken dialogue and simple scenic indications.

Jane CATHCART
TEACHER OF PIANO
ELEMENTARY HARMONY
200 West 57th Street, New York City
Telephone: Circle 10117

JOSEF ADLER
Teacher of Piano
ACCOMPANIST
137 West 86th St. New York
Phone Schuyler 3580

Nikolai Sokoloff completed recently the season of the Cleveland Orchestra. He left last week for Europe, but will return in time to begin rehearsals for his week of appearances as guest conductor of the Stadium Concerts this summer.

Cleveland Bids Season Farewell

(Continued from page 5)

Tibbett, Mr. and Mrs. de Luca, and Mmes. Guilford, Gordon, and Dalossy. Several short speeches were made anent the success of the opera season and the musical advance in Cleveland.

* * *

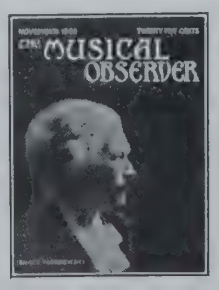
The symphonic season also was brought to a close with a request program, Nikolai Sokoloff conducting. Cesar Franck's Symphony was the one chosen by the orchestra patrons for the final program, and other numbers were the Tannhaeuser Overture and Loeffler's Pagan Poem, with Beryl Rubinstein as soloist. Prolonged applause for the conductor and the orchestra followed the concert.

Eleanor Clarage wrote in the Times that Mr. Rubinstein proved his worth "as an artist of high rank. His touch is sparkling and crystal-clear; his sense of rhythm and phrasing indicates musical insight of the highest degree and his technique is at all times amazingly facile." Mr. Bell asserted: "He is the finished artist, and if there be piano music that he does not play beautifully, intelligently, and brilliantly, it has not yet been placed upon the piano before him." Mr. Rogers commended his "impressive" volume, "exquisite clarity and lightness" of tone, and "enlightened musicianship." According to Wilson G. Smith of the Press, "he had technical finish, dynamic force without excess and obtrusion, and tonal delicacy in the solo episodes."

The soloist at the closing pop concert of the year was Harriet Eells, mezzo-soprano. Her talent and understanding were praised by Mr. Bell, and Miss Clarage thought her lower scale more pleasing than her upper voice, but commended her "smooth and intelligent" manner of presentation. Mr. Rogers stated that hers is a voice of great beauty; "it is round, smooth of texture, of uncommonly pleasing quality."

* * *

The Dayton Westminster Choir, John Finley Williamson conducting, gave a concert here recently. According to Mr. Rogers, they did some "very remarkable chorus singing." This writer continued: "It would be difficult to surpass the manifold lights and shades, the subtleties and pliancies of modulated tone which Mr. Williamson summons from his singers. The sixty voices are well balanced, and the response to the conductor's baton is alert, spirited and perfectly co-ordinated."



This Coupon Is Worth 25c

LET'S GET ACQUAINTED!

If you are interested in a Music Magazine full of good, practical, interesting, novel reading matter and carefully selected musical compositions, mail this coupon with 25 cents and let us send you two issues of the MUSICAL OBSERVER.

THE MUSICAL OBSERVER CO.
62 COOPER SQUARE, N. Y. CITY

NAME .....ADDRESS .....
CITY .....STATE .....

BACH'S B MINOR MASS, by C. Sanford Terry, published by the Oxford University Press.

This little book is a number in the series, The Musical Pilgrim, edited by Dr. Arthur Somervell. Mr. Terry says in his preface: "The object of the series which includes this book is to provide students and concert-goers with reliable guidance to the classics more solid than that afforded by annotated programs."

The material which the author has combined appeals in part to the lay reader who wishes to know more about what he is hearing when he goes to a concert at which the Mass is sung, and in part to the student of music who will want to know the history of the composition of the Mass, facts about its historical precedents as a type of music, details about the manner in which it is to be performed, and the like.

The book fulfills its purpose. It is a summary of many critical writings on Bach's masterpiece, and it includes the results of careful study of the score of the work by the author of the book itself, as well as by other commentators. If one is curious about Bach's B minor Mass, here is detailed information, and much of it.

The Theodore Presser Company, Philadelphia, publishes The Little Folks' Picture History of Music, by James Francis Cooke, a study book for children, treating in elementary terms the history of music from its mythological beginnings on.

The text is written simply and in a manner calculated to fascinate the attention of children. Facts are colorfully dressed up to catch the fancy and to be seized upon by the memory. There are anecdotes, and pictures to be pasted, and test questions . . . but facts are not neglected.

The April issue of The League of Composers' Review (published at 29 West Forty-seventh street, New York) is like its predecessors in the history of this publication, except that it is bigger, and better, too.

Testimony as to the quality of the latest Review is to be found in a simple list of its contents, which are the following articles: The Curse of Literature, by Andre Coeuroy; Why Modern Music Lacks Melody, by Wanda Landowska; Magyar Explorers, by Adjoran Otvos; Tyranny of the Absolute, by Adolph Weissmann; Busoni the Musician, by Guido Gatti; Folk Fables, by Frank Patterson; Festival in Gallup, New Mexico, by Frederick Jacobi; Another Schoenberg Dithyramb, by Pitts Sanborn; and Placing the Critics, by Olin Downes.

SUMMY'S CORNER

Significance, charm and permanent worth is revealed at once in these beautiful piano numbers by

SIGNE LUND
Famous Norwegian Composer

BALLADE IN C MINOR, Op. 37 (Gr. 6)	$1.25
CONCERT ETUDE (Gr. 6)	.75
LEGENDE (Newly Revised Edition), Op. 16, No. 1 (Gr. 3-4)	.30
MEDITATION, Op. 49, No. 1 (Gr. 3-4)	.30

(The Usual Discount to Teachers)

Clayton F. Summy Co.
PUBLISHERS
429 So. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

May Festival Season Starts

Cincinnati, Springfield and Newark Among First Cities to Hear Spring Music.

(Continued from page 1)

Bach's St. John's Passion with Miss Hayden making a very successful local debut and Mme. Homer, George Meader, Dan Beddoe, and Fred Patton were among the assisting artists.

In addition to a chorus of children from six parochial schools, there were the Schola Cantorum from St. Gregory's Seminary, Mt. St. Mary's Seminary, and the children's chorus from St. Peter's Cathedral. Miss Hayden was very well received, and Mr. Beddoe was accorded special mention for the excellence of his work. To quote Mrs. Lillian Tyler Plogstedt (Post), Miss Hayden "displayed a voice of exquisite purity and sweetness and of correct timbre for oratorio singing."

The opening night of the Festival was the most brilliant in the recollection of the local reviewers. Elgar's Dream of Gerontius was presented with John McCormack, Nevada van der Veer, and Fred Patton as soloists. Mrs. Plogstedt played the organ accompaniments.

Springfield, Mass., May 10.—The annual Springfield Music Festival, including three concerts and two public rehearsals, came to a close yesterday evening with a varied program in which Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto, and Lawrence Tibbett, baritone, took part as soloists.

Emil Mollenhauer conducted the Boston Festival Orchestra and the Festival Chorus (trained by John J. Bishop) in a program which included the Ballet Music from Goldmark's Queen of Sheba, the church scene from Cavalleria Rusticana, Chabrier's Espagna, and the Hallelujah chorus from the Messiah. Mme. d'Alvarez sang songs and selections from Carmen and Samson, Mr. Tibbett was heard in opera selections.

The opening program of the festival on Friday evening was devoted to the Elgar oratorio, King Olaf, in which Mr. Bishop conducted his chorus of 300 voices, and in which Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, Allen McQuhae, tenor, and Lawrence Tibbett, were soloists. The matinee concert yesterday was an orchestral program conducted by Mr. Mollenhauer, and Germaine Schnitzer was assisting artist. She played a solo group and Liszt's E flat Concerto. Beethoven's Leonore Overture (No. 3), Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Svendsen's Carnival in Paris were played by the orchestra.

The public rehearsals of the music presented in the regular concerts took place Friday afternoon and yesterday morning.

Newark, N. J., May 7.—A last-minute strike of the orchestra almost prevented the opening of the eleventh annual Newark Music Festival in the new Salaam Temple on Monday evening, but a substitute orchestra was quickly obtained, and the concert went on as scheduled. The third and last program of the series was given last evening with Florence Macbeth, soprano, and Percy Grainger, pianist, as soloists.

The musicians' union called away the regular festival orchestra because it was to be directed by Mortimer Wiske, who a year ago in Philadelphia conducted a festival on which union musicians who took part have yet to collect part of their pay. The neighboring Montclair Orchestra, diminished by its union members, filled the breach, with certain changes of program.

The first soloist to appear on the opening program was Sylvia Lent, violinist, who played a group of solo pieces and the Bruch G minor Concerto. The reviewer of the Evening News praised Miss Lent for the beauty of her tone and for her technical skill. Queena Mario won great applause from the capacity audience of 4,000 for her singing of selections from Carmen and Lucia, and in several encores.

"Robust and compelling," the News writer called the voice of Paul Althouse, tenor. He sang Walter's Prize Song from Die Meistersinger, took part in the Faust trio, and was called upon for encores. The chorus sang without orchestral accompaniment a Bach cantata, with Jackson Kinsey, baritone, as soloist, in the final Faust scene, for the three vocal soloists, and in Mark Andrews' The Dawn. The orchestra played Mozart's F major Symphony, No. 6.

Rosa Ponselle, soprano, Kathryn Meisle, contralto, and Lucille Svet-Katchen, local pianist, were the soloists of the Tuesday evening concert. Miss Ponselle received one of the greatest ovations of her career, reported the Ledger. She sang arias from Traviata and Trovatore.

The audience greeted with almost equal enthusiasm the playing of Devotion, by Mark Andrews, which the composer conducted himself. Kathryn Meisle divided honors with Miss Ponselle, said the Ledger. She sang selections from Samson and Le Prophete. The chorus was heard without orchestra under Mr. Wiske.

Mrs. Svet-Katchen played a solo piano group, and was warmly received. At the final concert last night Percy Grainger played solo compositions by Grieg and by himself. The lack of orchestra prevented the scheduled performance of Grieg's Concerto and three solo numbers of his own. Florence Macbeth, in addition to airs from Mignon and Dinorah sang the solo part in Fanning's cantata, Liberty. Dark Hills, by Spaulding Frazer, president of the Festival Association, was sung by chorus with piano accompaniment. There were other shorter choral numbers. The Montclair Orchestra played some compositions of Grieg and Kramer.

Theatres under direction of Hugo Riesenfeld
RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street
GLORIA SWANSON in
'Madame Sans Gene'
RIVOLI CONCERT ORCHESTRA
RIALTO Broadway at 42nd Street
RICHARD DIX
in
"THE SHOCK PUNCH"
FAMOUS RIALTO ORCHESTRA
Riesenfeld's Classical Jazz

CAPITOL Broadway at 51st Street Subway to Door
World's Largest and Most Beautiful Motion Picture Theatre
Edward Bowes, Managing Director
"THE SPORTING VENUS"
with BLANCHE SWEET and RONALD COLEMAN
PRESENTATIONS BY ROTHAFEL
Capitol Grand Orchestra
Capitol Ballet Corps

Lines o' News AND Chatter

Lines-O'-Newser shook hands over the phone last week with Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Hertz, lunched with Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Ganz, dined with Fritz Reiner, said "Howdy!" to Theodore Spiering, read a letter from Ossip Gabrilowitsch, another from Leopold Stokowski, and then called it a couple of conductorial days.

* * *

Back to New York too trouped the trouping Metropolitan Operaites, and then went their various ways: to the east and the west . . . those who haven't stopped off in town to catch a metaphorical breath.

* * *

Now John McCormack has gone and left us, being a few hundred miles out on the Atlantic as we write. In the meantime his manager, Dennis F. McSweeney (who has taken over exclusive control of John's affairs) is putting things to rights in his new office at 565 Fifth avenue, New York.

* * *

In the Kansas City Star of April 30 appeared a cartoon of "Some Boys Who Have Made Good." Beneath the crayon caricature of Walter A. Fritschy appeared the words, "the gentleman with the shoulful eyes." No wonder Walter picks good attractions.

* * *

Well, congratulations to Mischa Elman who, having married Miss Helen Frances Katten, of San Francisco, last Wednesday, will now step regularly up to the captain's office and make his daily reports.

* * *

Our newest correspondent-at-large is Capt. Max Fleischman, brother of Mrs. Christian R. Holmes, active in New York's Philharmonic Orchestra and Stadium Concert affairs. Captain Fleischman sent a half column story from Santa Barbara which told of Arthur Bliss's Band, the program played, and the hearty reception it had.

* * *

"On to Berlin," murmured Sophie Braslau as she walked aboard the Olympic last Saturday preparatory for sailing and bent on conquering new fields hitherto uninvaded. Miss Braslau will be back home in the late summer.

* * *

If the gentleman who wrote to Bruno Zirato, of The Musical Digest, and asked for information touching on advertising will send in his name Mr. Zirato will be pleased to supply that information. It happened that the writer, who signed himself "Yours cordially," neglected to affix his signature to his communication.

* * *

According to best available records Tullio Serafin is the first Italian to have conducted Wagner's Parsifal in the United States. He turned the trick during the recent Metropolitan visit to Cleveland.

* * *

The Kneisel twins—Frank and Fred (now nineteen)—look so much alike that their own father cannot always tell them apart. If only they were fiddles Papa Franz would have no difficulty.

* * *

Walter Henry Rothwell, leader of the Los Angeles Philharmonic forces, has retired to the seclusion of Carmel, partly to rest and partly to study the score of The Echo, which he will conduct in its world premiere at the coming Portland convention.

"I will shortly have an interesting Line-o'-News for you," confided Tamaki Miura. Just what can the petite Japanese prima donna be contemplating?

* * *

Another good music reviewer gone wrong . . . Willard M. Clark, of the Springfield (Mass.) Union, has stepped from the silence of print to let his baritone voice be heard in concert. Springfield now agree that Willard knows what he writes about.

* * *

His colleague, Francis Regal, reviewer for the Springfield Republican, has been elected president of the Springfield Musicians' Club.

* * *

Mrs. Dorothy Caruso Ingram, together with little Gloria Caruso, left the United States on the S. S. France last week. Dr. and Mrs. P. M. Marafioti were on the same ship.

* * *

Miss Nellie C. Cornish, from far off Seattle, also spent several days in New York . . . and many were the interesting things she had to tell about the progressive Cornish School.

* * *

From Milton Douthat, whose business is to keep the world reading about Haensel and Jones' artists, comes the following:

"Florence Easton's versatility being well known, it is little wonder that an Elizabeth, N. J., grocer received an order for a bottle of Florence Easton's mayonnaise shortly after the Easton Mayonnaise Company began putting up eight-sheets in that city. However, Miss Easton wants us to announce that she has no intention of commercializing her own justly famous salad dressing which is still reserved for favored visitors at the Long Island home of Miss Easton and her husband, Francis Maclennan, and that she has no connection with the mayonnaise company."

* * *

Mrs. Edna Saunders, the Houston, Tex., manager of concerts, writes of the recent appearance in that city of Barbara Lull. This young woman is a Houston product, and her playing the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin with the Kansas City Little Symphony Orchestra was of an order which prompted the critical Ellen Douglas MacCorquodale to write stunning things in the Houston Chronicle and to predict for Miss Lull "a career of the greatest promise."

* * *

Presently a host of National Federation of Music Clubs members will be winding their respective ways towards Portland, Ore., where the next biennial is to be held.

* * *

Joining the procession of musicians eastward were Mr. and Mrs. William Bachaus and Marcella Roeseler of the Metropolitan Opera Company. They sailed on the S. S. Stuttgart on May 4.

* * *

Getting a close-up of Albert Stoessel the other evening he looked for all the world like a university undergraduate.

* * *

In the meantime, America's master schools of music will get under way, with their masters working madly in masterly fashion.

* * *

She's the grand old lady of opera—Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink—and what a royal welcome she will have at the Metropolitan on her return there.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS
LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA
3 0112 101430905